Then, if the constitution gives congress no power over the subject, or if it tolerates and sanctions the power, and the representatives of the people think it expedient to frankly announce them on this subject, and constitutional rights to exercise such power, they should not force the petitions of the abolitionists upon this house. I do not advocate principles nor counsel a policy to others which I would not exercise myself. It is most true that I utterly deny the power of congress to exercise any power, constitutionally over the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, or in the states and territories in which it existed at the time of the adoption of the constitution; yet I admit that congress has power, to a certain extent, over the subject of the territories in which slavery did not exist. I admit that congress has power to legislate over the subject of the foreign slave trade, to legislate over the subject of the slave trade to be imported in relation to the independence of Hayti, as well as in relation to commercial treaties with that government, and other republics of a similar character. The expediency of legislating in relation to Hayti, I am, however, fully prepared to oppose. It was during the last congress that a memorial was handed to the senate, signed by a constituent of mine, who had liberated a large number of slaves and sent them to Hayti, praying that congress would establish commercial relations with Hayti, and receive and interchange ministers or commercial agents. The memorial was signed by a large and respectable number of my constituents, but I refused to present it, upon the ground that it would lead to very bad results, and to more evil than good. Upon my return home, I informed the signers of my course, and my reasons for it, and not one of them conversed with but approved of my conduct; and my majority, on re-election, was nearly double that of the last year. I thought that to present the memorial would be to throw a firebrand into the house; and my forebodings were realized. My constituents sought some one else to present it; and when the astute and vigilant gentleman from Massachusetts took it up, I thought that memorial in reply to my then colleague, the then chairman of the committee on foreign relations, in the debate, I gave some explanation as to the respectability of the character of the petitioners, and afterwards declared myself if created in the Executive branch, which reported the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, as having presented that very petition. I have introduced this circumstance for no other purpose than to show that I have practised upon my constituents, and have not been in a questionable over which I consider congress has full power to legislate, and thus, with greater force and propriety, to urge those gentlemen who think that congress has jurisdiction over the question of slavery in the District of Columbia, and where they would be inexpedient to exercise the power to say so to their constituents, and refuse to present their malign petitions. This I am persuaded they will do, unless they think that the doctrine of expediency had better be constituted in favor of their popularity with the abolitionists, and where they think it would be unless they esteem the peace, quiet and general welfare of the country of less consideration than their favorable standing with the fanatic advocates of abolition. My estimation of the true character of a member of congress is not to be measured by his stand, as a middle barrier between eurocrats and the constitution by the executive or the legislative branches of the government, and infractions of social order, of civil and political liberty, which may be attempted by legislative means, either to subvert their own civil purposes or to gratify the bad passions of the dissatisfied and turbulent. Sworn to support the constitution, he should not, directly, or indirectly, allow its violation, nor aid and abet the same, in any manner, and where he is in the slightest degree, the peace and integrity of the union. In the language of another, instead of being a weathercock on the temple of freedom, to be blown in any and every direction by every gust of popular passion, he should be one of the pillars of the state to support the noble edifice.

But some gentlemen have argued, with seeming sincerity, that this question caused too much excitement and alarm in the south. They say that the south is too quickly excited, and that in presenting petitions of the abolitionists, they only want to defend the right of petition, and to declare, in the easiest way possible, that they are opposed to immediate abolition, but think slavery a moral, social and political evil, and the south should make every effort to abolish. They say that if the south will not take the benefit of their friendly warning and voluntary advice, the time may come, nay, will come, when the abolitionists cannot be restrained; and if there should be insurrections, assassinations and murders, why, the south will be to blame, because they did not take early and friendly advice to hold their peace and allow the abolitionists to do as they please. These gentlemen say that whilst they know that an open banner on the south would be to excite in any portion of the south, and ought not to be, they think that congress have a right to discuss the whole question here; to speak of slavery as a crime and a sin, and talk of the immorality of the south in the very heat of the south, that they have a right to make speeches here, which go to every part of the south, and can be read by every free negro or slave who can read, showing how strongly the doctrine of abolition is sustained by able members from the north in concert with thousands of fanatic petitioners and hypocrites of the south. But, gentlemen, it may very well be amusing to be eloquent, and it may be polite in them to appear humble, when it costs them nothing, but gains them political capital; but he who at this day and this hour in the north, in the north, talks of stains, without showing how they can be effaced of crime, without showing how they can be suppressed—of wickedness, without showing how it can be avoided, however signal his own virtues and illustrations of his own piety, his own extravagance and false morality, and exhibits proofs of his intelligence and fidelity of the highest human intellect under the hallmarks of fanaticism. Yet some gentlemen think it marvellously wonderful that the representatives from the south will not let the abolitionists

Unionists of the north thrust their hands into the pockets of the people of the south; they think it strange that the south will not place their property, held before the constitution, in despite of the constitution, and by the constitution, on the speaker's desk, and go into grave and solemn discussion and legislation to determine whether it is their property or not. They say they only ask the south to do this to settle the question and to quiet the abolitionists; and when they say that in friendship to the south—they will vote that it is really the property of the south—a slave is a piece of property, his master—they affect to be astonished that we will not trust the question with them. But let me tell those gentlemen, that while they are honest, all who are not they may not be. Let me tell them that to admit the right of congress to decide on slaves is the property of the south, is at once to limit the right of congress to legislate on the subject; once admit the right of congress to decide in favor of the south, or to decide at all, and you admit the right to decide at all, if it should be deemed wise, prudent or expedient. Principles of right anterior to the constitution, the constitution itself, forbids that congress should legislate upon our property; and expediency, self-protection, adonism us not to hold or listen to a discussion on the subject.

But Mr. Speaker, if we have been so long on the time of the house more than a quarter of an hour, had not the learned gentlemen from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), made a speech. I intended to obtain the floor when he had concluded, but I did not. I must give up the floor with necessity, that I most highly, perhaps enthusiastically, admire the vast and varied erudition of that gentleman, his great political knowledge, his eminent virtues and distinguished services. But, notwithstanding the gentleman has been so long, he pursued to debate. I had fondly hoped that, having gained the acme of his fame; having filled the highest office in the gift of the most potent republic in the world; having passed through all the ranks of the noblest of our nation's warriors, never having been willing, ay, anxious, to throw up the sword-battle waters, instead of endeavoring to increase their angry commotion. But no; he strikes them with his wand, yet not as one of old did, that healing ray comes from him. He had hoped that he would have looked upon that question as over for national attention, in which were involved the destinies of a whole people. I had thought that he, above all men in congress, would have taken an expansive and statesmanlike view of the whole subject; would have taken a philosophical and philosophical view, considered the constitution as the established result of concession and compromise, and would have esteemed the union too dear and sacred to admit its value to be calculated. I know full well the peril which I encounter when I attempt to attack the positions of that learned and distinguished gentleman; but, at the risk of meeting all his powers, great as they are acknowledged to be, I must not hesitate to debate the most of his arguments, to dispute the most of his premises, and to deny the majority of his conclusions. I shall do this, because I know that the opinions of the distinguished gentleman have more influence than those of any half dozen gentlemen on this floor; and in saying this, I neither mean disparagement to others, nor an ill compliment to him.

What have been the principal points of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams)? He has raised five or six. The first was, that congress has jurisdiction under the laws of nature; the second, upon the law of God; the third, upon the Declaration of Independence; the fourth upon that declaration in the constitution which gives congress the power to legislate upon the interests of the District of Columbia; and the last was upon that clause of the constitution which declares the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

Now, sir, as to the first point. I would ask the learned gentleman if we were assembled here for the purpose of discussing the laws of nature? Were the members of the American congress of the U. States elected to examine and conform to the laws of nature? Have we sworn, in the discharge of our high duties, to obey, sanction and carry into effect the laws of nature? What are the laws of nature? Who will be kind enough to explain that to the learned gentleman has omitted to do so. Although he has alluded to them with so much earnestness, and made them the basis of his argument, I frankly confess that, as much as I have read of the speculative theories of the laws of nature, I have never been able to form any very distinct idea of the subject. If I have any opinion on the question, it is, that a state of nature is a state of war, where sense of justice and law is unknown; where might constitutes right; where physical power is the only umpire; and where written laws are totally unknown, or, if known, totally discarded. It was from reflecting upon man in a state of nature, no doubt, that induced Hobbes to say that "the natural state of man was war." Then, would the gentleman resolve us into that state? Read the history of the world, and you will find the earliest dawnings of civilization to the present time, and what lesson does it teach us? Does it not exhibit one endless scene of confusion and war? Does it not present one unbroken, shoreless sea of blood and carnage? Man, in a state of nature, is a savage animal, without the restraint of reason—governed alone by the impulse of passion and his lawless domineering self-interest. Are we to go back in the days of barbarism, of individual prowess and physical power? Are we to forget the two hundred years of an established constitution? Will the honorable gentleman elude us with the red men of our wild and romantic forests? What are our Indians in their almost state of nature? Have they the idea of written laws; or is that idea formed by the usage of savages? Do not wild tribes a contempt of law, a disregard of an overruling provision, mark their character? Must we, like Push-mat-a-ha, who has been interested in your congressional burial ground, believe that human existence is generated in the clouds, and that the human race is a species of meteor, like Minerva, spring into existence full grown and full armed for conflict?

I trust the day is far distant when the members of this house will urge, as a justification for the course they are pursuing, the usage of savages. Do not wild tribes a contempt of law, a disregard of an overruling provision, mark their character? Must we, like Push-mat-a-ha, who has been interested in your congressional burial ground, believe that human existence is generated in the clouds, and that the human race is a species of meteor, like Minerva, spring into existence full grown and full armed for conflict?

I trust the day is far distant when the members of this house will urge, as a justification for the course they are pursuing, the usage of savages. Do not wild tribes a contempt of law, a disregard of an overruling provision, mark their character? Must we, like Push-mat-a-ha, who has been interested in your congressional burial ground, believe that human existence is generated in the clouds, and that the human race is a species of meteor, like Minerva, spring into existence full grown and full armed for conflict?

"Push-mat-a-ha signified superior excellence. In the language of his tribe, it is a dismission of honor. He thought it by the record of his tribe, and being regarded it and become a brave. He was a warrior of the United States during the last war, and his idea of his existence was expressed in a council of conference, as reported to me by one who was present. It surpasses any thing in Osmun.

He said that "Push-mat-a-ha never drew sustenance from woman, nor was dandled on her knee. A dark complexioned man, a black horse, a black horse, a tall pine sapling; and out stepped Push-mat-a-ha, a full grown warrior, with a rifle on his shoulder."

He said that "Push-mat-a-ha's last words are written on the humble monument of his tribe, and he said: "When I am dead, let the big guns be fired over me."

law; but I insist that it is not a place for its discussion or its precedent; yet were it, it would not be difficult to find in the history of the nation for slavery; for, from almost the beginning to the end thereof, will be found the institution of slavery recognized and referred to, and so where there is an authority or sanction for a good Christian to counsel his neighbor's property—his master or his maid-servant."

But, passing from the contemplation of the Divine law, which I would regard as profanity in me to quote or use in a deliberative assembly like this, except as it may be used as a historical fact, I come to the next argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It was urged by him, as also by others who preceded him in debate, that we should recognize the right of congress to abolish slavery in

"Of the slavery which the Supreme Being has permitted throughout all time to exist, in Asia and Africa, and at this very moment, in a great part of Europe also, I say nothing; I draw no lesson from it. It is an extension of our crime in holding slaves, whose emancipation would be no less ruinous to themselves than to their owners. Nor will I avoid myself of the fact, that the patriarch Abraham, to whom the Bible records a promise from heaven "that in his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed," was the proprietor at one time of three hundred slaves. And the same thing is recorded of Hebrew words, all of whom were born in his house. Nor of the fact that his son Isaac was not deemed unworthy of the special favor of God, although he also had "great store of servants." All these things are proved by the Jewish code of laws, proceeding, as they are taught to believe, immediately from God himself, authorizes slavery, and even chosen people; points out distinctly the mode in which a freeman, and his wife and children who are slaves, may himself become a slave forever; and expressly authorizes the Jews to purchase the children of their slaves, and to sell them among themselves to be bound forever, and to be inheritance for their children. All this being expressly laid down in the Bible, the Jewish must be abandoned as an absolute imposture; if I have been authorized to do so, it is Divine origin; and he who calls doctrine of slavery to be by compact or by birth, "the consummation of wickedness," will find it difficult to expel him from the charge of blasphemy against the Most High. Bishop Newton, in his Dissertation on the Prophecies, urges the present and past condition of the Africans as a fulfillment of a prophecy, and as evidence, of course, of the divine origin of the Jewish law, in his prophetic words, had said, "cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren; and he himself be a servant." Now, the Africans, the bishop undertakes to show, are in bondage, and their slavery is an accomplishment of Noah's prediction.

This is not all. At the time when the Christian religion was first preached among mankind, slavery existed, and had very existed, not only in Judea, but in Greece and Rome, and in every part of the world then known. Among the Jews, the law of Moses was yet in force. Of this law, concerning slavery, no direct notice is to be found by the founder of the Christian religion. As to the practice under it, he is equally silent. "Come not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfill it." He only does not condemn slavery, but actually goes to it a sort of sanction, by borrowing from it his parables. The kingdom of heaven itself is likened "to a certain king, who would take an account of his servants, and found them all of them 'not to pay.' his lord commanded him to be sold, and his wife and children, and all that he had, and payment to be made." "The servant, who had fallen down and 'worshipped' his master, was released, and was being accused of harshness to another servant, was 'delivered over to tormentors.' The kingdom of heaven is again compared to a master, who sent his servants into the country, and, on his return, directs the servant to be sold, and his intent to be cast into an outer darkness. A third illustration, equally grave and solemn, is taken from the return of a master, whose servants had been secured by him, prepared not himself, neither did he care for his will, and is 'besieged with many stripes.' Now, if domestic slavery has been decreed by our Saviour as an atonement for our sins, it would have been passed over without censure? Would the doctrine of salvation have been illustrated by a reference to it, direct and unequivocal? Should it have been so? Would the kingdom of heaven? Let it be remembered, too, that Paul preached among the Greeks, particularly among the Greeks and the Romans, who have been ignorant of the condition of the slaves and their slaves. He must have seen the ergastula in which slaves were confined, and the porter chained to the gate of his Roman master, and he must have seen the degradation of slavery as a crime, and he must have seen the servants to be 'absolved to their masters, with fear and trembling, to obey them in all things, not answering again, &c. &c." And he must have seen the same thing, corresponded with his precepts. The Ergastula is nothing more than an intervention in behalf of the fugitive slave, who had probably run away from his master, to lessen the eloquence of the apostle by whom he was converted.

the District of Columbia, and its jurisdiction over the subject in a broader and more extended manner, under the Declaration of Independence of the United States. Do gentlemen forget that that eloquent recital of the wrongs and grievances of the colonies, which was drawn up by a southerner, and contained in council and in the battle-field by southern men, comprised in that Declaration of Independence has excited domestic insurrection among us? Do gentlemen forget that, when the revolution commenced, in enumerating the causes which impelled the people of the colonies to abjure their allegiance to the king of Great Britain, King George the Third, "prompting our negroes to rise in arms against us—those very negroes whom, by an insidious use of his negative, he hath refused us permission to exclude by law?" Does the course pursued by the abolitionists differ widely from this now? But, whether slavery be a curse or not, the very authorities which gentlemen quote, and well attested history, will show that we of the south are not to be reproached with its institution or its continuance. Slavery is a subject which we cannot try at a time when no scriptures were entertained by any class of Christians upon the subject. Who were the participants in the traffic of slavery?—Whose ships and whose seamen were engaged in the slave trade? Or, were not the supporters of wealth amassed and hoarded up from this unjust prosecution? The puritan of the north was as much a party to the traffic as the planter of the south.—From New England the slave ships were fitted out; in New England the shackles were forged to bind the slaves; and in New England the money was sent to the south, it was only because there they could be employed to the best advantage. It was a misfortune that their climate had permitted the evil to take deep root; while at the north it had been stayed in its growth, not by the superior rectitude of the people, but by their sagacious attention to their own interests. They found that slavery would be a burden in their cold region, and shook it off upon their neighbors. Were gentlemen to consider these facts, were they to remember how slavery was introduced among us, were they to look about and see where the curse and denunciation would fall, instead of invoking the judgment of heaven and declaiming about the laws of nature, before pronouncing sentence of condemnation on every slaveholder, they would consider how they obtained them, and inquire whether they can now get clear of them without producing more evil than good.

The next argument urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts was founded on that provision in the constitution which declares that congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular states, and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of the government of the United States." With becoming respect and great deference to the opinions of others, I say to the many learned gentlemen, distinguished statesmen, and able constitutional lawyers, who have admitted the right of congress to legislate on the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, that they have not, in my humble judgment, done themselves or the question justice. Removed from the point of agitation and danger, they have seldom if ever examined the whole question; they have read the clause in the constitution without considering other matters and circumstances which give to it interpretation and meaning; they have thus formed a false opinion, and then brought their ingenuity and all the reasoning powers to bear to sustain their first conceived impressions. In no other way can I account for what I believe to be their erroneous opinion and mistaken conclusions. I humbly conceive, Mr. Speaker, that a gentleman who occupies the high station of a senator in the United States should, upon so important a question as this, translate his mind back to the history of the times of the formation of the constitution. He should take a philosophical view of the institutions of the country anterior to the constitution, and consider the circumstances which that instrument was intended to effect.

I have already shown how slavery was introduced into this country, and that, from the character of the climate, its stable productions, and other causes, there were more reasons than in the north, for the northern colonies. The colonial trade was under the absolute dominion of the mother country; and many of the southern colonies not only endeavored to discourage the importation of slaves, by various duties imposed at different times, but they petitioned the throne to remove those restraints of the governors which inhibited their assent to such laws as might check so very pernicious a commerce. Such was the state of things from the Declaration of Independence, in 1776, to 1791, when the several state legislatures made an act of federation, as allied sovereigns. Look into that compact, the original laws of commerce and trade will show numbers find power over the question of slavery given to the confederate government.

But the confederation under which the states had lagged for common defence, at all times feeble, became weaker and weaker, and the spirit of sectional jealousy and the rivalry of power, and it is a fact of curious interest that the convention which formed the present constitution assembled simply to revise, in a few important particulars, the articles of the confederation. The convention met in Philadelphia, in relation to the navigation of the Potomac river, gave the first impulse to a revision of the original confederation, and I trust that the conflict on its banks, in this capital, will not destroy the present government. In 1786, there was a convention of delegates at Annapolis, the result of whose deliberations was a recommendation to the several states to send delegates to a grand convention in Philadelphia, for the purpose of rendering the present federal government adequate to the exigencies of the union. This grand convention did meet in 1787, and proposed the constitution which, by the acceptance and confirmation of the people of the several states, in their own time and way, gave us and being to this republic. In the letter which was addressed to congress by the convention, we find some of the causes which embarrassed the action of the convention, and, indeed, delayed the adoption and ratification of the constitution, by some of the states, for a long time. "It is at times difficult to do what is just and wise between those rights which must be surrendered and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion, this difficulty was increased by a difference of opinion among the several states, as to their situation, extent, habits and political principles. And thus the constitution which we present, is the result of a spirit of amity, and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of our political situation rendered indispensable." Thus we see that what all felt that an efficient national government was necessary, it was admitted that this could only be obtained at an immense sacrifice.—Compromise was to lie at the foundation of any government at all—concession, free voluntary and unforced concession, was to be the basis of any national government could be established out of separate independent sovereignties of antagonistic opinions, customs and interests. But with all these difficulties pressing upon them, what was the result of the convention? The convention, after struggling into the constitution, we find that "no state shall enter into any treaty, alliance or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debt; pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility." That "no state shall, without the consent of the congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net product of all duties and imposts laid by any state on imports or exports, shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the congress." And that "no state shall, without the consent of congress, lay duty of tonnage, keep troops, or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay." The congress of the general government was given among other powers, the high power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises; to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes; to establish uniform laws of naturalization, and bankruptcies; to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin; fix the standard of weights and measures; to punish counterfeiting, piracy and felonies committed on the high seas, to establish post offices and post roads; to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal; raise and support armies; provide and regulate the militia; to make rules and articles of war; to call out, organize and govern the militia; exercise exclusive legislation over the seat of government, and over forts, arsenals and dock yards; to assist in the formation of new states; to exercise the power of pardon and reprieve over all other property belonging to the United States; and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." It will also be found that the constitution declares, that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included within this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and those indentured servants, three fifths of all other persons; that "the actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the congress of the U. States, and within every subsequent ten years, in such manner as they may by law direct; that the proportion or other direct tax, shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken;" that "all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of the constitution, shall remain the valid debt of the U. States under the constitution, as under the confederation;" that "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the congress prior to the year 1808, and a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person;" that "no person held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law relating thereto, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." Thus in the enumeration of these several powers, restrictions and concessions, we see what were the sacrifices and concessions made by the people of the individual states in order to obtain a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity.

The prior taxation, year 1808, and a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person;" that "no person held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law relating thereto, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up, on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." Thus in the enumeration of these several powers, restrictions and concessions, we see what were the sacrifices and concessions made by the people of the individual states in order to obtain a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity. The constitution recognizes slavery, and providing for its continuance, guaranteeing the vested rights of its owner, and providing for the recapture of fugitive slaves, was entered into deliberately by the non slaveholders, as a contract upon what were deemed good considerations. Among these considerations, were the advantages growing out of commerce, and especially the coasting trade, for American vessels. Experience had already proven how inadequate had been the articles of confederation to quell the numerous and conflicting commercial advantages; and never was it more evident, that thirteen distinct and separate governments, viewing commerce under different relations, would be brought to concede to each other the peculiar advantages which they possessed from climate, soil, or the nature of their productions. It was expected to realize, and which they have, in fact, realized, by the adoption of the constitution, in some degree, appear when we consider that the product of slave labor forms the staple of the commerce of the world. "Let it be traced," says an eloquent writer, who has ably vindicated the south from some of the aspersions of northern rant and fanaticism, "let it be traced through all its ramifications in the shipping, navigating, commercial and manufacturing concerns of New England, New York; in all the domestic and household arrangements in every domestic in the country; with every family where cotton is used, or sugar eaten; with every article of luxury and of elegance, of brilliancy, of magnificence, and with the degradation of the poorest members of the community, and it will be found that, under the contract of the constitution, a very large part of the profit of slave labor is gathered and possessed in the free states, while the burden of the slave is borne by the states upon the states where that labor is performed." But, besides the advantages flowing from commerce, which the non slaveholding states secured by the adoption of the constitution, let it be remembered that the slaveholders of the southern states engaged them for their expenditures during the revolutionary struggle—which has paid millions for that purpose, besides the immense amount which has been paid by way of pension to the soldiers of the war, and the maintenance of the army borne into the union, voluntarily surrendered to the general government, for the common use and benefit, millions of acres of valuable land, already the residence of the owners, and destined to be the residence of countless generations.

Thus, sir, have I shown that, not only by the consent, but by the approbation, contract and agreement of the north, slavery was not only recognized and secured by the constitution, but incorporated into the very political existence of the government—incorporated in the representation on this floor—political power given to it, in the very election of the executive, and, through him, into the election of all the military, civil and other officers of the general government; for every officer of government, before he can discharge any duty of his office, is first bound to take an oath to support the institutions of slavery as it exists, because he is bound to take an oath to support the constitution. It is incorporated, too, in the taxing power of congress; and congress would violate the constitution, and its laws would be a violation of the constitution, if it did not levy direct taxes upon the slaves of the states, as there provided. The slightest infraction of this fundamental article of the constitution would shackle a state from all liability, and resolve it into its original unqualified sovereignty.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another view of the subject, upon which I will, at this time, say a word: At the time of the adoption of the constitution, slavery existed in almost all the states. Vermont declared, in her constitution of 1777, there should be no slavery within her limits. New Hampshire, Connecticut and Rhode Island did the same in 1784. In Massachusetts, in the first action, involving the right of a slave which came before the supreme judicial court, after the establishment of the constitution, the judges declared, by virtue of the first article of the declaration of rights, slavery in the state was no more.

In New York, by an act for the gradual abolition of slavery, all children born of slaves subsequent to the 4th of July, 1779, were declared to be free, but to continue servants to the owners of their mothers—males till the age of 28, and females till the age of 25; and by an act of the 31st of March, 1816, every male, mulatto or mixed blood, in the state, born before the 4th of July, 1799, it was declared should, from and after the 4th of July, 1827, be free.

In Pennsylvania, by the act for the gradual abolition of slavery, passed on the 1st of March, 1780, every person who at the time was a slave was to remain a slave, unless his owner omitted to register him on or before the 1st day of November then next ensuing. Children born after the passage of the act, were born free, subject, however, to the same arrival till the age of 25; and the issue of such children could not be held to any servitude.

In New Jersey various laws have passed for the gradual abolition of slavery; but, according to the census of 1830, there were, at that time, in the state no less than two thousand two hundred and forty-six slaves.

Now, sir, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, did any member from the north move and carry any proposition in the convention authorizing congress to abolish slavery within its territory or within the limits of the influence of the constitution? Did Pennsylvania, New York, or any other northern state, then or since, ever call on congress to abolish slavery within its limits and jurisdiction? Slavery has been abolished—gradually abolished, mark ye—in nearly all the states north of Maryland, but was the power of congress invoked? Did not the general voice of the people call on their state authorities? and was not abolition effected by the action of their state legislatures? And the legislation of the non-slaveholding states demonstrates that they regarded the question of slavery as one of state jurisdiction alone; and every fact which I have given, goes far in illustration of that provision of the constitution which declares that the powers not delegated to the federal government by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states, respectively, or to the people.

But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the legislation of state and every state in reference to the abolition of slavery shows that it has always been considered a question of state jurisdiction; notwithstanding some of the abolitionists here and elsewhere disclaim all pretence of power in congress to abolish slavery in the states, they yet concede that full, ample and absolute power is given to congress over the question in this District, by the grant of power contained in the eighth section of the first article of the constitution. They have rung the changes upon the terms used in the clause referred to, and said much about the phrase "to exercise such legislative power in all cases whatsoever over such District;" they have argued that this gave congress ample, unlimited, absolute power of legislation over the question here. I still answer some of these arguments presently, but I would observe that there is one part which all the learned commentators seem entirely to have overlooked. They tell you that you have full and ample power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and only ask you to exercise your authority where you have jurisdiction. This District there are about 6,000 slaves, and it cannot be that the energies of the whole body of abolitionists are directed to no other object than the emancipation of so small a portion of the slave population of the country. No, sir. Valued among the states in this District, the slaveholders here have little hope to break through the constitutional barriers: their only hope is to steal in at some loophole; and, with this view, they would persuade an assumption of power, under the plausible pretext that congress has jurisdiction over the District, legislation has been given to congress in all cases whatsoever over this District. I have gone into the history of the origin of slavery in this country, of its institution both before and under the constitution, of the legislation in the states upon the subject, in order to show that congress can exercise no legitimate authority to abolish slavery in any of the states where it now exists, or where it existed at the time of the adoption of the constitution. If this doctrine be sustained by the constitution and the supporters here admit it—then must all their arguments fail, which go to establish the power of congress to abolish slavery in this District under the eighth section of the first article of the constitution; because, whatever power congress can exercise over this District, they may exercise in any and every other part of this country, in any and every state in this union; and to prove this, we have only to read the language of the constitution itself, when it declares that congress shall have power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular states, and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of the government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over the District or districts which may, by the cession of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings."

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, about the protection of local legislatures over such District; but, sir, a territory over which congress could exercise separate and exclusive jurisdiction was not sought for the purpose of establishing a utopia or an oligarchy, but that congress might have an established seat of government independent alike of the influence and state favor of any government where they could exercise an exclusive jurisdiction in all matters of police for their personal protection. The proceedings of the old congress show distinctly that such was the object; and in the course of the debate at the close of the revolution to save the deliberations of congress by threat and mutinous excitement, which proved how little protection could be expected from state authorities alone, no doubt contributed greatly to the inclusion of the clause in the constitution which gave to congress the exclusive legislation over the seat of government. On the 7th of October, 1783, a resolution was passed providing "that buildings for the use of congress be erected on or near the banks of the Delaware, provided a suitable district can be procured on or near the banks of the said river for a feudal town, and that the right of soil, and exclusive or such other jurisdiction as congress may direct, shall be vested in the United States."

On the 21st of the same month, 1783, another resolution was passed, preceded by the words—

"Whereas there is reason to expect that the providing buildings for the alternate residence of congress in two places will be productive of the most salutary effects, by securing the mutual confidence and friendship of the states."

"Resolved, That buildings be provided for the use of congress at or near the lower falls of the Potomac or Georgetown, provided a suitable district on the banks of the river can be procured for a federal town, and the right of soil and exclusive jurisdiction over such other as congress may direct, shall be vested in the United States."

Such were the views entertained by the old congress, such the considerations which influenced the convention which framed the constitution, and such the understanding of the people of the several states when they accepted, ratified and confirmed the constitution. The jurisdiction was intended to be made so exclusive as to prevent conflict between federal and state authority in municipal laws and regulations, and to give to congress all the power, and none other, which should be indispensably necessary for its own protection, and to render all the departments and officers of the federal government entirely independent of state authority.

It must also be recollected that the place was designated in the constitution as the seat of government; the convention only thought it expedient to specify the limits and extent, and the character of the legislation, leaving its location to depend upon the cession of particular states, and the acceptance of congress. It will also be recollected, that there was great rivalry among the states as to the point to be selected.

The journal of the old congress will show that, from the 28th of July, 1788, up to 13th of September, 1788, the subject of determining with respect to the place for the seat of government, and the new constitution was continually under discussion, and gave rise to many motions and much debate; the relative advantages of New York, Hudson, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Lancaster, Baltimore, Annapolis, and other places, were presented in great detail and earnestness. After congress had assembled under the constitution, the bill for locating a district of territory, not exceeding ten miles square, on the Potomac, "between the mouths of the eastern branch and Conococheague," which originated in the senate, passed that body by a vote of fourteen to twelve, and in the house was the subject of much discussion. Four distinct propositions were made in the shape of amendments, to change the seat of the federal district, by motion to strike out "the Potomac," and insert some other place:

1st. "To substitute the Delawares instead of Potomac"—ayes 22, noes 29.

2d. "In the State of Pennsylvania, including Germantown"—ayes 22, noes 29.

3d. "Between the Susquehanna and Potomac"—ayes 23, noes 36.

4th. "State of Maryland, including Baltimore"—ayes 26, noes 34.

Now, can any man of rational mind believe that the representation from Maryland would have voted in favor of establishing the seat of government at Baltimore, or its legislature would have offered Annapolis for such a purpose, if they had, for a single instant, thought or believed that congress would possibly establish a seat of government in the very centre of the state? Can any rational mind believe that Maryland would have recognised or sanctioned such an interpretation, or allowed the general government to hold its seat in the centre of its state, armed with such antagonistic powers against her peace and interests? I think it impossible to doubt a moment in saying that she never would. What can be the difference, whether the powers now claimed for congress be exercised in the centre of the state, or on the borders of the state? If the power of congress to abolish slavery could not have been allowed at Baltimore, it cannot be at Washington. That part of the District north of the southern bank of the Potomac was as much a part of Maryland as Baltimore. If it cannot be inferred from any thing which has occurred at the adoption of the constitution, as a contemporaneous interpretation of that instrument, that it was admitted that congress had the power to abolish slavery within the limits of any state in which it existed, who can resist the inference and draw the conclusion, that the letter, the spirit, and philosophy of the constitution totally deny the assumption of such power by congress? And no lapse of time can enlarge the powers of congress without an alteration of the constitution itself. There is no where in the constitution, any power given to congress to abolish slavery; yet this power is attempted to be drawn from the constitution by implication. Gentlemen admit that congress cannot intermeddle with the institution of slavery in any portion of the union when it exists at the time of the adoption of the constitution. It did exist, and does exist, in that portion of Maryland and Virginia which became the seat of government; yet, in the absence of all expressed or implied power, they would have congress alter the institution of slavery in the whole of Maryland and slave. If it was intended to have given congress the power, the convention omitted to express it, and, having failed so to express it, the omission denies the right of jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, in considering these features of one constitution, I am forcibly reminded with the analogy, which the whole instrument bears, in many respects, to the articles of union between England and Scotland, adopted by the parliament of both those kingdoms in 1707.

Article 3d declares—

"The United Kingdom shall be represented by one parliament."

The 1st section of the 1st article of the constitution of the United States provides—

"That all legislative powers herein granted, shall be vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives."

Article 4th declares—

"There shall be no privileges of nobility, or titles of nobility, except when it is otherwise agreed."

The 2d section, 4th article of the constitution of the United States, provides—

"The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states."

Article 9th declares—
"When England raises £2,000,000 by a land tax, Scotland shall raise £8,000."

8th and 24th article 1st of the constitution of the United States provide, that—

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which may be included within this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

Article 18th declares—
"The laws relating to trade, customs and excises, shall be the same in Scotland as in England. But all the other laws of Scotland shall remain in force, but alterable by the parliament of Great Britain; yet, with those laws relating to public policy, are alterable at the discretion of the parliament. Laws relating to private rights are not to be altered but for the evident utility of the people of Scotland."

The 2d section of the 6th article of the constitution of the United States provides, that—

"This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

Article 1st, section 8th of the constitution declares, that—

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes."

The 5th article of the amendments provides, that—
"No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

The 9th article provides, that—
"The enumeration in this constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

The 10th amendment declares—
"The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited to the states, are reserved to the states, respectively, or to the people."

Article 22d of the union states—

"Sixteen peers are to be chosen to represent the peerage of Scotland in parliament, and forty five members to sit in the house of commons."

Section 3d, 1st article of the constitution declares, that—

"The senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state," &c. &c.
Section 3d of the same article, as quoted, prescribes the representation in the house of representatives.

Upon these articles of union of England and Scotland, Sir William Blackstone remarks:

"These are the principles of the twenty five articles of union, which are ratified and confirmed by 8th Anne, chap. 8, in which statute there are also two acts of parliament recited, the one of Scotland, whereby the church of Scotland, and also the two universities of that kingdom, are established forever, and all succeeding sovereigns are to take an oath invariably to maintain the same; the other of England, 3d Anne, chap. 6, whereby the acts of union, of 12th Elizabeth, and of the 6th Charles II., in conformity to the same had been altered by parliament at that time) and all others then in force, to the preservation of the church of England, are declared perpetual; and it is stipulated, that the acts of union, and queen Anne's act, shall invariably to maintain the same within England, Ireland, Wales and the town of Berwick upon Tweed. And it is enacted that these two shall forever be considered as fundamental and essential conditions of the union."

And he continues:

"Upon these articles and acts of union, it is to be observed, that the two kingdoms are now so inseparably united that nothing can be done by the legislature, unless, perhaps, an infringement of those points which, when they were separated and independent nations, it was mutually stipulated shall be 'fundamental and essential conditions of the union.'"

Will not these remarks of the great jurist apply upon the constitution and laws of England apply with equal force to the constitution of the United States? If an infringement of the fundamental and essential conditions of union would dissolve two kingdoms, would the same dissolution necessarily follow the state of Maryland? Sir, I repeat, that, at the adoption of our constitution, slavery not only existed, but was acknowledged, and, as a prominent and fundamental principle, was incorporated into the very fabric of the government; and any meddling with it now would be an infringement of "the essential conditions of the union." But the institution of slavery, whether right or wrong, does not owe its existence or continuance to the constitution: it is above and independent; pre-existing and beyond that instrument, though sanctioned and guaranteed by it. And I maintain that slavery, having pre-existed—having been recognized, adopted and guaranteed by the constitution—no although of fraud or pretended humanity can, for specious purposes, seize upon the property of any citizen, whether in a slave or non-slaveholding state; nor can alter the then existing or future rights of the citizen, or violate the solemn compact entered into by these states, and thereby jeopardizing the integrity of the union. Considering the question wholly by the constitution, and that instrument solely and strictly by its letter, will gentlemen contend that congress has power to legislate in this matter exclusively over the District? But, by the same instrument, congress is in part a representative of slaves. The constitution, recognizing and providing for the representation of slaves, requires, in the appointment, that every five slaves shall be equal to three freemen. If the framers of the constitution had such horror of slavery as is ascribed at the north now, why did they allow to it that representation, or even to give it representation on this floor? The answer is a plain one. In the first place, the constitution was a matter of concession and compromise to effect a perfect union; and, in the second place, to effect this union, that instrument solely and strictly by its letter, knowledge as a fundamental and essential principle, but to be guaranteed and secured against all interference, by giving to it, as property, political power. By the constitution, then, slavery is recognized and protected in its nature. Will you be governed by the constitution, or will you assume powers not delegated, because a few self-righteous men to the north, thinking themselves wiser than their ancestors, fancy they can abolish such parts of the constitution as may not suit their present views or interests?

But, Mr. Speaker, the third section of the sixth article of the constitution declares that "the senators and representatives" ("of the several states, and the members of the several state legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States, and of the several states, shall be bound by an oath or affirmation to support this constitution." With this, then, in view, and the provisions of the constitution; with slavery recognized, guaranteed, incorporated into that instrument, how can gentlemen reconcile it to themselves to vote for the abolition of an institution which they have sworn to support? How can they do this, while advocating abolition petitions, which would have them violate their solemn oath of office? Do the abolitionists require the members of this house to leave easy and pleasant consciences, to be mouldered against the prejudices or caprices of fanaticism? Under this constitutional requirement of an oath of office, it matters not what may be the local legislation of the states, the rights of the slaveholder are guaranteed most amply and most fully; and this doctrine has been recognized by the most solemn decisions of the highest court in several of the non-slaveholding states, particularly Pennsylvania, New York and Massachusetts. These doctrines, to the high credit of the judiciary, show that the constitution is as binding upon the legislatures, or sectional views of policy. I have not time to cite many of the cases alluded to; but I beg the indulgence of the house to read from one which, in 1823, Congress, by the commission of errors of New York, had constituted of the chief justice of the senate, chancellor of state, judges of the supreme court and all the senators, wherein the chancellor declared:

"If the person whose services are claimed is in fact a fugitive from servitude, under the laws of another state, the constitutional provision is imperative that he shall be delivered up to his master upon claim made; and any state officer or private individual who attempts to allege that the claimant has taken the usual oath to support the constitution thereof, cannot, without incurring the moral guilt of perjury, do any act to deprive the master of his right of recapture, when there is no doubt that the whole case is clearly established in fact the slave of the claimant. However much, therefore, we may deplore the existence of slavery in any part of the union, as a national as well as local evil, yet, as the right of the master to reclaim his fugitive slave is secured to him by the federal constitution, no good citizen, whose liberty and property are protected by that constitution, will interfere to prevent this provision from being carried into effect according to its spirit and letter; and even when the forms of law are resorted to for the purpose of evading the constitutional provision, or to delay the remedy of the master in obtaining a return of his fugitive slave, it is undoubtedly the right, and may become the duty, of the court in which any proceedings for that purpose are instituted, to set them aside, if they are not commenced and carried on in good faith and upon probable grounds of believing that the claim of the master to the services of the supposed slave, is in fact a claim to the services of a free man."

Mr. Speaker, an impartial interpreter of the constitution will not mark the particular passage which alludes to the ten miles square; but he will look at the whole instrument, and examine into its meaning, and he will be bound to make them harmonize if they will agree. Can a construction be given to that part which relates to the ten miles square which shall empower congress to abolish slavery, without overthrowing and obliterating that part which recognizes slavery, which provides for its representation and taxation under certain circumstances, or which prohibits congress from interfering with private property, and secures its recapture, if it should be driven from the owner, in the District of Columbia? What novice in law, or who is so little skilled in the interpretation of contracts, but will say that you must make all parts of an instrument agree if it is possible; or, if the various clauses are inconsistent, you must select the plain and obvious meaning of the writing? The construction which the gentlemen give who advocate the cause of the abolitionists would blot out every part which recognizes, provides for, or guarantees slavery, and would change the whole representation in congress and vary the apportionment of direct taxation. Again, sir: How can you reconcile the power of congress to abolish slavery with the prohibition not to interfere with the constitution? It is not only by the laws of the states, but under the constitution itself, are recognized as property. The doctrine of the abolitionists supersedes difficulty to difficulty, without in a fair and just interpretation of the constitution it is a simple and plain perfect, and have full scope and influence.

I have already shown, from concurring circumstances and the plain reading of the legislation at the time of the constitution, that the framers of the constitution, in requiring a certain territory to be established as the seat of government for the United States.

They desired a distinct and separate place, for the seat of the confederating society, but to keep it as it was—where there should be no fear of civil commotions—no popular threatening of the deliberations—an interruption of their proceedings, and no other control or legislation to govern their officers, servants and slaves. The slaveholders, therefore, thousands employed by the government—officers, public agents, clerks and laborers upon the public buildings. Had Maryland or Virginia jurisdiction, the whole business of the government might be stopped or delayed at the pleasure of either. Owing allegiance to the state, every man might be called away to serve on jury or to perform militia duty; as it is, exclusive legislation belonging to congress, our legislation can control the actions of all persons employed by the government. I admit, sir, that the seat of government might have been established upon the public domain; and slavery, to a certain extent, might have been prohibited where it did not previously exist; but to abolish it, without the aid of the constitution, would have been to select a place where slavery did exist, and it was not then pretended that slavery was either a moral, social or political evil. If they thought so they did not express the opinion, nor the sentiment, and they did not express the sentiment upon such conviction. Experience has shown that, by the existence of slavery in this District, neither the legislation of congress nor the operations of the government have been impeded. It has shown, that slavery can exist in the District of Columbia, and that that provision which made slaves taxable property could be carried into effect.

But, sir, there is another view of this subject which has been slightly alluded to, but which, I think, has not been sufficiently enlarged. Granting that there was nothing implied or secured by the silence on the question of slavery at the adoption of the constitution, did congress take, or could this government have taken, in this District, certain limitations and reservations? Must not congress neither do, nor could. Slavery existed here: the right to regulate or abolish it belonged to Maryland or Virginia, within the limits of their respective jurisdictions. And the question was settled by the adoption of the constitution. While Maryland and Virginia held jurisdiction, slavery might have been abolished by acts of legislation, operating over all parts of each state respectively; but neither state could, by partial legislation, have abolished slavery in any particular section or district of its territory; nor could they, by a cession of jurisdiction to any other authority, have impaired or put in jeopardy the rights secured to the citizens of each state, not only by the constitution of each respective state, but by the constitution of the United States. But, waiving all these considerations, did the states of Maryland and Virginia give up a portion of their territory to the admitted and absolute jurisdiction of congress? Read the acts of cession and you will find they did not. They were willing to cede a portion of their territory, not, resting the rights of the citizens of such ceded territory on the provisions of the constitution alone, but, by express reservation, in the articles of cession, they devolved the power to congress to interfere with the right of property.

The act of cession from the state of Virginia declares—

"That a tract of country, not exceeding ten miles square, or any less quantity, to be located within the limits of this state, and in any part thereof as congress may by law direct, shall be, and the same is hereby, forever ceded and relinquished to the congress and government of the United States, in full and absolute right, and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of the government of the United States, provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States."

The act of cession from the state of Maryland declares—

"That all that part of the said territory called Columbia, which lies within the limits of this state, shall be, and the same is hereby, acknowledged to be forever ceded and relinquished to the congress and government of the United States, in full and absolute right, and exclusive jurisdiction, as well of soil as of persons residing or to reside thereon, pursuant to the tenor and effect of the eighth section of the first article of the constitution of the government of the United States; provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed to vest in the United States any right of property in the soil, or to affect the rights of individuals therein, otherwise than the same shall or may be transferred by such individuals to the United States; and provided, also, That the jurisdiction of the laws of this state, over the persons and property of individuals residing within the limits of the cession aforesaid, shall not cease or be determined until congress shall, by law, provide for the government thereof, under their jurisdiction, in manner provided by the article of the constitution before recited."

Such are the articles of cession. Now let it also be borne in mind, that the seat of government could not have been established, nay, congress could not even have assembled in any state where slavery existed, without the consent and sanction of that state; and these articles of cession must be regarded, not only as limitations upon the powers of congress, but as compacts and treaties between high contracting parties.* These articles of cession are, in fact, paramount to the constitution, in as much, that the constitution could not have gone into effect, without their sanction. The articles of cession were made under the sanction of the constitution by three high sovereign parties—sovereign and independent within their respective spheres, and qualified and competent to enter into compact. These parties were Maryland, Virginia, and the general government. Now, sir, for nearly forty years the general government has existed here, and slavery has existed here; the local law which governs here, with but slight variation, is the law which existed here before the compact was formed; the rights which that law gave, and the obligations which it was intended to enforce, were recognised and declared to be in force before the government was established here, and have been recognised ever since. No inference, therefore, has been made that the existence of slavery here has procured the slightest inconvenience or danger to any department of the government; but, on the contrary, so convenient have the services and labor of slaves been found, that, by acts of congress, the sale of slaves resident in Maryland and Virginia have been authorised to bring them here; and, by another act of congress, passed 21st June, 1812, as if to give increased value and security to such kind of property, it is expressly declared:

"That hereafter it shall be lawful for any inhabitant or inhabitants in either of said counties, owning and possessing any slave or slaves therein, to remove the same from one county into the other, and to exercise freely and fully all the rights of property in and over the said slave or slaves there; and no slave shall be exercised over him, her or them, in the county from whence the removal was made, any thing in any legislative act in force at this time, in either of the said counties, to the contrary notwithstanding."

Yet, after all this, a new reading is to be given to the constitution, and new powers are to be exercised by congress. Will congress assume power by implication? Will you say that the clause of the constitution giving power to legislate exclusively over these ten miles square, allows congress to establish a despotism here, to trample on the rights of the citizens of this District, and to establish here a citadel of abolition, from which predatory incursions may be made upon the institutions of neighboring states; that by this means you may interfere with the rights of property and the rights of the citizens of the District of Columbia, but with those existing in the close contiguity of Maryland and Virginia? Nay, more; that, by so doing, you jeopard the peace and security of the people here and in those states, and yet that Maryland and Virginia have no right to condemn and disavow such legislation as an usurpation and a violation of the compact, both expressed and implied? Have not Maryland and Virginia the same right to construe by implication what they surrender to congress, with the rights of property and the rights of the citizens of this District, as you have? Then, to avoid all collision, is it not due that congress to refrain from all attempts to assume powers not expressly delegated? And is not any attempt on the part of congress to exercise a power not delegated, an usurpation of a direct invasion of the constitution? If, sir, congress has not been invested by the constitution, nor by the articles of cession, with the power now pretended to, of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, it is the bounden duty of Maryland and Virginia to interfere, should the federal government ever attempt to exercise such power. Every state in the union would be called upon to protect the constitution from infraction, but it would be the especial duty of Maryland and Virginia to see that the rights of the children should not be trampled upon. Already has the voice of Maryland been raised upon this question; she has declared, with almost unprecedented unanimity, that you have no jurisdiction over the subject of slavery; that she never intended to give you such jurisdiction, and that if you attempt to exercise such powers it will be a violation of the compact; that the compact will become a dead letter; and that she will reassert her original jurisdiction over all that part of the ten miles square which lies north of the southern bank of the Potomac.

In the session of the general assembly of Maryland, 1837, Mr. Joseph S. Cottman, a gentleman of ability, submitted, in his place in the senate, the following resolutions, an account of which he has furnished since:

"By the senate, February 18, 1837."

"WHEREAS, A communication from the executive of this state was yesterday received, enclosing certain resolutions passed by the general assembly of Vermont, and requesting that the executive of this state to his excellency the governor of this state, with a request that the same be laid before the legislature, which resolutions are in the following words, viz:

"Resolved, by the general assembly of the state of Vermont, That neither congress nor the state governments have any constitutional right to abridge the free expression of opinions, or the transmission of them through the public mail."

"Resolved, That congress do possess the power to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia."

"Resolved, That his excellency the governor, be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing resolutions to the executive of each of the states, and to each of our senators and representatives in congress."

"And whereas respect and courtesy are due to all communications from the executive of Maryland:—

Therefore, Resolved, by the general assembly of Maryland, That neither congress nor the state governments have any constitutional right to indulge in the expression of opinions, or the transmission of them through the public mail," as so to enlarge the rights of the states, or to interfere with the rights of individuals, or to interfere with the domestic institutions of any of the states of this union."

"Resolved, That congress does not possess the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; and, in the opinion of this legislature, the abolition of slavery in said District by congress, would be a violation of the terms and conditions upon which the cession of the District of Columbia was made to the federal government; and, in the event of such violation, the territory included in said District, ought, and of right will, revert respectively to the states of Maryland and Virginia."

"Resolved, That his excellency the governor, be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing resolutions to the executive of each of the states, and to each of our senators and representatives in congress."

"For the above resolutions, Mr. Bowie offered the following as a substitute, which was read and negatived."

"Resolved by the general assembly of Maryland, That the communication from the governor of Vermont, covering certain resolutions of that state, in relation to the power of congress over the rights of slaveholders in the District of Columbia, and the transmission of incendiary proceedings through the mail, be not received, the same being an offensive interference with the domestic relations and private property of citizens, over whom the legislature of Vermont has no control. And that his excellency, the governor of Maryland, be requested to return the same to the executive of Vermont."—Maryland annual journal, session 1836, page 176.

"On the 20th of February, the resolutions were again taken up, and the following amendments were, on motion of Mr. Brown, assented to:

"Strike out the words 'as as,' 5th line 1st resolution, and insert 'and'."

"After the word 'be,' 4th line 2nd resolution, strike out the letter 'a,' and insert 'resolution, to the understanding and intention of all the high contracting parties, if not in.'"

"Same resolution, 9th line, after the word 'negatived,' strike out the word 'and,' and in the same line strike out the word 'will' and insert the word 'ought.'"

"The following amendment, on motion of Mr. Bowie, was assented to:

"Strike out in the second resolution all after the word 'government,' 7th line, to the end of the resolution."—Ibid, page 173.

"On the question of engrossing for a third reading, the first was passed nem. con. and the second was ordered to be engrossed, with one (Mr. Talbott) in the negative. Mr. Talbott, in his remarks, asserted that congress had not the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, made a motion expressing his views, which was negatived without a division."

"The preamble and resolutions were then read the third time, by special order, and assented to—(Ib. p. 184), and were sent to the house of delegates.—Page 185.

"These resolutions were received by the house of delegates while the new constitution was under discussion, and were never, in consequence, acted on. House journal, session 1836, p. 354."

Such are the opinions, and such the declared intentions, of one of the high contracting parties, and such will be her course, whenever a majority in congress shall be so reckless as to violate the rights of property in this District. But the general assembly of Maryland did not stop here; at the same session, they had under consideration an alteration of the constitution of the state; and as, at this very time, the abolitionists were trying to effect a similar revolution in the south, by insidiously circulating their inflammatory tracts and addresses, the legislature deemed it expedient to engraft a new provision upon the organic law, to the following effect:

"That the relation of master and slave in this state shall not be abolished, unless a bill so to abolish the same shall be passed by a unanimous vote of the members of each branch of the general assembly, and shall be published at least three months before the new relation of master and slave is confirmed by a unanimous vote of the members of each branch of the general assembly, at the next regular constitutional session, after such new election; nor then, without full compensation to the master for the property of the slave so to be thereby deprived."

Such are the opinions of the people of Maryland, and such the safe guards which they have thrown around their property. Such, too, are the fruits of abolitionist excitement. It has forced Maryland to stand firm upon her rights; to restrict her former privileges to her colored population by more rigid laws. The abolitionists have prolonged the time of abolition of slavery in Maryland at least a century beyond the period at which it might otherwise gradually and quietly have terminated. They have placed it beyond the reach of legislation, and, from the restriction, is equivalent, for the clause in the state constitution which I have quoted never

*"The operation of the constitution must, of necessity, be like that of a treaty of cession by a foreign state to the United States. The act of cession is the title to power or property according to its terms, operating by gift or grant or purchase, or by contract."

will be altered. The abolitionists have forgot that the people of Maryland to tie them up with a Gordian-knot, which the sword of no Alexander can cut in twain. Yet, sir, no state, not even the loudest and noisiest about abolition, has done so much as Maryland towards emancipation and the annihilation of the cotton of the African race. Her early statutes protected them from any possible inhuman treatment, and authorised their manumission. And at a later period, with unflinching liberality, she has founded a colony in Africa, at the expense of some two hundred thousand dollars of her people's money. She has done all this with limited means—with no parade or ostentation of humanity; and her whole people have approved the legislation. With this evidence of the unanimity of the people of Maryland, will any one doubt their unanimity in defence of their rights, and the rights of that portion of the territory which she conditionally surrendered to the general government? It is true that the delegation of Maryland on this floor, has not been as zealous as the representatives of the states further south; and hence, from this forbearance, gentlemen have often, in debate, on former occasions, and two or three members have during this discussion, alluded to the Potomac river as a divisional line, and have endeavored to grow in strength as to require and force a dissolution of the union. Let me tell those members, and all who think with them, that the courage of Maryland has always been true when required, although she boasts but seldom about it; and that she has never been in her position so anxiously to vapour. She knows

"When valor preys on reason,
It cuts the sword if fights with."

Those removed afar from danger, may display their theoretical prowess without the possibility of its being called into requisition; and, perhaps, if the danger were greater or nearer, their courage might be less. Those who are in the front rank will not flourish their hats or their sabres in the air in vain-boastings; those in the rear may, when they know the strong columns in front shield them from harm. The steady gaze of the eye of the brave, the well-weighed adversary's intent, the calm judgment of the mind, which teaches the arm to aim the blow aright, and the suppressed voice broken the courage of those whom it were fearful to meet in hostile conflict. Let me tell gentlemen from the south, who designate the Potomac as a dividing line, that if aggression upon Maryland comes from the south, then are they correct; for then will she meet them on her southern border, and then will the bright waters of the beautiful river of swans' swans' emblem with the deepest dye, and the blood of her people be the death fight and its agony. But let me tell gentlemen from the south and from the north, that if the rights of Maryland are attempted to be invaded from the north, Maryland will be ready to meet it on its further border, and will erect a wall as firm as a Chinese wall on Mason and Dixon's line with their bodies, and when the last man falls, the barrier of their bodies will be a rampart behind which those further south may fight with full protection and security. But I will dismiss from my mind such imaginings, which are more speculative than possible; for I trust such a time will never come, and I am so anxious to hasten it by imaginary apprehensions. Maryland is the heart of the union, and I hope she will ever remain so.

Mr. Speaker, having shown that congress has no power to interfere with the question of slavery or the slave trade between any of the states, territories or districts of the United States, in which it existed at the time of the adoption of the constitution, I might rest my argument here; but, as the constitution, from the foregoing premises, that the people of the United States have no right to petition congress on the subject, for it has been conceded on all sides of the house that we should not entertain petitions on any question over which the state has no jurisdiction; but as the question of the right of petition has been elaborated with great ability by many gentlemen who have spoken on both sides of the question, I will trespass a little while longer, in order to present one or two views of the question which have been omitted by the able gentlemen who have preceded me.

There is no gentleman on this floor who can hold the right of petition in great respect than the individual who has the honor to address you; no one who would go further than myself to protect it in its just and legitimate exercise; and no one who so solemn and valuable rights, which, to be useful, valuable and sacred, must be under wise and proper restraints. What right that is sacred to the people and essential to liberty, that has not its restraints? The freedom of speech is, yet, it is essential to liberty as the right of petition; yet, it is not debate in this tangle of liberty, this hall of freedom, checked, restrained, and justly so, by legitimate purposes. The "freedom of speech" is another sacred constitutional right, but it has its restraints, and he who abuses that sacred privilege is amenable to the law. The "freedom of the press" is as essential to liberty, and more so, than the right of petition; and it is restrained from licentiousness. Liberty itself is synonymous with law, and its truest definition is "the right to do every thing which the law does not forbid." Every right reserved to the people carries restriction upon exercise, and every exercise of power to government itself has a limitation upon its use. Every human power, individual, social, moral or political, has limitations upon its exercise. I care not how broad the grant, how clear the title, how ample the guaranties, how extensive the sphere of its enjoyment. To cause enjoyment, you must preserve harmony; that society may exist, you must lay it under restraints. The laws of society give an individual the right to acquire, possess and enjoy property, but all to be contented with, because it may soil his pleasure or his fancy to beautify his estate by hanging lamps and lights on the trees on his beach, which decay and deceive the mariner by night, his lamps cannot be abated, and he himself prohibited from what to him was innocent pleasure, and the cause of death to others; he might burn down his own dwelling, if he inflicts no injury upon others, and he will only be considered a madman; but should he injure the property of others, he will be held responsible for the mischief, and be punished accordingly. But gentlemen do not furnish this, in the consequences growing out of the doctrine which they advocate. The effect of their reasoning amounts to this, that a man may burn down his neighbor's house, if his construction offended his taste, or his architecture; if a man may burn down his house, be can with impunity set it in flames. Gentlemen defend the right of abolitionists to petition; they debate and protect them in the right; they present their memorials and send abroad their exciting appeals, the appeal to the laws; a man may burn down his house, to fire the zeal and enlist the devotion of the professors of religion; they sow broadcast the seeds of dissension and strife; they aid in lighting the wild fire of civil servile war; they encourage dissension and fanaticism, and kindling their passions and influence to do all this, they tell us to keep cool, they are only defending the right of petition. Sir, what is it but, under the pretext of defending the right of petition, asking us to permit the abolitionists to seize our property, to burn down our houses, with the promise that if we do, they will aid us to recover the one and to extinguish the other? Gentlemen do not anticipate the evils which we know impending; they will not believe that we know our interests and our danger better than they who are removed from it. Once let loose the wild fire of civil and servile war, they will have no power or ability to aid us; our only safety is in the total exclusion of the danger. If, sir, it were written in the constitution, that the people had the right to petition on this subject, I would still advocate a rejection of their petitions unless those petitions contained the sentiments of a majority of the people of the north. Then I would receive them once, and that once only to advocate a dissolution of the union; for I would regard a dissolution of the union as nothing in comparison with the blood and carnage of a civil servile war. I would reject the petitions, because where the exercise of our power would annihilate and destroy all the other powers of the constitution, it would not be duty to do which I should owe to my country. Sworn to support the constitution, I would do so by rejecting or refusing to receive memorials calculated to bring about a dissolution of the union, and the overthrow of the government. If an institution is the enemy of the preservation and the maintenance of itself a clause of self-destruction, I would neglect to observe that clause, and especially when that clause was speculative, theoretical, and made dangerous when made operative—when the exercise of the right would be the cause of evils which would be the means of overthrowing the government. But I need not rest my objections to the reception of abolition petitions upon this consideration. I would here say a few words to those gentlemen who would insist on each state and territory having the unlimited right of the people to petition, and upon its being the foundation of our national liberty and independence. We have been told that it is a sacred right, not only guaranteed by the constitution, but inhering in the nature of the people as the right and heritage of freemen. Let me tell those gentlemen that they are under a delusion, and have not advanced with the age and times in which they live, if they suppose that the only tenure of our liberty depends upon the right to petition upon all questions, whether salutary or mischievous, constitutional or unlawful. In this enlightened age, no man, whose mind is not feeble and his spirit unpoised, can make himself famous like a Sydney or a Hampden, and be cherished as a benefactor and a martyr, for defending abolition memorials on this floor. In the land of constitutional law, a man may gain notoriety by pressing his advocacy to an extreme; but it will be a notoriety which his calmer reason will condemn, and his posterity will blush to acknowledge. In the feudal days of Europe, and especially of England, when the people were allowed but few rights, and for every wrong they suffered no redress, and no service and fight for their king and their bold barons—when all powers were centered in the hands of a king and a few nobles—the right of petition was a boon, and its champion was a patriot. When, by a slow, creeping, intelligible development the powers of the human intellect were unlocked, and the people brought their will and voices to bear directly on the operations of the government.

[TO BE CONCLUDED IN OUR NEXT.]

THE BANK PARTY.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

The partisans of gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren have attempted to fix upon their opponents, the whigs, the designation of the bank party. If by this strange and unwarrantable mode of regulating the banks instead of destroying them, and in favor of a judiciously regulated system of banking, in preference to banks without regulations and without capital, it is not misapplied. But if it is intended to fix upon the whigs as a party, have not the whigs been instrumental in promoting the extravagant increase of bank capital, and bank circulation in the country, it is grossly misapplied. They were for the most part in favor of the confinement of the business of the United States, chiefly on the ground that it operated as a check upon the extravagant and the excessive issues of the local banks, and consequently as a check upon the multiplication of banks in places where the actual wants of business did not demand them, and where the legitimate business of the community was not increased. The bank was destroyed by gen. Jackson and his followers, not on the ground of general hostility to banks, but from a spirit of hostility to that individual bank, from a disposition to favor and promote the increase of local banks, and the specific design of establishing the pet bank system. The consequence has been, as was foreseen, the enormous increase of local banks. The pet bank system soon exploded, to the dismay of its authors, but its mischief is not still exist. Thus has been the result is not matter of opinion and conjecture, but of fact. It is the Jackson and Van Buren administration and their supporters who have been the authors of the excessive increase of banks in the country, and who ought therefore to be called the bank party. In proof of this position we refer you to the following elaborate, and as we believe correct statement, which we copy:

From the Newark Daily Advertiser.

The subjoined tables will be found to contain much valuable information. It exhibits in the first column the number of banks and the authorized capital in the states, territories, &c. on the 1st of January, 1829. The second column shows the number of banks and authorized capital on the 1st of January, 1830. The third column shows the gradual and cautious increase of bank capital from 1829 to 1830, and its boundless and visionary expansion during the seven successive years.

The facts here disclosed must be astounding to every man who has not minutely examined the subject. They show that from 1829 to 1830 the increase of banks throughout the country was only 22, and the increase of capital $7,841,557, while from 1830 to 1837 there were 348 new banks chartered, with $268,125,800 capital.

The second table, No. II, exhibits the predominant party in the various state legislatures, territories, &c., during the period from 1830 to 1837, when the 348 new banks were created, as referred to in the first table. The legislatures of the territories being subject to the control of the national administration, in the regulation of its policy, the governor of each territory being appointed by the president, &c., and congress being the local legislature of the District of Columbia, they are properly classed with the party in power.

By an enumeration of the legislatures of the various states, it will be found that in 1818 were Jackson and Van Buren, 3 Calhoun, and 40 anti-Jackson or whigs.

It is proper to observe that, although the legislatures of some of the states were anti-Jackson during the period from 1830 to 1837, still it was not unusual that they should have been influenced by the prevailing policy of the general government for creating state banks to supply the revenue occasioned by the veto of the U. States bank, thus aiding the formation of that league of depositors or pet banks which president Jackson proposed to substitute for the United States bank and its branches. These anti-Jackson legislatures, although their doings slightly affected the general result, merely adapted themselves to the policy prescribed by our national rulers, and should be regarded in the same light as the opponents of the administration of Messrs. Monroe and John Q. Adams, neither being accountable when the reins of government and the moulding of measures were out in the hands of their political friends. It is worthy of especial remark that in New Jersey, from 1830 to 1837, the whigs were in power but one year, viz: the legislature which was elected in 1832, and held its principal session in January and February, 1833. No bank was chartered by the whig legislature: the whole number of banks being 8, and the increased capital amounting to $5,458,000, were authorised by Jackson and Van Buren legislatures.

The third table, No. III., is a condensation of the statistics furnished by the first two, exhibiting in addition the precise number of banks chartered and capital authorised by each of the political parties through the legislature, in which they respectively had the ascendancy.

It thus appears that by the Jackson and Van Buren party 224 banks were chartered, with an authorised capital of $205,650,615, while their opponents created 121 banks, with a capital of only $62,478,285, or less than one-third. The banks of the latter being institutions of moderate capital, designed for local convenience where the veto of the U. S. bank had deprived the people of the facilities for their commercial operations which they had previously enjoyed.

In consequence of this inordinate increase of banking capital, together with the strong injunctions of the president and his secretary of the treasury to the banks to be liberal in their discounts, the ratio of their paper circulation to their specie, which had previously been about 3 to 1, was so enlarged as to be in the proportion of more than 6 to 1, until finally their issues became too great for redemption.

Speculation, by reason of the increased facilities for borrowing money, and the unnatural and delusive value given to property by an inflated paper circulation, the suspension of the banks, and the derangement of the currency, with the destruction of the credit system, have been the inevitable consequences of the experiments of the present and late administration. Having originated the modern banking system, with all its disastrous influence, they now, with a ruthless and destructive spirit, (unnatural, because directed against their offspring,) endeavor to determine the whole basis upon which sound banks and credit are founded, by abstracting, through the operations of the sub-treasury scheme, all the specie from the institutions of the people, and pilage it of the vaults of the national treasury, thereby depriving hard money for the government and officeholders, and irredeemable paper or rags for the people.

The whigs, on the contrary, although strongly condemning the departure from the good old-fashioned system of finance which existed prior to the present administration, and especially deprecating the vast multiplication of banks and bank capital, still in the course of the party in power, nevertheless regard the banks as institutions authorized by law. And, as many innocent and unprotected individuals have made investments in them, and as they have become incorporated to a considerable extent with the business and interests of the people, it becomes their duty, as it will be their pleasure, to restore the currency, and to regulate the banking system, as they were in those good old times when rulers of their race were in power—influencing a mild and paternal spirit in their measures, and adopting that pious conservative sentiment, "preserve and regulate, but not destroy."

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS AND GEN. JACKSON. The hon. John Quincy Adams has recently been unanimously nominated for re-election to congress by the whigs of his district. In his reply to the letter asking his acceptance, he says:

"From the first organization of the government of the U. States under their present constitution, until very recently, a sense of decorum universally prevailing, has forbidden a president of the United States from active or even indirect canvassing of votes for himself, and has alike interdicted the exercise of influence by any preceding president, upon the election of his successor. I have not felt myself at liberty to depart from this rule, and therefore have abstained from attending at any of the public meetings held within the last twelve months, with reference to the approaching presidential election. I have deemed it may duty to leave the people of this union to make up their own minds, upon whom they will confer the honor, and impose the burden of chief magistracy—and in pursuance of the same obligation, I have refrained from addressing my constituents, even by letter, as I had occasionally done before; but which could not have failed at this time to be attributed to the desire of influencing the election of the president, or even to a motive still more selfish and sordid. It is a source of satisfaction to me to perceive that the people in all parts of the union have made up their mind, without needing exhortation or solicitations from me. I am, with great respect, gentlemen, your friend and fellow citizen, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS."

ESCAPE. General Harrison arrived in the city this morning from North Bend in excellent health. A fatal accident occurred to him yesterday, which shows that he is not quite so decrepit as his enemies represent him. He was riding over a part of his farm, through what the tunnel of the Waterway canal passes, in a place where the ground is very soft, and well covered with grass as any other part of the field; and when the horse sinking, and thought he was about to fall, the general sprang from him, alighted upon the firm ground, and the horse fell from 15 to 20 feet into the kind of sink hole, caused by the tunneling beneath. The general escaped without the slightest injury.

THE IRON TRADE. A correspondent of an English paper says—"Sir John Guest is paying £21,000 per month in wages, and he is the only iron master in this country that has erected a public school." The persons employed at the Dowlais works are between 4,000 and 5,000, so that the wages will average about 2s. per week for each person."

METHODISTS IN MICHIGAN. The number of members of the Methodist church in Michigan is 11,463, viz: 11,267 white members, 12 colored, and 87 Indians. The number of ministers 73, and local preachers 116.

A MONTAN made after the model of that which was employed at the siege of Antwerp, and which is destined for the museum of artillery at Brussels, left Antwerp for that city on the 13th ult. It weighs 20,240 lbs. Five shells, weighing 5,000 lbs. were sent with it.

NEWSPAPERS. Seven daily papers are now published at St. Louis, Missouri.

The Empress, with her cargo, principally salt, was valued at $23,000; and capt. Bacon, her commander, never left her till she was cast loose by the ferry boat, and was actually sinking. The Monarch was valued at $10,000, upon which there was insurance to the amount of $25,000. {N. O. Picayune, of the 30th.

STEAMER. The steam packet Acadia, capt. Miller, arrived in Halifax from Boston, on the 31 inst., in a passage of forty-two hours—and sailed on the same day for Liverpool with fifteen additional passengers.

STOCKS. U. S. bank in New York and Philadelphia 65½.

SUGAR CROP. The New Orleans Crescent says the sugar crop in Louisiana will be very large this year.

TEMPERANCE. The day before the election in Ohio, the ministers of the different churches took occasion to enjoin on their several congregations to abstain from all manner of violence. Nearly all the places where liquor was sold were closed on the day of election, and to these efforts are attributed the order observed at the polls.

WEATHER. There was a fall of snow in Frankfort, Kentucky, on the 27th ultimo, which continued several hours. This is rather early for the introduction of winter in that quarter. On the 25th snow fell at Erie, Pennsylvania, to the depth of 6 or 8 inches. It was followed on the 26th and 27th by a pretty stiff freeze; and on the 28th by south wind and rain which soon stripped the earth of its white mantle.

WOOD AND STONE PAVEMENTS. It is found that Oxford street, London, can be paved with Kyanite wood for $21,200; and with smooth granite for $134,400. The street contains a surface of 39,000 square yards.

Necessary to a choice 143.

MAINE. Nine of the remote towns remain yet to be voted on, which in Sept. last, gave altogether only 293 votes, and they were nearly equally divided. The vote so far stands:

For Harrison,	45,664

Majority, 749

The Augusta Age gives returns from nearly all the state, which are for Van Buren 45,234, Harrison 45,835; and the towns to hear from gave Fairfield 185, Kent 118. The Bay State Democrat thinks scattering will probably prevent a choice, and the present Legislature, which is strongly Van Buren, Vol. IX.—Sta. 12.

will be assembled, and choose the Van Buren electors.

VERMONT. The returns so far promise a majority of nearly 15,000 votes for the Harrison ticket.

VIRGINIA. The Richmond Whig states that official returns have been received at the state department from one hundred counties and four towns, which give for Mr. Van Buren 38,209 votes, and for general Harrison 38,587; making a Van Buren majority in these counties of 1,622.

In nineteen counties, from which official returns have not yet been received, the reported majority for Harrison is 217.

Nearly 80,000 votes have been polled—the largest vote, by 30,000, ever taken since the formation of the government. Compared with the poll of 1836, there is an increase in the whig vote, by change and return from coming of age, of about 16,000, whilst the Van Buren vote is increased about 10,000.

NORTH CAROLINA. Returns from sixteen counties give the Harrison ticket a majority of 1,621, and an increase of 800 votes over the aggregate whig majority in the same counties at the August election.

MISSISSIPPI. Reports from thirty-one counties exhibit a whig gain of 2,300 votes over the election of 1839, when governor McNitt had a majority of 3,114; nearly the whole of which majority was received in the twenty-five counties yet to be heard from.

LOUISIANA. The returns, official and unofficial, from all the parishes in this state except Natchitoches, Washita, Claiborne, Union and Caddo, show a Harrison majority of 2,750—being a whig gain since the July election of 1,750. The parishes to be heard from, it is supposed, will reduce this majority from 50 to 100 votes.

TENNESSEE. The Harrison majority in 53 counties this amounts to 14,579 votes.

OHIO. The official returns from all the counties of this state give general Harrison a majority of 23,961 votes. The aggregate vote of the state was 273,824, which were thus thrown (discarding 903, given for Mr. Birney, the abolition candidate):

For Mr. Van Buren,	124,789

ILLINOIS. We have returns from all the counties of this state save ten; but they leave the final issue still in doubt.

MISSOURI. From the returns received, there is no doubt that this state has given an increased majority for Van Buren.

MICHIGAN. The New York Courier has received from a correspondent, returns of the presidential election from all the counties of the state, exhibiting a Harrison majority of 2,704 votes.

THE NEXT CONGRESS.

The Senate is at present constituted as follows: there being five vacancies. The year mentioned at the top shows the date when their respective terms of service expire. Those in italics are Van Buren men.

The senators named in the first column, retire prior to, or simultaneously with, the induction of gen. Harrison into office, by the expiration of their term. Of these seventeen senators, all are Van Buren men except five, whose names are printed in Roman. Of the thirty who hold over, and who will regularly continue in office during the whole or a part of gen. Harrison's administration, 14 are whigs, (their names are printed in Roman), and 16 Van Buren men. One whig senator, Mr. James F. Simmons, of Rhode Island, has been elected within a few days past, for six years from the 4th of March next; leaving 21 to be elected between now and the date just mentioned, either for a full term, or to fill vacancies. Of these it may be expected that at least 11 will be whigs: viz: one from Maine, one from Massachusetts, one from New Jersey, two from Delaware, two from Virginia, two from North Carolina, one from Georgia, one from Kentucky, one from Louisiana, one from Maryland, and one from Michigan. There is a chance also for a whig from Tennessee, instead of Mr. Anderson. But counting only those to be elected by legislatures known to be whig, and leaving the rest for the administration, the account would stand thus:

	Whig.	Van Buren.
Hold over	14	16
R. Island senator elected	1	7
To be elected	29	23

Total 52. Such will probably be the composition of the new senate; giving the whigs a majority of six.

The present house of representatives comprises 118 whigs and 124 Van Buren men. The states above mentioned have elected 83 whigs and 57 Van Buren men to the next congress; and if the remaining states send men of the same politics as before, the house will comprise 135 whigs and 107 Van Buren men; leaving the whigs a majority of 28 in the house, and 14 on joint ballot. The chance is that they will have a larger majority than this, rather than a smaller. [Jour. of Com.]

CHIEF CLERK OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES. The Newport Argus says: "Our late esteemed townsman, and former editor of this paper, Benjamin B. years ago a new die was got up, the coins from which looked so bad that it was broken up.

LAKE HARBORS. The people boarding upon the great lakes, particularly that of Michigan, are preparing for vigorous and immediate action on the subject of harbors. Petitions will be circulated throughout the length and breadth of the territories, strongly urging the matter upon congress, and the necessity of making ample appropriations for their construction. Navigation upon lake Michigan is now nearly over for the season. Shipping merchants have suffered so much in the loss of property and the privations they have so severely felt by our season, that few are prepared to encounter them after October.

[Amr. Sentinel.]

In urging this matter a late number of the Southport (W. T.) Telegraph, says:

One obvious reason why vessels are so little inclined to hazard the navigation of lake Michigan at this season of the year, is the total destitution of harbors, or any place of safety in the event of storms. Between the Manitow islands and Chicago, a distance of 250 miles not a single port or shelter of any kind presents itself, where a steamboat or a vessel can find protection from the violence of the wind and waves.

IMPORTATION OF SILK. We copy the following official report of the importation of silk into the United States during the year 1839-40, from the Journal of the American society:

The importation of silk during the year ending 30th September, 1839, amounted to nearly twenty-three millions of dollars, as will be seen by the following items copied from the report of the secretary of the treasury of the commerce and navigation of the United States for that year, which have been positively sent us by the secretary of the treasury. There is no error in the statement published in the newspapers of upwards of two millions, as compared with the official report; the newspaper report making the amount of silk imported from other places than India and China, $21,256,695; and the official report making the same item $18,655,295.

Silks from India and China, piece goods,	$1,738,509
Do. do. do. sewings,	$6,500
Do. sewings from other places than India,	$18,284
Do. raw silk,	$9,328
Do. from other places than India, &c. lace veils, shawls, shawl,	$45,490
Do. other manufactures from other places than India, &c.	$18,655,295
Manufactures of silk and worsted,	$2,319,884
allowing one-half the value thereof to be silk,	1,159,942

Compared with other articles imported, that of silk is one-fourth more than the amount of any other.—The amount of manufactures of cotton imported, was $14,082,267; of iron, $12,051,686; of cloth and casimere, $7,078,906; worsted stuffs, $7,025,598; other manufactures of wool, $3,567,161; one-half the value of silks and worsted stuffs, $1,169,942; total woolen goods, $18,981,090. The importation of sugar amounted to $9,924,632; linen, $6,721,275. So that the importations of silk nearly equal that of woolen and linen together, and is equal to half of the other fabrics combined. Need we say a word as to the importance of having the immense expenditures to the nation, now that it is established beyond all question that we are more capable of producing the article of silk ourselves than any other country.

TRADE WITH FRANCE. The Baltimore American says: The packet ships for Havre for some time past have been taking quantities of specie from this country to pay our debt to France. The Ville de Lyon, which sailed from New York on Monday, took out $100,000 in coin. The New York Express intimates that three millions of dollars have gone in this way during some few months past.

If it is asked why this amount of specie is thus paid from the country, the answer will be—in pay for the French silks, wines and other luxuries consumed by us. The cost of the silks imported into the United States during the year ending 30th September, 1839, was nearly twenty-three millions of dollars! Most of these came from France.

There are two considerations which present themselves to the mind in view of our commercial intercourse with France. One is the unequal position which the two countries relatively occupy, indicating a total want of reciprocity. French commodities are admitted into our ports almost without duties. Under this system the exports from France to this country have increased with astonishing rapidity. To this excessive liberality on our part there is no corresponding liberality on the part of France. The reverse is the case. While the United States go to one extreme, France goes to the other. We admit her commodities on the most favorable terms; she imposes upon ours the most onerous restrictions. Her duties on American tobacco range from five hundred to eight hundred per cent. and in some cases to this, no competition of buyers is allowed. The government holds the monopoly and is the exclusive purchaser.

Our ministers have remonstrated against this system year after year—and always in vain. Why? Because they have been profited from, and have the only argument that can be available. It is useless to talk of reciprocity—to complain of injustice—to wish the royal monopoly to be profitable and the market in this country continues open to French goods. The French government holds a rich revenue flowing into its treasury from their tobacco duties, and they witness a growing demand for French goods in the United States—why should a change be desirable to France?

Last January in the senate of the United States, Mr. Clay declared his conviction that a duty of 20 per cent. ought to be laid upon French silks. Mr. Buchanan intimated the same thing. When the intelligence of these suggestions,—for they never assumed any bolder form, not being brought before a resolution or referred to a committee,—when the news of these casual intimations reached France, a greater sensation was produced than had been caused by any of the remonstrances of our ministers there. The subject was brought forward by Mr. de Rives. There was no little fluttering among the journals of Paris, and some of them had the candor to declare that such a step on the part of the United States ought to be nothing more than a proper return for the restrictions so long pursued by France. It was not the fault of Gen. Cass that the impression thus created was not followed up and made permanent by the conclusion of some agreement on the subject something like reciprocity. The policy of the administration here at home was opposed to any action on the subject by our government; the hands of our minister were tied. He might talk, but he could not feel warranted to act.

Then, then, stand our relations with France. We receive her silks and wines almost without duty, and when in return we seek admittance for our tobacco she refuses it except under heavy restrictions. The consequence is that specie must go from the United States to pay our French debt.

But are French silks and wines articles of necessity which we cannot do without? This leads us to the second consideration involved in the subject; and in view of it we may see another reason why a change of the subject would be desirable. In buying duties upon these commodities of French production—these articles of luxury; the burden of the duties on them would fall not on the poor but on the wealthy, or on those who might choose, through vanity or love of indulgence, to make use of them. It is important that the wines and silks of France should be made to bear a duty for the two-fold purpose, first, of counteracting a restrictive foreign policy, and secondly because they constitute legitimate subjects for revenue, there is another reason perhaps more weighty than either, going to confirm the same thing. We can raise both in our own country. In restricting the importation of these articles from abroad we shall give encouragement to the production of them here, and in so doing the agricultural interest will be fostered. The experiments which have been made in the culture of silk in various parts of the United States show conclusively that the article can be produced here, of good quality, and in such abundance as will supply the country may call for. To this sort of self-dependence the policy of foreign nations is driving us.—It will perhaps be seen that our real interests point the same way.

BRITISH AND RUSSIAN QUARANTINE REGULATIONS. The following information of a change in the Russian quarantine regulations has been officially communicated by the Russian minister to the department of state.

British vessels, coming from the ports of Great Britain, laden with American cotton, will be admitted into the Russian ports on the Baltic, without having their cargoes purified in the Danish quarantine establishments upon production by their captains of certificates granted by British authorities or by Russian or Danish consuls, proving that the cotton with which they are laden comes really and directly from Great Britain, and has been shipped from a port of Great Britain.

The same disposition has been also extended to all vessels whatsoever arriving laden with American cotton, taken in at any European port, (except those on the Mediterranean), or in any port of the United States, of the healthy condition of which satisfactory assurance can be given.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY. Extract of a letter from one of Capt. Talcott's assistants, to a gentleman in this city, dated Kennebec River, Oct. 24, 1840.

I arrived here on Monday with two assistants and six packmen, having with the exception of a few days on Spider Lake, been separated from Capt. Talcott since the 23d of September last. The duty assigned us, was to trace the Ridge road from the head of Arnold's river to Spider Lake, and thence on to the Kennebec road (or road from Augusta to Quebec) where it crosses the boundary line. From the head of the Connecticut to the point of our first separation is sixty miles, there being a distance of thirty miles, and thence to the place forty miles, all of which my long legs have measured and the Schueller compass counted.—The route was throughout irregular and circuitous. We took a pilot at Canaan, but he proved of no service; it only requires an active man to climb over occasionally, and you can explore every section of the country.

Our life has been one of excitement; sometimes wet, at others burnt; now on snow and occasionally on ice. After a long and fatiguing march we came down to a skeleton. Every thing, however, has gone off successfully. Capt. Talcott will have accomplished a vast deal of work for the time we have been engaged upon the survey. To this point (the Kennebec road) and twenty miles beyond, the land as you are aware, is not in dispute, and I should hardly suppose it could be, as for miles and miles the Ridge is composed of high and distinct granite cliffs, as if nature had intended them to be dividing walls between two countries.

Often have I wished you were with us, to enjoy the fine moon hunting, or trotting, or even liking the pheasants that during the day would back make room for us to pass. On Spider Lake we became acquainted with a hunter, who killed a bull moose for us, much larger than a horse; his antlers or "armed chair" alone, were five feet spread. The trout have weighed from six to six pounds. One of the most delicious dishes I ever tasted was a soup made of the antlers and liver of the moose, I have a small sextant, by which I get the latitude from the meridian all of the sun and stars at an approach before 10 o'clock at night, as after a hard day's work I do not feel able to keep my eyes open long.

P. S. October 25, a violent snow storm, fifteen inches deep. October 26, Captain Talcott joined me. Another snow storm; dangerous to continue operations in the mountains. After 27th, we made preparations to return to Portland. October 29, a sleighing since the night of the 27th, we have all fifteen in number, arrived at Anson, where I and this letter to you on our return home.

THE ARMY.

Interesting from Florida. Letter addressed to the editor of the Army and Navy Chronicle, dated Tampa, November 3, 1840.

I have pleasure in announcing the arrival last night of the western detachment of Seminole Indians under the charge of Capt. John Page, of the United States army. It consists of the two principal chiefs, Holsa toochee and Nolose Ootola, twelve other Indians, and two Indians of the tribe of the Creek, and a few fine spirits and sanguine of success in their mediatorial mission. They are happy and contented in their western home; their own beds have been highly productive; their quiet undisturbed, and they carry the appearance of fine health and cheerful spirits. Their arguments and persuasions must have weight with our Indians, with many of whom they are connected by ties of consanguinity, and to all of whom they are known. They have fought many a battle by means of them in the same cause, and have now come to show us how contented they can be with a happy exchange from the privations, harassments and sufferings of a war from which they can have no other hope of relief, but a fertile country which, they say, produces them more corn in one year than they can consume in two, and the quiet, the comforts, and all the blessings of a lasting peace.

The parting of the detachment from their people, their kindred and friends, was an interesting scene as an affecting scene. Holsa toochee and the other chief made parting addresses, in which they gave them confident assurances of being soon reunited with their Florida friends, and promised their most strenuous exertions to secure them a peace honorable to all. The chief, (Attigator), formerly one of the most uncompromising as well as brave and successful among the emigrated Seminole warriors, then took the stand in behalf of the people, (with whom he remains), and in an animated strain conjured the members of the deputation to neglect no effort with their suffering brethren—bade them say that their friends, relatives and all their people send their eager and earnest wishes, and implored them by all the motives which could influence them as brethren of one family, by the advantages of strength, efficiency and respectability which would result from their reunion, to listen to wise councils and earnest sincere entreaties.

Captain Page represented the scene to have been deeply affecting. There was no acting there. A feeling of deep and pervading interest, strongly and unequivocally manifested, gave the fullest evidence of the sincerity of professions, urged with all the zeal and fervor of native eloquence.

The party has been one month and two days on their way, and reached here in the ship Harbinger from New Orleans; the harbinger, we hope, of better days for our afflicted territory.

Gen. Armstrong, captain Page and the deputation make this morning for Fort King, (100 miles), where Tiger-tail and other hostile chiefs are to meet in council.

Savannah, Nov. 14. "The steamer Gen. Clinch, capt. Smith, arrived yesterday from Florida. We are indebted to our attentive correspondent for the following letter, dated:

Fort King, (E. F.) Nov. 7. We arrived here yesterday, and found that general Armstrong had not arrived. One Indian had been in, stating that the situation was worse in every river, creek and bayou in Arkansas, and that deer and turkeys, ready cooked, follow in their trails, crying eat me, eat me. Gen. A. knows the war is over.

I shall not leave here for several days, and will write to you again before 1 p.m.
P. S. Some of the Indians are in, and meet their western brethren with manifest joy.

THE NAVY

The North Carolina line of battle ship weighed anchor from the North River on the 10th inst.—and moored in the navy yard for the winter.

The sloop of war Boston, now about sailing from New York for the East Indies, under the command of commodore E. Collins, is a very fine ship of war of her class, and has lately been much improved by extensive repairs, which give her better accommodations, and enables her to stow in her hold a much larger quantity of provisions and water than formerly. Her armament is 20 forty-two pound carronades, and 2 chambered twenty-four pounders—the will thus throw 444 lbs. of shot at a broadside, and will do great execution at close quarters, as each of the 24 pounders will make a hole in the side of an enemy's vessel of at least seven inches in diameter. Her complement of men is short of 200. With all her provisions, stores and munitions on board, her draught of water is only 15½ feet aft, by 15 feet forward.

The sloop of war Boston, is of a fine model with one exception. She labors under the imperfection which has attended all the sloops of war, we believe, which have been built agreeably to the directions of Mr. Humphreys, the chief naval constructor—that is, she is too full aft—and when in trim for sailing, appears to be down by the head. A deck rake is an important requisite in a ship where deck stow is desirable, but does not seem to be considered such by the chief constructor. By not attending to this point, many fine ships belonging to the government, have been spoiled for a sloop of war which is not a fast sailer, is of little value to any country.

(Boston Journal.)

The war steamer at Brooklyn. Responsive to our request, an attentive friend at the Brooklyn navy yard, has furnished us with some very acceptable information in relation to the war steamer now in progress at that establishment, and which will shortly be launched into her destined element. Her length from figure head to tailfin is 243 feet.

There are four iron plate bulkheads, to divide the ship, so as to ensure greater safety in case of springing of a leak so that although one apartment may be filled with water, the others remain free.
This steamer is the same by shape, form and finish as that in Philadelphia, with the exception of the engines, which are purely and essentially American, being on the inclined principle, and as far as they are finished, they promise to be the ne plus ultra engines.

This plan for the engines has been selected with a view to testing their applicability to naval purposes, and should it succeed as well as there is now every reason to believe, the same principle will be adopted to future war steamers.

Of the beauty of the model and the admirable finish of the internal arrangements, I will not now speak, for, as she will soon be launched, those decisions of beholding one of the most perfect specimens of naval architecture, will doubtless visit her and judge for themselves.

It has not yet been determined what is to be the nature of her armament, but it will no doubt comprise, among other guns, at least two of the celebrated Paixham guns, for throwing hollow shot. The decks are laid, and her hull is nearly completed, and covered to the light water mark, so that if nothing unusual occurs, she will be launched in about four weeks.

Very many nautical and scientific gentlemen have already visited her, and unfatigued as she is, she has been pronounced by all to be as fine a model as ever was conceived; and from the solidity and faithfulness with which she is constructed, she bids fair to stand a pretty considerable battering.

It would be hardly fair to close this brief notice of this beautiful vessel, without paying to Samuel Hart, esq. naval contractor of the navy yard, who superintends the whole building, a tribute to those scientific attainments so eminently possessed by him, which have suggested and consummated some of the most important and valuable alterations and additions to the plan as originally conceived.

It appears that 174 inmates in the general hospital, in ward 3, and 358 state paupers in ward 12, were not taken in the state census, which, if added, would make the whole population 84,401; and the population of the two wards nearly the same as in the U. S. census. Ward 2, it is well known, contains a large number of sea-faring men. These were not taken in the state census, as they ought to have been. They were taken in the U. S. census, which accounts for the great difference between the two enumerations of the population in that ward. In consequence of needing to enumerate the sea-faring men in ward 2, the city loses four representatives for the next ten years.

NEW JERSEY.

Treasurer's annual report. The receipts into the treasury during the past year amount to the sum of $117,852 85. Of this amount about $14,000 have been applied to the payment of the public debt, interest and loans; $17,000 on account of the state prison; $6,600 of which latter sum was appropriated by the legislature, to meet deficiencies arising from the operations of that institution previous to the past year, and the balance has been paid on account of the salaries of the officers, and for the transportation of prisoners, costs on conviction, &c. About $52,000 have been applied to the ordinary expenditures of the government, leaving a balance to the credit of the treasury of $26,948 63.

By this exhibit, it will be seen that the ordinary expenditures for the past year have been less than those of the previous year, by upwards of $11,000, and considerably less than they have been for many years preceding.

The temporary loans of the preceding year have all been promptly met, together with upwards of $2,000 of the loans made in 1837: leaving a balance as before mentioned, to the credit of the treasury, of $26,948 63, a sum nearly equal to the amount of temporary loans during the current year.

It is confidently believed, that under no ordinary circumstances, can the expenses of the state government be reduced to a more rigid and economical standard than they have been during the past year.

The amount of the state debt is $53,072, and temporary loans of $27,000. In consequence of there being no tax raised in the year 1837, and no adequate provision made to meet the current expenditures of the government for the following year, the then existing debt of upwards of $85,000 was increased to upwards of $105,000. Since that time, the legislature have deemed it advisable to raise by tax, what was barely sufficient to meet temporary loans and current expenses, leaving the debt then existing, to be met under a more favorable condition of the monetary concerns of the country.

Whether it is advisable to increase the annual tax for the purpose of diminishing that debt at this time, is a matter for the sound discretion of the legislature.

Thirty thousand dollars of the school fund have been distributed for support of common schools among the several counties of the state, agreeably to the apportionment made by the trustees of that fund. In addition to this sum the funds arising from the sale of the state lands at Paterson; the interest and dividends from loans, stock and bank tax, the capital fund has been increased from $257,287 61 to about $320,000.

A portion of the bank tax being that which is assessed on the Morris Canal and Banking company, has not yet been received into the treasury. That institution declined paying it until an opportunity could be afforded to submit their liability under the law to the consideration of the legislature.

Their reason for objecting to the payment is undoubted by me, to be, that the tax being levied only on banking capital used for banking purposes; and the company having been obliged to expend the whole, or greater part of their capital, in the completion and improvement of their canal, and not now using it for banking purposes, the tax could not be legally and justly demanded of them.

As these were considerations upon which I had no legal authority to decide, I felt it my duty to proceed for the collection of the tax, under the provisions of the law upon that subject. An application was therefore made by me to a justice of the supreme court, who directed process for its collection to issue, and is now in the hands of the sheriff of the county.

I have been informed that the company propose to submit their claim for relief, to the consideration of the legislature. All which is respectfully submitted.

VIRGINIA.

The legislature is to meet on the 1st day of December instead of the 1st Monday. The precaution of being in session to fill any vacancy that might happen in the college of electors induced this arrangement.

At the recent presidential election some of the counties changed their political front. The whigs carried ten counties which in the spring gave Van Buren majorities, and the Van Burens carried ten other counties which in the spring were whig.

In the Senate, the whigs have lost 124 majority in two senatorial districts, Botetourt and Louisa, and gained in two, Kenawha and Pittsylvania.

As to the congressional districts, they have lost one, the Buckingham; and gained four, the Norfolk, Jefferson, Augusta and Kuweha.

8,291 majority for Morehead.

OHIO.

Contested elections. Dr. Duncan intends contesting Mr. Pendleton's election, as will be seen by the following letter.

Hamilton co. state of Ohio, Cincinnati, Oct. 22, 1840.

To NATHANIEL G. PENDLETON, esq.

SIR: You are notified that I shall contest your right to a seat in the twenty-seventh congress of the United States, from the first congressional district of the state of Ohio, as a representative from the said district, upon the ground that you have not received a majority of the legal votes in said district.

Specifications.

1st. Votes were given to you by persons who had not the legal right to vote.

2d. Persons voted for you who were brought from other counties in this state, who had no legal right to vote in this district.

3d. Persons voted for you from other states, who had no legal residence in this state.

4th. Votes were obtained and polled for you through fraud and corruption, viz: by giving and promising meat, drink, money, clothing and other rewards.

5th. Persons voted for you twice at the same election at different polls, and at the same polls where they had previously voted.

6th. The polls of the 2d ward, in the city of Cincinnati, and other election districts in said district, were conducted fraudulently, in this particular, viz: Tickets were introduced into the ballot box, for which there were no names named on the poll books.

7th. That the judges of the election refused, in the 2d ward, in the city of Cincinnati and other election districts in this district, to ask the elector such questions as were proper to prevent illegal voting when challenged.

All of which is in violation of the constitution of the state of Ohio, and the laws regulating elections in said state. Respectfully, [Signed.] A. DUNCAN.

Served the original, of which this is a true copy, on Tuesday evening, the 22d day of October, 1840, and due notice accepted by Nathaniel G. Pendleton, in person.

G. D. M. AYRES.

In presence of James M. Fearing.

The friends of John C. Wright, esq., of Hamilton county, Ohio, are contesting Mr. Holmes' (V. B.) right to a seat in the senate of that state. Mr.

Wright was beaten 14 votes; but it is maintained that he was elected by the legal votes. In allusion to this matter the Lexington (Ky.) Intelligence remarks:—"Mr. Wright is a sound lawyer, a statesman, and an accomplished gentleman, and we should rejoice to see him a member of the senate of our sister state, not only because he is a whig, but because of his sterling integrity and devotion to the best interests of his country."

ALABAMA.

Extracts from the message of Gov. Bagby. Among the subjects most likely to occupy a prominent place in your deliberations, the present condition and future management of the state bank system, will not be the least interesting or important.

The intimate connection between this subject and the currency, or what shall constitute the circulating medium renders it, in my judgment, one of incalculable magnitude, not only in reference to the present condition, but to the future prosperity of the people of this, as well as of the other states.

From a deliberate and careful examination of the provisions of the federal constitution, with a view to ascertain the powers of the general government in relation to this subject, I came fully to the conclusion, as you express myself in the first of my messages, I had the honor of submitting to the legislature, that the federal government possessed no power whatever over the currency, except to coin money and regulate the value thereof. This conclusion is to be deduced not only from the express absence or omission of any provision in the constitution of the United States, conferring upon the general government the power, either to regulate the currency, or to supply a paper medium; but from the impressive recollection, that all the states, without exception, have, from the origin of the government, exercised the power of chartering banks, and of supplying, through the medium of bank notes, a paper circulation, without any attempt on the part of the general government, to prohibit or restrain them. It is true that the federal constitution prohibits the states from passing any law making any thing but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts. But this provision, so far from giving the banking power to the general government, or withholding it from the states, raises the strongest implication, that the framers of the constitution, aware that the power of chartering banks had been left to the states, were anxious to guard against the abuse of that power by preventing that bank paper should never be considered as money; thereby furnishing the strongest inducements to those who used it, to make it approximate as nearly as possible, to a proper specie standard.

It is to be regretted that the present state of the principles of the compact, to which the states of the union are parties, from violation, and a determination, so far as depends on me, in performing the part assigned me by the constitution and laws, to guard against any encroachment on the rights of the states, it is extremely desirable that the state bank system should be placed on such a footing, as would enable it to fulfil the important function of furnishing, within the sphere of its appropriate action, a sound circulating medium, not liable to depreciation in value. This object, so much to be desired, can only be effected, by so regulating and restraining the issues of the banks, as to enable them, at all times, to redeem their bills in specie on demand.

After full reflection, aided by a careful and respectful examination of several of the most approved theories upon the subject of banking, I am of opinion, that the object might be attained with reasonable certainty, in well managed banking institutions, by never permitting the circulation of a bank to exceed two dollars in paper, for every dollar of specie in its vault, or at such points as the ordinary business of the bank might render it necessary to have it.

Other systems, admitting of a more enlarged circulation, in proportion to the amount of specie, might enable them to redeem their notes with specie at all times; but the one I have indicated, most probably would. And I am perfectly free to admit, that after all the light that has been shed upon this important and delicate question, I have never been able to understand the process by which a bank could redeem three dollars, and as not unfrequently happens under existing systems, twenty, with one dollar in specie. In this argument, it is to be remembered, called out to redeem all or any considerable portion of their circulation at or near the same time. To this it may be replied, that there is scarcely a bank of discount and circulation in the world, which has not at some time or other suspended specie payments for want of ability to redeem its notes; and experience upon this, as well as every other subject, is believed to be a much safer indicator than any theory, however plausible in itself, or profitable in its results. It is believed that the main pillars which sustain most of the modern theories upon the subject of banking.

It is contended, however, that confidence in the currency, and that part of the law, which, according to the views here submitted ought to be fitted with gold and silver, is to be supplied by confidence.

Confidence is certainly a valuable principle, and one which ought to be cultivated and cherished. It sweetens the intercourse of life, and tends greatly to facilitate commercial dealing. But confidence and capital are not convertible terms. Confidence and credit are, in the ordinary and in the liberal sense of the terms, even a greater portion, than the only profitable or useful kind of confidence is that which is reposed in the disposition of a man to apply his means to the fulfilment of his engagements. And he who confides in an individual or corporation to pay three, or even a greater portion, than such individual or corporation is worth, will almost invariably find his confidence misplaced; as the deeply embarrassed condition of this and almost every other civilized country but too fully attests. It is believed that the only way to secure confidence, and afford sufficient security to those who receive bank notes as the faithful representative of money, is to conceive to be perfectly equitable so far as the banks themselves are concerned, by enabling them to issue bank notes, and to receive in exchange an amount of paper equal to the amount of their capital; while it would effectually guard against those sudden expansions and contractions which operate so ruinously upon commerce, tend to foster a spirit of gambling speculation, and render the value of property at all times unsettled and uncertain. It should be recollected too, that the object of a sound banking system, was not so much to enable the banks to make large profits out of the wants or necessities of the people, but to furnish a circulating medium commensurate with their reasonable wants, not liable to depreciation in value.

Impressed with the importance and correctness of these views, I earnestly recommended to you the adoption of measures, which, by being simple, flexible, enable the Bank of the State of Alabama and the several branches thereof, to resume specie payments, and to continue to redeem their notes on demand, without future interruption. The only way to secure confidence, and afford sufficient security to those who receive bank notes as the faithful representative of money, is to conceive to be perfectly equitable so far as the banks themselves are concerned, by enabling them to issue bank notes, and to receive in exchange an amount of paper equal to the amount of their capital; while it would effectually guard against those sudden expansions and contractions which operate so ruinously upon commerce, tend to foster a spirit of gambling speculation, and render the value of property at all times unsettled and uncertain. It should be recollected too, that the object of a sound banking system, was not so much to enable the banks to make large profits out of the wants or necessities of the people, but to furnish a circulating medium commensurate with their reasonable wants, not liable to depreciation in value.

Under the act of 28th January, 1840, to recall and cancel the unpaid bonds issued by the state of Alabama, the president and directors of the Bank of the State of Alabama have returned bonds, amounting to the sum of ten hundred and thirty thousand dollars—the president and directors of the branch bank at Huntsville, bonds to the amount of five hundred thousand dollars—and the president and directors of the branch bank at Montgomery, bonds to the amount of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars; all of which have been cancelled, and are deposited in the treasury department, subject to the final disposition of the legislature.

It will also be perceived by a letter from the president of the Bank of the State of Alabama, a copy of which is herewith submitted, that proper steps have been taken to recall all the bonds remaining unsold, belonging to that institution, and that they are now in the hands of the cashier of the Bank of Mobile, awaiting the navigable state of the river, to be transmitted to the bank at this place. The withdrawal of so large an amount of our stock from circulation, cannot fail to have a most beneficial effect on the credit of the state, and enhance the value of our stock, if, at any time hereafter, circumstances should render it necessary to raise money on the public credit of the state. Influenced by the constant desire to preserve that which is so valuable, and to counteract the mischievous tendency and effects of the proposition, which seems to be seriously entertained in some portions of the country, for the general government to assume the payment of the debts of the individual states, I beg leave again to press upon the consideration of the legislature, the propriety of providing without further delay, either in the mode pointed out in my last annual message, or in such other mode as the wisdom of the legislature may suggest, a sinking fund for the redemption of our state stock.

Immediate attention to this subject is not only required by that constant regard to the high consideration of good government, which has been the most sedulous care, but, will put at rest, so far as Alabama is concerned, a proposition pregnant with more pernicious consequences to the sovereignty and separate independence of the state, than any which has agitated the public councils. For, it may be safely assumed, that whatever authority has the right, or is permitted to exercise the power, of paying the debts of a state or nation, will ultimately control its will and its political action. It is well known that I came into office, not only favorable but pledged to the subjects of education and internal improvement. This pledge, although to a great extent unexecuted, has not been forgotten, or purposely neglected. If it will be remembered that the period within which it has fallen to my lot to administer the government, has been one of extraordinary difficulty and embarrassment, every way unpropitious for engaging extensively, or successfully, in the prosecution of either of these objects, for an extended period, it will be justly admired, when we can, with perfect propriety, embark in the accomplishment of matters which every one so much desires. But from a thorough conviction, that the amount expended in banking in this state, is more than the actual capital, and that, for the amount necessary to supply the sound reasonable wants of the community, I respectfully recommended to the general assembly the propriety of withdrawing a part of the capital now employed in banking, and the use of the same, to be applied, as justly it, and applying it in such manner, and in such proportions as the legislature may, in their wisdom, consider most proper to the purposes of internal improvement and a general system of education.

The construction of some work of internal improvement connecting the Tennessee river with the navigable waters of Mobile bay, thereby forming a permanent link of intercommunication between the northern and southern sections of the state, has so long occupied the public mind and is justly considered a subject of such intrinsic importance, that nothing but imperious necessity can fairly excuse its postponement to the present time. The only modes which have been proposed, and published are, by canal, railway or Macadamized road. In deciding in favor of either of these modes, the relative cost, advantages, convenience and adaptation to the condition of the country, and particularly to the productions of the section, that would be connected by it, must be taken into the estimate. Without intending to disparage or to discourage the adoption of either of the other modes, a Macadamized road has, in my opinion, advantages over the others; although it is true, that it would be, that, in expressing this opinion, I shall subject myself to the imputation of a retrogressive spirit, not congenial with the improvement of the age.

The arguments, which to my mind, give to this mode of improvement advantages over every other, are, cheapness in the construction and repairs, greater practicability, less liability to accidents, and greater adaptation to the convenience of the great body of the people. But the main reason in favor of a Macadamized road is, that it would be connected by this work with Mobile, is emphatically a provision-raising region; and even if the heavy productions in which it abounds, could be transported by rail roads, it would have the effect of greatly enhancing the cost of transportation, and would throw out of employment a considerable portion of its capital employed in raising those productions, for a considerable period of the year. Whereas, if the other description of road be adopted, the hands, the teams, and the wagons used in making the produce, could be profitably employed in transporting it to market. In fine, to repeat a sentiment which cannot be too often repeated, or deeply imprinted, it would produce the greatest good to the greatest number.

Although deeply impressed with the utility and importance of a work of this kind, if the legislature should be of opinion that either this object, or the general system of education to which I have referred, should be postponed to a period of greater public prosperity, I have no hesitation in expressing my assent to that course. I do not, however, in advance of every other interest. Indeed, when we attempt to estimate the advantages of education, in preparing mankind for all that is useful, honorable and praiseworthy in this life, and for any higher state of moral and intellectual enjoyment in that which is to come, it is difficult to place any other interest in competition with it, or to resist the unwelcome conclusion, that we have already slumbered too long upon this vital subject. Considering education as an essential part of the government, and that the success and purity of its administration will always depend upon the extent to which that opinion is enlightened, the advantages of education cannot be too highly appreciated in a political view. It is that alone which can keep alive the vestal spark of enlightened patriotism; and while I am free to declare, that I should rejoice to see the resources of the state fully developed by the construction of every kind of improvement, which could tend to the consumption of that object, I would rather be instrumental in imparting to the indigent and orphan children in the state of Alabama, the rudiments of a common English education, than to enjoy the exclusive credit of constructing a rail road from Louisiana to the lakes. This system, when once set in motion by the munificence of the legislature, carrying, as it will, its genial influence like the rays of the sun, in every corner of the state, and as it will be, by the fostering influence of enlightened public opinion, could not fail of ultimate success. It is admitted, that the sparseness of our population in many parts of the state, would present an impediment to the immediate and entire success of the system.

But it is surely not expecting too much of free men in this enlightened age, to presume, that they would be willing to submit to some privations, and to encounter some difficulties, in order to open to themselves the avenues to moral and political improvement, by which they would, in the end, be conducted to the valuable fountains of virtue and knowledge.

The present amount of capital employed in banking, is less millions eight hundred and sixty thousand dollars, and it is believed that the amount, such as can be advantageously employed in that mode; which would leave four millions eight hundred and sixty thousand dollars, as fast as it can be realized by the banks, to be appropriated to other objects. The impolicy of exposing too large a capital in banking, and the evils of a redundant circulation have been so fully realized, that if the legislature should be indisposed to employ any portion of it in the manner I have indicated, I am confident that the capriciousness of the public should be reduced to six millions; and the excess above that sum, applied to the redemption of the stock.

The university of Alabama, in the success of which we have so deep an interest, has not been unaffected by the causes which have afflicted every other department of the public interest. Owing to the extreme unhealthiness of the past season, and to the deep state of pecuniary embarrassment, the number of students is less than at any period of our present session. The president and officers of 1840 faithfully continue to be faithful and unremitting in their exertions to promote the utility, and elevate the character of the institution; and to fulfill the high expectations that are formed of their merits and qualifications, inasmuch as the board of trustees will meet and report to you upon the affairs of this institution generally, during the present session of the legislature, it is deemed unnecessary to go into further detail in this communication.

SPEECH OF MR. W. C. JOHNSON, OF MD. ON THE SUBJECT OF THE REJECTION OF PETITIONS FOR THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The right of petition, even at this day, is more important to the people of England than it is to the citizens of the United States, because in England the right to vote is still confined to a privileged few, and hence the voice of a majority of the people of a borough, city or a county, may be different from the voice of a majority of the electors; and it may often occur that the member of parliament elected may not be the true mirror to reflect faithfully all the features of the popular will.

In liberty in this country held by so frail a right! Have the people to rescue their rights and power from the hands of an hereditary few? Or is not each man himself a part of the government? Take the history of our people and their governments from their first embarkation from England to the present hour, and what will it prove to you? They brought with them their written charters and by written institutions. The charter of Maryland, for instance, given by an arbitrary monarch, was more democratic in relation to popular representation than the constitution, now the organic law of that state. The people were free from the shackles of royal prerogative. What did the revolution effect? The 4th of July I say will say that it broke the bonds of slavery and made us free, and secured that freedom by the right to petition. That is an ascription on our forefathers.

They were always free. They brought with them the spirit of freedom, and each man had a constitution of rights and freedom written in his heart, deeper and more revered than the parchment of their charters. The revolution effected a total separation, and produced constitutional and confederated government. The ballot box was left as before, or extended to all. The ballot box is the greatest conservative principle of our liberties; every citizen finds that it is his safe-guard against oppression, and in this country even freedom of the press is secured by the ballot box, his voice and his will are felt and obeyed. It is the broad basis of our political fabric, and in its exercise the liberties of the people are secure as long as they continue intelligent and virtuous.

But the English constitution, the English statutes to show how far the right to petition has been restrained and enlarged, but it is unnecessary. But I will presently show that it is at this day, and has long been, the established rule in parliament, to receive no petition when petitioners have no jurisdiction, or when the subject matter of the prayer, nor will it receive a petition on such questions and subjects as it may have jurisdiction, when, by the reception of the petition, it would delay and embarrass the public business of the nation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts said that a member from South Carolina, (Mr. Legare, I suppose), in opposing, in a former session the right of abolitionists to petition, had alluded to English precedents, and spent some time in combating the position assumed by the able member from South Carolina. I have not on my memory very distinctly the grounds laid in that debate, but I have no hesitancy in saying in my conclusion, of the gentleman from South Carolina was correct, and that he has been his argument. I do not say if it is so, but the gentleman, who is not here to defend his position, may have been on that occasion, like a learned English judge, who is described in the Loose's Common Pleas Book, as being remarkable for his accuracy and soundness of his decisions, and the fallacy of the reasoning by which he reached them.

The learned gentleman from Massachusetts has read from "Hale's" precedents, and has had occasion to say, from the same high authority, to show that although "it is declared by the statute of William and Mary that the subject hath a right to petition, and that all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal," yet that the law of commons will not receive petitions when a bill is pending to raise revenue, and that in other instances they have summarily rejected petitions:

"In the proceedings of the house of commons, so late as the 25th of March, 1791, the subject of petition was fully and elaborately debated."

Mr. Sergeant Jackson offered the petition of a certain rev. Eugene Muhlenberg, praying that a law might be enacted to provide that the exco. law of the church of England be observed, as between, and in so far as shall be compatible with the laws of the country.

"Mr. Wynn protested against the useless and most inconvenient practice of entertaining petitions with respect to which the house can neither investigate the alleged grounds of complaint, nor afford any practical relief. It was a subject over which the legislature could exercise no control. It was impossible for the house to receive such a petition."

"Mr. Rosbeck rose to a point of order: That the house could not recognise the canon law of Rome, and could take no means to compel others to abide by it."

"Mr. Scarlett hoped that the house would bear the grievance of which the reverend gentleman complained, as there was no doubt a grievance did exist, and the house was a proper place for taking such a petition into consideration."

"The speaker always has always understood that when an honorable member presented a petition to the house, he first made himself responsible to the house that it contained no improper language, or such as ought not to be addressed to the house of commons, and, secondly, that it was supposed to exercise a becoming deference as to the propriety or propriety of parliament granting any relief in the matter. I am sure I need not indicate to the house the great inconvenience which must result from honorable members pursuing a contrary practice, both in reference to the dignity of the house and the progress of public business."

"Mr. Sergeant Jackson said he had carefully perused the petition, and could confidently state, that from beginning to end, there did not occur one improper word or expression towards the house. It was altogether couched in the most respectful language."

"The attorney general said: I have looked at the prayer of the petition, and I think that the petition ought to be received. My opinion that no petition should be received which prays that which is utterly impossible for the house to accede to. But such is not the fact in the present instance. The petitioner asks that the law may be altered; that the prayer is urged upon us only as one branch of the legislature, who cannot pass a law without the approval of the lords and the crown. It would not be impossible to introduce a bill having for its object that which the petitioner prays for. If, however, a bill were proposed for the canon law of Rome being made law for England, I apprehend there would be doubt there would be a unanimous feeling among the representatives of the people against any such measure. I humbly beg to say, that when a petition merely prays that the law may be altered, it should be received."

"Mr. Rosbeck added, almost that had fallen from the honorable and a new gentleman he was in error in opposing the reception of the petition, since it only prayed an alteration of the law; therefore, as far as his objection went, he waived it."

"Mr. Sergeant Jackson moved that the petition do lie on the table; which was ordered.—Mirror of Parliament, vol. 2, page 2, 136."

"On the 9th of April, 1694, a petition was tendered to the house, relating to the bill for granting to their majesties several duties upon the tonnage of ships, and the question being put, that the petition be received, it passed in the negative.—Halstet's Precedents, ed. 3, p. 209."

"On the 28th of April, 1698, a petition was offered to the house, against the bill for laying a duty upon inland pit coal, and the question being put, that the petition be received, it passed in the negative.—Id. p. 209."

"On the 31st of January, 1703, a petition of the masters of Nottingham being offered, against the bill for continuing that duty upon malt, and the question being put, that the petition be brought up, it passed in the negative.—Id. p. 270."

"On the 11th of December, 1706.—Resolved, That this house will receive no petition for any sum of money, relating to public service, but what is recommended by the crown. Upon the 11th of June, 1713, this was declared to be a standing order of the house.—Id. p. 202."

"On the 2d of February, 1726, a petition of the land owners in the Isle of Ely, for lessening the proportion of the said sale, and tax, being offered, and the question being put, that the petition be brought up, it passed in the negative.—Id. p. 202."

"On the 6th of March, 1732, a petition being offered against a bill depending for securing the trade of the navigable colonies, it was refused to be brought up. A motion was then made, that the committee be appointed to search precedents in relation to the receiving or not receiving petitions against the imposing of duties, and the question being put, it passed in the negative.—Id. p. 202."

"On the 28th of January, 1760, a petition of the masters of Ipswich, against the additional duty upon the stock of malt in hand, being offered, on question, that it may be brought up, it passed in the negative, renuere contradicente.—Id. p. 203."

"On the 15th of February, 1763, a petition of Mr. Montague, agent for Virginia, and a petition from Connecticut, and another from the inhabitants of Carolina, against the bill then depending for imposing a stamp duty in America, being offered, upon question for bringing it up, it passed in the negative.—Id. p. 204."

"On the 4th of March, 1795, a petition of certain merchants, importers and dealers in foreign wines, praying that the proposed augmentation of duties on foreign wines may not be imposed on the stock in hand on the 23d of February last, being offered to the house, the question being put, that the said petition be brought up, it passed in the negative, renuere contradicente.—Id. p. 205."

Here, then, are precedents for more than a century.

"The house adopted this rule: 'That they would not receive any petition against a bill then depending for imposing a tax or duty.' The principle upon which this rule was adopted, appears to be that of a tax extending in its effects over every part of the kingdom, and more or less affecting every individual, and in its nature necessarily and intentionally imposing a burden upon the people, it can answer no end to the people whatever for any act of petitioners to state these consequences as a grievance against the government."

The house of commons, before they come to a resolution which imposes a tax, cannot but know that it may very sensibly affect the commerce or manufactures of which the duty is laid; but they cannot permit the inconvenience of the petition to be brought upon a particular branch of trade to weigh with them when put in the balance with those advantages which are intended to result to the whole, and which the public necessities of the state demand from the legislature. Whatever reason it has been thought better and more candid to the persons who at once to refuse receiving their petition, rather than by receiving it, to give countenance to the application, and to mislead the petitioners into an idea, that in consequence of their petitions the house of commons would demand from the tax proposed, and impose another, which, though it might be less felt by that branch of trade, might be more oppressive to some other.—Id. p. 206."

So much for English precedents. And yet, the right of petition at this day, is more important to the people of England than to the people of the U. States. Gentlemen, as I said before, are unjust to themselves and to the country, when they talk about the right of petition being the foundation of our liberties, and they are equally in error when they say that the petition is a concession recognises the right of the petitioners to alter our English constitution. The difference consists in this, that we, the congress of the United States, have a written constitution which defines our powers and limits their exercise, and enumerates the subjects over which we may legislate. But, in England, the power of parliament is almost unlimited and undefinable—in supreme and absolute. No men were better acquainted with the jurisprudence of England, in all its branches, than the statesmen of the revolution, and those who framed our constitution. It was in the laws of England that they found a definition of the powers of government, the rights of the people, and the duties of rulers—a line drawn between the asserted and legitimate powers of royal prerogative. They found that there were charters, charters and franchises, a magna charta, and acts of parliament, and the authority of the private and corporate rights of the people, and intended to secure their enjoyment. They knew that it was in defence of those rights that their ancestors had often taken up arms in the old world, and that they had recovered to guarantee their security in this country, by bringing with their written charters, and establishing democratic institutions. Taking their stand upon these principles and rights, they threw them in all their appeals, remonstrances and petitions, and they were successful in the consummation of the revolution. But even so, they thought the people of the country that two great classes at least were indispensable, in order to avert for the future the evils and perils of the past. That the supreme power should not be invested in any legislative body, as it was in parliament, and that no power should be exercised, except as delegated, intrusted and authorized. Hence, when renouncing their allegiance to the king of Great Britain, and dissolving their connexion with the English government, in making a declaration of their rights, they followed the example of their ancestors. But they went no further in their prudent caution and jealousy of power, by defining the powers of the governments which they established, by written constitutions. But if it was impossible to invest in a safe guard of liberty, to define by written constitutions the powers of government, when the people of the colonies declared themselves independent states, or when, as quoted sovereigns, "they formed the league of confederation, how much more important did a written constitution become, when, in order to form a more perfect union, it was necessary to change the elective into an executive government, possessing great and sovereign powers, and acting directly on the people; when the powers of government were to be divided between the government of the union and those of the states; when the government was to be sovereign with respect to the objects committed to it, and the states sovereign with respect to the objects committed to the other." The constitution, then, having been thus formed, and having been established for the high purposes to which I have alluded, must be our only rule and guide in all our proceedings. We have only to read its plain and palpable mandates, remembering, especially, "that the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

Considering then, that the clause is the first amendment to the constitution, which relates to the right of petition, what is the right which is guaranteed to the people, and which we are prohibited from abridging? The language is plain and unequivocal. It is, "that the people shall make no law" abridging "the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." In the law books, "a petition" is defined to be "a supplication made by an inferior to a superior, and especially to our America jurisdiction." And again, "a petition is a written instrument of writing or printing containing a prayer from the petitioner, presenting it, called the petitioner, to the body or person to whom it is presented, for the redress of some wrong or the grant of some favor, which is left to his discretion to grant or refuse." This it is considered a privilege and right against all real grievances—grievances felt and manifest. In its very nature it is a restricted right—a privilege of defined limitation.—

The very phraseology of the constitution is a limitation of the exercise of the right of petition. The constitution gives no other cognizance and jurisdiction for specific purposes, and our right of petition must be in accordance with the constitution. We cannot of right be petitioned to do that which we have no constitutional power to do, much less to do that which we are not to do. No petitioner has a right to ask for a redress of grievances, if they are grievances under the constitution, and which congress has the constitutional power to redress.

Now, sir, who are these petitioners, and what are the subjects of their petitions? Who are they? Individuals, or the community? If individuals, and if individuals alone, should, in the name of the community, indulge a sickly sentimentality for the imaginary benefit of remote communities; who, with self-assumed superiority and Pharisaical pride, arrogate to themselves the entire possession of philanthropy; who, secure from all dangers themselves, would institute rash experiments on our peace and happiness, and the extinction of one or other of two eternally distinct races; for so degree of equality, no amalgamation, can be thought of, which would produce a connexion at which the soul sickens with loathing and disgust. Yes, sir, such are the petitioners, and such the inevitable consequences if their prayers be carried out; for some of them ask congress to abolish slavery and the slave trade in the District of Columbia, and to abolish it in the territories, and some in the states. Now, sir, are the prayers of these wretched fit subjects for our legislation, and do they set forth such grievances as they have a right to complain of, or we the power to redress? I answer, no, sir, they are not such grievances, nor do I believe that a majority of the community are members who defend these petitions. I will answer no. But, Mr. Speaker, I cannot but think that great efforts have been made to cover the real objects of the abolitionists' memorialists, to divert attention from the real question presented, and to introduce a new issue out of the right of the people to petition. To me, in my view of the case, I would remind gentlemen that, though the first article of the amendments of the constitution declares that "congress shall make no law to abridge the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances," the second clause of the fifth section of the first article gives express power to each house to determine the rules of its proceeding. Now, sir, it is not proposed that congress should make any law upon the subject of petitions, that the power of this house should be exercised out of this house, or over any others than the members of this house. It is not proposed to send forth an edict forbidding the people to assemble, except in certain numbers, or to petition, or to send forth any petition, save in a certain manner. Nothing of this.

*The following letter, giving an account of the views of the society of Friends, who assembled in Maryland, is too interesting not to be published. The name of the writer, as a distinguished citizen, is too well known not to command the highest and most favorable consideration.

Baltimore, 2d mo. 25, 1840.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: I this morning received thy letter of the 24th instant, inquiring of me if the society of Friends had not expressed their dissatisfaction of the abolition excitement now existing in the north. Although the question is one of some embarrassment, I will endeavor plainly to answer it, and will give thee all the information in my power to enable thee correctly to understand our position.

The society of Friends, under their existing organization in the United States, are composed of a number of yearly meetings, each of which is a self-governing body, and is in discipline independent of the others, and issues from time to time to the members that constitute it, such admonitions and rules as it may think proper to give. It is not the province of these meetings in relation to the subject of this inquiry, I can only speak so far as concerns the one of which I am a member, and that is the Western Shore of Maryland and the adjacent parts of Pennsylvania and Virginia, and who held their yearly meetings at Baltimore. In the year 1844, the Friends of this meeting, who were in great measure then rapidly manifesting itself on the subject of abolition, and not feeling self called upon to take part, or in any way interfere with members, "that we may, both as a society and individually, keep ourselves unconnected with the excitement now so generally prevailing in the land," (in regard to slavery) in the meek and peaceable spirit of the Lamb; and that we avoid compromitting ourselves by entering into any political party, and

In the year 1839 the yearly meeting renewed its advice on the same subject, and, after exhorting its members "to be faithful in the support of our righteous testimony against slavery," cautioned them "against entangling themselves with those associations that have sprung up in different parts of our country in relation to this subject, and which, we fear, will retard rather than promote the work."

In order that we may not be misunderstood, it is a duty I owe both to these and to myself, on the present occasion, to speak frankly, and without reserve or concealment, on this deeply important subject. After communicating the foregoing facts, in relation to the proceedings of the yearly meeting of which I am a member, I must, therefore, be permitted to add some remarks illustrative of our views. These I will endeavor to condense into as few words as possible, and I trust they may be received as a part of my answer.

The society of Friends, almost from its first organization, have been opposed to slavery upon the ground of religious principle, and they were the first to raise their voice against the African slave trade. They have ever viewed the system as unjust, and believed it would lead to calamitous consequences. They con-

The society of Friends, therefore, I believe, cannot be correctly charged with getting up the present excitement on the subject of abolition; for, although they view slavery, as it now exists in the United States, to be a grievous evil, and some of their members may have fallen under the prevailing excitement, and perhaps participated in the measures taken by the abolitionists, yet, so far as I am advised, the number of those (if any) within our limits have been few, and our members have very generally followed the advice of their weekly meetings.

Assuring thee of my highest regard and esteem, I am, very respectfully, thy friend, P. E. THOMAS.
The hon. Wm. Cass Johnson, Washington.

And I will here state, in defence of the name of William Pinkney, who has been so frequently quoted by abolition writers and speakers, that Mr. Pinkney defended abolition when he was a member of the house of delegates of Maryland, but he did so as a citizen of that state, and before a legislative body having jurisdiction to consider only the laws of that state. But he was not an eminent as a constitutional lawyer, and was emphatically what chief justice Marshall called him—"the monarch of the bar," when transferred to the senate of the U. States, where he stood the personification of genius with the eloquence of himself, was the most eloquent defender of the slaveholding states, and the inviolable advocates of the rights of slavery, and the rights of the union. In the senate, the constitution which he had sworn to support was the rule of his guidance.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) has alluded to the controversy now existing between the executives of the states of Virginia and New York, in which the rights of jurisdiction over persons, non-residents, but violators of the laws of the state wherein they committed the offence, is involved, and the gentleman intimated that that controversy was infinitely more dangerous than the excitement occasioned by the abolitionists; so much so, that he stated we are on the eve of a civil war. I have read the communications of the two executives, in which I now hold in my hand, printed by the state of New York, and sent me by a friend (Mr. Sibley) now in the senate of that state.

Mr. Speaker, you need be under no apprehensions. I do not mean to discuss the question, and indeed if I did, I can perceive no inpropriety in my so doing, as it is a fit question for examination. All that I mean to say is, that I differ in opinion with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), who looks upon the question as hanging on the verge of a civil war. I see no feeling of hostility in the correspondence. The communication

...dignified and argumentative, and creditable to either executive, though I differ from the governor of New York in some of his positions and delusions. He is a man of great energy, and a great master of the controversy; and to the gentlemen from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) I would say, if he thinks we are on the eve of a civil war, and he regards it as such (as I hope and am sure he does), a great national calamity, he had better plan to hasten its coming, by doing it by the course which he takes upon this floor. Will his expectation to cure a greater evil by inflicting in addition a lesser one? Does he graduate these calamities in his mind, and does he think that the calamities of New York and Virginia a civil war between New York and Virginia? Would not the calamity of a civil war between the general government and the north, or by an insurrection, be quite as great a calamity as a civil war between New York and Virginia? Will that gentleman, every defence which is made of abolition is calculated to hasten that calamity?

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) announces severely the resolution offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, and says, "I think, sir, that you are wrong," he says, "it is indefinite and too vague, and proposes one as an amendment which is calculated to invite collision, and would make this house nothing more than a wrangling and confused assembly." And then he says again say Mr. Adams, "I think that no one knows better than myself the peril which I encounter in opposing the positions of the distinguished member from Massachusetts. I know how promptly he is willing to attack or to defend, and I know how ready he is to follow me in any point upon time. The gentleman considered the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina as wanting decision, as waiving the true issue, and eluded it in the wooden nutmeg order, only waiving it, and And then he says, "I think, sir, that you are wrong," he says, "it is indefinite and too vague, and proposes one as an amendment which is calculated to invite collision, and would make this house nothing more than a wrangling and confused assembly." chivalric gentleman, nor, as he also called him, the cavalier from South Carolina. Can I not say the same, and with greater justice, of the resolution offered by the gallant member from Massachusetts? And then he says, "I think, sir, that you are wrong," he says, "it is indefinite and too vague, and proposes one as an amendment which is calculated to invite collision, and would make this house nothing more than a wrangling and confused assembly." The gentleman considered the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina as wanting decision, as waiving the true issue, and eluded it in the wooden nutmeg order, only waiving it, and chivalry as that member? He is but the archetype of the cavalier from South Carolina! Who, on this floor or off of it, is an ready to break a lance as the gentleman from the State I serve. He sees the danger, and he is ready to meet it. He is ready to meet it any time, even with the smallest advantage, and he is ready to meet it in practice, what the most formidable he rejoices to encounter; and hence his readiness to meet the gentleman from South Carolina equally gallant gentleman from South Carolina. They have measured weapons; yet,

"Not hate but glory made these chiefs contend,
"And each brave foe was in his soul a friend."

Mr. Speak-er, have you ever traversed the great prairies of the far west? Well, I have. You can there see the bison ranging gregariously over those beautiful and almost endless fields of nature. Occasionally a single animal is seen wandering apart from the herd, and danger lies beneath him, and the herd, and the herd in contempt—separated apart from the herd, and quietly departing on the rich and luxuriant flowers and herbage around him. By close observation you may see how these hungry and sanguinary beasts are kept tight upon the herd, and how the lone wolf would readily inflict will excite but seldom other sensation than contempt, or perhaps a single twitch of the insatiable muscle will alarm away the herd. Again you see, in the bright sunshine of the day, the region of the prairie, the herds of those kindred insects living in fantastic companies, and fatten themselves upon the calm and self-possessed animal, who will perhaps reserve his bite until the whole herd are busy with their work of eating. Then the predator will wait, and will, with the fallow of his vast trunk, knock into ruin and confusion the whole insectivorous tribe. Even so of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Or, if I may be allowed a less rural and more classic simile, he, like the lion, will wait until the whole herd of the pompous Hector in single combat, and to work this; and, like that same dead Telamon, encounter singly and alone a whole wing of the Trojan army, drive them back defeated and confounded, and then will slay him yet thirty times in triumph to the gods!

But to the resolution. Has the gallant member from Massachusetts proposed a more distinct and conclusive proposition than that which he has satirized? The learned gentleman's amendment invites collision in this house, and would require every member objecting to a memorial to spread his arguments on the journal—virtually to make the journal a register and record of written speeches.

Nearly a month have we been discussing this question: and with such an amendment not only all that has been said would have been spoken on the journal, but those members who do not speak would quickly begin to regret that they had not done so. I can neither make a speech nor write for the purpose. I will follow the example set by a member from Maine, at this session, [Mr. Clifford,] who got the clerk of the house both to write and read his speech for him. And, again, those, if there be any such, who can neither speak nor write, may be permitted to place one to write an argument for them, in order to have their names, with the written paper, spread upon the journal. This would be of daily recurrence on every memorial upon which there was the slightest difference of opinion; and the journal would be a more interesting and useful document. The Metropolitan newspaper. In a few years your journal would be long enough to reach round the globe; it would take an indefinite time to read one day's proceedings; and in a little while it would rival in bulk the Alexandrian library, and be as long as the ark of Noah. And, again, I would like to see the members when we consider the materiel of this house and its disqualifications properly. Every thing is discussed, and the same story, the same arguments, are told and retold again and again. Nothing is taken for granted, when every thing must be proven by statement and argument. I am not so familiar with a subject, but himself.

All debate what the constitution should be, instead of considering it a fixed instrument of clear and precise import, equally obligatory in all its requirements. So much for the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who said, "I will not vote for it, but for me it is enough that neither the gentleman's resolution nor his speech upon it denies the power of the house to reject petitions."

The resolution which I have proposed avoids interfering with the question of slavery as guaranteed to the owners of that property, and the government pledge under the constitution to protect each master in it; for it may become necessary for Congress to pass some penal laws, which will more effectually secure the right of the master to this species of property.*

*learned the following from the Emancipator.
 "SIGNS OF THE TIMES—A gentleman in Vermont writes, February 17, 'Four fugitives from the "paternal slave system" left my house this morning, on their way to queen Victoria's dominions. One was from Richmond, Va. and three from Baltimore. They were fine fellows, having been house servants. They were quite happy.'"
 "At the late western New York convention, at West Bloomfield, Ontario county, Feb. —, the Friend of Man informed us that.

"At this stage of the proceedings, great interest was added to the occasion by the introduction to the crowd

It is a fact worthy of remark, that property of this description was more sorely respected before than since the adoption of the federal constitution. William Penn, one of the great benefactors of mankind, always used his influence to secure the transfer in his property, as will be seen by the following extract from the records in the archives of Maryland:

"State of Maryland, to wit: I Cornelius McLane, secretary of state for the state of Maryland, do hereby certify that the following word, viz: As to Pennsylvania, they are sensible that the raising and lowering coin has been an advantage that government has had above his majesty's immediate governments, but what advantages they have made thereby they cannot judge, but believe it has at times been the means of drawing the money from his majesty's governments to the proprietary governments, and for some time and still does continue so to do from this province to Pennsylvania."

"That government, before governor Penn's last arrival there, did give too much countenance to fugitive seamen, debtors and runaway servants going from hence, and did rather impede than further their return; but Mr. Penn, upon his arrival, gave some redress to those evils, and continued so to do during his stay there, especially as to runaway servants, and he truly executed his duty in relation to the council to a communication from his excellency Nathaniel Blakston, governor of the province of Maryland, recorded in the proceedings of the council held at the town of Annapolis on the twenty-ninth day of December, and dominion D draw the money from his majesty's governments to the proprietary governments, and for some time and still does continue so to do from this province to Pennsylvania."

"In witness whereof, and that the same is truly and faithfully taken from the proceedings aforesaid, now of record in my office, I have hereunto set my hand at the city of Annapolis, on this 10th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty."

"CORNELIUS McLANE, secretary of state."

It may also be worthy of remark, that the two most benevolent men—the two who stand in the fullest relief upon the pages of our colonial and national history, as benefactors of human race, and whose names will grow in brightness as they grow in years—George Washington and William Penn, both died owners of slaves. The fact in relation to the former is familiar to all, and I extract the following from an able American historian, in relation to the latter:

"William Penn employed blacks without scruple.—His first act relating to them did not substitute, after fourteen years' service, the severe condition of adepts to the soil for that of slaves. At a later day, he endeavored to secure to the colored race, and moral culture, the rights and happiness of domestic life. His efforts were not successful, and he himself died a slaveholder."—Barrett's History of the United States, vol. 2, p. 403.

But, Mr. Speaker, if my arguments, and the facts and illustrations which I have adduced, have not yet produced conviction; if there should be a lingering doubt upon the minds of any member as to the right, propriety and expediency of rejecting abolition memorials, I will furnish my position with the additional authority of such distinguished names as will, I feel persuaded, remove all hesitancy—names of the most distinguished men in the nation; names of audience of Lloyd and Nicholas Howard, who had just escaped from the dark prison of slavery, and were then on their way to Canada. These intelligent and interesting gentlemen, gave a brief sketch of their narrow escape—from their reasons for leaving their happy homes; and William Lloyd, George Crocker and Fardon D. Hathaway, were appointed a committee to escort them to the free dominion of queen Victoria.—A subscription of about $20 was taken up to defray their expenses. The officers of the convention, were appointed a committee to correspond with ——— Darcy, of Baltimore, the individual who claimed these two men as human chatties."

"Baltimore, the neglected editor of the American Farmer, at Baltimore, will see that Mr. Dorey's $2,000 are gone, irretrievably. What is to be done about it?"

"To show how few less fanatics will make men to a contempt of the laws and constitution, I will quote what the constitution declare:

"No person shall to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, nor any other state, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."—Art. sec. 2, § 3, clause constitution U. S.

Those people who have nided to deny these negroes to Canada, in open violation of the constitution, which professes to protect the rights of every individual in his property, and this species of property especially, may see those negroes in a very different dress, if they would exchange in a way with England. The British colonies of Canada have a number of persons under arms, principally ran away slaves, who are seized as soon as they cross the line and placed in the ranks as regular soldiers.

too, of such gentlemen as have been most prominent and conspicuous in this protracted debate. I will read from the journal of this house, session of 1835, '36, January 18th, page 184, by which it will appear that on Amended and amended members voted for the rejection of abolition petitions, and only thirty-seven against rejecting; and the name of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), heads the list:

"Mr. Adams offered to present petitions from citizens of the county of Washington, in the state of Pennsylvania, which, he stated, prayed that slavery and the slave trade, within the District of Columbia, may be immediately abolished."

"Mr. McKean moved that said petitions be received; and on the question, shall these petitions be received?"

"A motion was made by Mr. Gideon Lee, that this question do lie on the table."

"A motion was then made by Mr. Wier, that there be a call of the house, which motion being decided in the negative, the question was put on the motion made by Mr. Lee, that the question, shall these petitions be received? do lie on the table; and passed in the affirmative: yeas 176, nays 37."

"The yeas and nays being decided in the affirmative, the yeas were—

Quits a scene here ensued; a dozen members rose to explain, and many crowded round Mr. Johnson to examine the journals, who yielded the door to Mr. Adams first, for an explanation.

Mr. Adams asked Mr. Johnson if he had read the memorial which had been rejected?

Mr. Johnson said he had neither read nor seen the memorial.

Mr. Adams said that he had voted against the reception, because the language of the memorial was disrespectful to the house; for it was impossible that he could have given such a vote, unless the memorial had contained improper language.

Mr. Johnson said he thought that he could assign a better reason than that.

Mr. Granger rose to explain, and Mr. Johnson yielded the floor.

Mr. Granger said that his recollection was the same with the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), that the memorial was discourteous in its terms, and such a paper as should not be received.

Mr. Johnson said, that from his knowledge of the gentleman who presented the memorial, he felt assured that he would not have offered to present a memorial which was not couched in respectful language; but that fact could be ascertained from the memorial itself, and he desired the clerk to withdraw it from the files, if it could be found, and sent it to the door.

Mr. Lincoln rose to explain. He said he did not agree with his colleagues, (Mr. Adams); that he had voted with the thirty-seven in the negative, but he was unwilling that the opinion should go forth, that "because the memorial contained improper language" he had not voted to lay on the table the motion to receive. His impression and his belief was that the language of the memorial was respectful and the memorial harmless, and therefore he had voted against laying the motion on the table.

Mr. Johnson said the remark of the gentleman was at least candid;—he believed the memorial harmless, and, therefore, he voted against laying on the table."

Mr. Pickens said that, as the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. Johnson), had turned father confessor to the house, and as he was one of those recorded in the negative, he would explain that he had voted in the negative because the proposition to lay the motion to receive on the table amounted, virtually, to a reception of the paper.

Mr. Johnson said the gentleman had made a strange confession, upon the meritorious efficacy of which, whether father confessor or not, he would not undertake to decide; but he would say, that the gentleman certainly deserved credit for the originality of the discovery, that a motion to lay "a motion to receive" upon the table, carried with it, as intimated to, a reception of the paper. It was the first time he had ever heard the idea advanced. To lay the motion on the table to receive was a positive rejection of the paper.

Mr. Vanderpool then rose to explain. He said he did not know whether he had a distinct recollection of what had occurred at that time; but, he could say that he was always opposed to abolition and its exiles, and that he had voted for the rejection of the memorial on the table. Abolition was one thing, the right of petition was another. He was in favor of settling this whole question, and never gave countenance to their agitators.

Mr. Hard, of New York, then rose to explain, and said that he had voted in the affirmative, but not because he understood the petition was couched in disrespectful terms.

Mr. Cushing, of Mass. then rose and said that, by way of explanation, he would read from the journal, but from some cause, or his connection therewith, was not distinctly heard by the reporter, from the confusion.

Mr. Johnson resumed, and said:

Mr. Speaker, I had I have fairly flushed a whole crew of members, and will take them one at a time, as Simon killed the wasps; yet if I find that sport too tedious and fatiguing, I will fire into the flock. The misfired confusion in the house, and the conversation around me, as also the distance of the gentleman from Mass. (Mr. Cushing), prevented my hearing what he said while he was on the floor. The point, if any of the explanation of the gentleman from Troy, (Mr. Hard), I could not comprehend, perhaps did not hear. The gentleman from Canada, I have alluded to, and may perhaps again. But a word more in relation to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Vanderpool). I must be excused for distinguishing him by the euphonious and poetic name of his residence, for I know not how else to designate the various members of the empire state who have explained. I mean the gentleman who, entation in the southern states, through the mails, of incendiary publications intended to instigate the slaves to insurrection.

Such, Mr. Speaker, was the language of the president of the United States, occasioned by the violent excitement then existing. And in the same session the postmaster general, in his annual communication, asked for the aid to suppress the insurrectionary communications sent through the mail, and calculated to excite servile war. He says:

"A new question has arisen in the administration of this department. A number of individuals have established an association in the northern and eastern states, and raised a large sum of money for the purpose of effecting the immediate abolition of slavery in the southern states. One of the means resorted to has been the printing of a large mass of newspapers, pamphlets, tracts and almanacs, containing exaggerated, and in some instances false, accounts of the treatment of slaves, illustrated with cuts, calculated to operate on the passions of the colored men, and produce discontent, assassination and servile war. These they attempted to disseminate throughout the slaveholding states by the agency of the public mails.

"As soon as it was ascertained that the mails contained these productions, great excitement arose, particularly in Charleston, S. C., and, to ensure the safety of the mails, the northern and eastern postmaster at that place agreed to retain them in his office until he could obtain instructions from the postmaster general. In reply to his appeal, he was informed that it was a subject upon which the postmaster general had no legal authority to interfere with him. The question again came up from the postmaster at New York, who had refused to send the papers by the steamboat mail to Charleston, S. C. He was also answered that the postmaster general possessed no legal authority to give instructions on the subject; but as the undersigned had no doubt that the circumstances of the case justified the detention of the papers, he did not hesitate to say so. Important principles are involved in this question, and it merits the grave consideration of all departments of the government.

"It is universally conceded that our states are united only for certain purposes. There are interests in relation to which they are believed to be as independent of each other as they were before the constitution was formed. The interest in which the people of some of the states have in slaves, is one of them. No state obtained, by the union, any right whatsoever over slavery in any other state; nor did any state lose any of its power over it within its own borders. On this subject, therefore, in the view he correct, the states are still independent, and may fence round and protect their interest in slaves by such laws and regulations as, in their sovereign will, they may deem expedient.

"We have the people of one state any more right to interfere with this subject in another state, than they have to interfere with the internal regulations, rights of property, or domestic policy, of a foreign nation. If they were to combine, and send papers among the laboring population of another nation, calculated to produce discontent and rebellion, their conduct would be good ground of complaint on the part of that nation; and in case it were not repressed by the United States, might be, if perseveringly persisted in, just cause of war. The mutual obligations of our several states to suppress attacks by their citizens on each other's reserved rights and interests would seem to be greater, because, by entering into the union, they have lost the right of refuge which belongs to nations wholly independent. Whatever claims they may be supposed to have, on the right of free discussion within their own borders, of the institutions and laws of other communities over which they have no rightful control, few will maintain that they have a right, unless it be obtained by the compact of treaty, to disseminate discussions within those communities, either orally or by the distribution of printed papers, particularly if it be in violation of their peculiar laws, and at the hazard of their peace and existence. The constitution of the United States guarantees to the citizens of each state the right to be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states; but this clause cannot confer on the citizens of one state higher privileges and immunities in another than the citizens of the latter themselves possess. It is not easy, therefore, to perceive how the citizens of the northern states can possess or claim the privilege of carrying on discussions within the southern states, by the distribution of printed papers, which the citizens of the latter are forbidden to circulate by their own laws.

"Neither does it appear that the United States acquired by the constitution any power whatsoever over this subject, except the right to prohibit the importation of slaves after a certain date. On the contrary, that instrument contains evidences that one object of the southern states, in adopting it, was to secure to themselves a more perfect control over this interest, and cause it to be respected by the sister states. In the exercise of their reserved rights, and for the purpose of protecting this interest, and ensuring the safety of their people, some of the states have passed laws prohibiting, under heavy penalties, the printing or circulation of papers like those in question, within their respective territories. It has never been alleged that these laws are incompatible with the constitution and laws of the United States. Nor have they been so alleged that they can be so, because they relate to a subject over which the United States cannot rightfully assume any control under that constitution, either by law or otherwise.

"If these principles be sound, it will follow that the state laws on this subject are, within the scope of their jurisdiction, the supreme laws of the land, obligatory alike on all persons, whether private citizens, officers of the state, or functionaries of the general government.

"The constitution makes it the duty of the United States 'to protect each of the states against invasion, and on application of the legislature, or of the executive, (when the legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.' There is no quarrel with the right of the states to violence comprehended in some of the states, as from the servile population operated upon by mistake or designing men. It is to obviate danger from this quarter, that many of the state laws, in relation to the circulation of incendiary papers, have been enacted. Without claiming for the general government the power to pass laws prohibiting discussions of any sort, as a means of protecting states from domestic violence, it may safely be assumed that the United States have no authority to interfere with the exercise of the lawfully known to be instrumental in producing, within the several states, the very mischief which the constitution commands them to repress. It would be an extraordinary construction of the powers of the general government, to maintain that the house should to afford the agency of the mails and post offices to contravert the laws of the states, in the circulation of papers calculated to produce domestic violence, when it would, at the same time, be one of their most important constitutional duties to prohibit the circulation of papers calculated to produce the same mischief. The nature of the necessary consequences produced by that very agency.

"The position assumed by this department is believed to have produced the effect of withholding its agency, generally, in giving circulation to the obnoxious communications. But, sir, the effect of the necessary means effectually to prevent, by legislative enactments, the use of the mails as a means of evading or violating the constitutional laws of the states, in reference to this portion of their reserved rights, a question which it appears to me is assigned, may be submitted to congress, upon a statement of the facts, and their own knowledge of the public necessity."

Such was the strong appeal made by the postmaster general, enforced as I have shown by the message of the president. But, sir, the terrors of carnage which had been done, the blood of innocence which had been spilt, spoke more eloquently to the nation, and the representatives of the people met here with the solemn impression on their minds, the spirit of patriotism was whispering to their hearts, the question which has been rejected here began again to calibrate their judgment. Public duty and public policy alike invoked this house to reject the memorial, which experience had shown to be fraught with so much danger, and one hundred and thirty-five members recorded their names upon the journal as have shown.

Such were the considerations which prompted the rejection of abolition memorials in 1838, and such a state of things would, I am quite sure, in the case of the present memorial, have effected rejection. But, sir, the course which gentlemen pursue in debate, the appeals which they address to the prejudices and passions of the people, may sooner or later effect another excitement of similar calamitous consequence. But if another insurrection break out, let me tell gentlemen that, though it may be as quickly suppressed, it will not be in their power so easily to quiet the alarms of the south. They will not remain passive under machinations which are calculated to give their homes to the flames, or to produce such a state of things as occurred in St. Domingo, the happy condition of which island has been allotted to in this debate by one neighbor, with a sort of fondlike triumph."

"Under the garb of pretended religion, the abolitionists would desecrate with blood the altar of the constitution, and this, too, in the most insidious form, by sending, in a secret and stealthy manner, their inflammatory

Mr. Speaker, every debate on this floor of the character of the present is an attack upon the foundation of the republic. No secret, no surreptitious speech which is made here dissolves, in some degree, that kindly feeling, that friendly relation, which is the strongest cement of the union; and a revolution must be the consequence. The public mind, once once more to be convulsed by an event as probable, will, for slight cause, act on the suggestion of its necessity. The fears already awakened will be magnified; and to relieve themselves from this feverish anxiety, the people of the south must seek peace and security by dissolving political connection with those who, by thus supporting the cause of abolition, show a recklessness of the peace and quiet of the south, and a disregard of all covenants under the constitution. Sir, I repeat to these gentlemen, your security depends in a great degree upon their non-interference. They have no right to meddle with the question of slavery; and I utterly deny the right of this house to discuss the subject. It is a violation of your sworn duty, for you have sworn to support slavery when you took the oath to support the constitution. You first divide yourselves with the belief that the question is harmless, although you have seen its evils, and then strive to appease its wrath with declamation about the rights of petition, and tell us that it is only the right of petition which is denied to the people. Let the memorials be received, and you will not ask that what they pray for be granted. Sir, I repeat that an avowal that only one member will vote for abolition is a pregnant and unanswerable argument in favor of promoting the abolition of the kind. If the right to petition was clear and beyond debate, would not the declaration, that but one man could be found, in forty years, so reckless as to vote for the prayer of the petitioners, be a convincing reason that these abolition memorials should not be received? And how does the force of the consideration increase, when the attempt to force the reception and consideration delays other business of the nation and endangers the very existence of the union? You give over to the people what we may not see the inferior, while we are pained by your queerness. You are for introducing your Trojan horse into our citadel, that armed men within may cut our throats at night when we are least expecting. You are contending for an abstraction, which you say is useless if it is granted; ry traces, appeals and miserable agents, in various disguises, among the slaves of the south. Although a party to the union, they are willing to outrage every written and unwritten law, to might learn better religion than they practice from the followers of Mahomet; and the south could more safely rely upon promising the abolition of the slave in the followers of the prophet, although he faith is, "that the fighting for religion is an act of obedience to God." But they are brave enough to front danger themselves, and to go on raising money, to secure murder and assassination by others to propagate their religion.

In the beginning of the seventh century, when Aboulsar succeeded Mahomet with the title of caliph, and commenced the conquest of Syria, and sent his army forward, he closed his instructions to his general by saying: "When you make any covenant or alliance, stand to it, and be as good as your word." The Damascus capitulated with Abu Obeid, one of the Saracen generals, to pay tribute and still enjoy their religion. As Ouseid entered one of the gates by capitulation. Ouseid, his principal associate, who was ignorant what his companion had done, forced the gates on the opposite side, and entered into the city, and, finding meaning his former companions in the middle of the city ordered them to desert, informing them of the conditious which he had entered into, stating to Golei, who preferred a general slaughter, as he had before the city, "that when I had made an agreement, I did not think that you would ever have attempted to make it void. But I have now seen that you have done so. I have given all these people my protection, and that in the name of God and his prophet; and all that were with me killed it and approved it, and we are not accustomed to part from our word." Those who were a part of the city by sworn still persisting in their slaughter, he threw himself between the Christians and his savage tribes, and was slain. The covenant was maintained, and Damascus to this day contains a population of twenty thousand Christians. More than a thousand years have rolled round, and this covenant is still preserved in its original purity; while hardly a half a century has elapsed since the revelation of the revelation, and these faithless men of the north grow evidence to the world that their word, their promise, their covenant is less sacred than that of the Mahometan.

How much blood has been shed—how much perfidy has been inflicted—how much misery has the human family suffered, and we are to this day, the consequence? Let the red and numerous pages of history answer.

whilst the defence itself is pregnant with incalculable mischief. You are widely pursuing a phantom, when each step forces you to trample on rights guaranteed by the constitution.

Mr. Speaker, if I were to ask these gentlemen there is any principle sound in moral philosophy which has no good in its application or in its end they would answer in the negative. In philosophy in morals, in ethics, in legislation, nothing can be good which is not useful and beneficent in its useful that was not utility and benefit in its end. Apply that principle to the present case, and you will find that the abolitionists are right. If you say, "Can you use would force upon you. If the end then, which the abolitionists seek is so mischievous, you should abandon the means so as not to reach the evil you say you would deplore. A man may be visionary and theoretical in private life, and yet not perhaps so in public. Weakness in public man is a vice, for vice and weakness differ only in the intention: their effect is alike mischievous. A man who is too weak or timid to do right does a negative wrong, which becomes a positive evil, and often a worse one. The abolitionists support the abolitionists are responsible to those who are too supine or timid to use any means or power which they may possess to say their views attempts, become either active or silent participants, and are almost equally responsible. By the course which gentlemen pursue, they not only make a mark of their own opinions, but upon the States. They force the slaveholding States to place new restraints upon him. His privileges are circumscribed, and his mental culture neglected, because you make speeches which would endanger the life of his master were he to read them. You make laws which would make tyrants of the slave, while the censures of his brethren in the States of the North, and the treatment falls upon you; you are the cause of the degradation of the slave, and the great degree of rigor towards him, whilst you pretend to have sympathy for him; you are responsible for the harshness of the laws of the South, and for the harshness of the treatment of the slave in the North. Instead of meeting this question at home, you transfer the scene of strife to this hall. You avoid the question where it should be met, and censured us because we tell you you have no right to interfere with the laws of your States, and you make us your avengers, because you are too timid to encounter your own turbulent constituents. You wish to please both but satisfy neither. The abolitionists go for universal emancipation, and every morning their house is flooded with the evidence of the fact, through their papers; yet you say you will compromise by only defending such petitions as claim to liberate slaves in the District of Columbia. You tell the north, but let their petitions be received and you will then unite in opposing their petition. You defend abolition by denuding their petition, and to avoid the true question you adopt the Machiavelian maxim, that you must first give the lie to your own conscience, before you can succeed in changing the drama, and sanctify the boldness of the right of petition, you virtually advocate the end and measure of the petition, and the whole question of slavery in the south narrows down to the issue which you make here. If you are right, then, abolition follows by the same means throughout the south. I am for meeting the question on the ramparts of the constitution; for I believe that slighted inroad over the constitution will not stand alone or unaided in this question. Two hundred and fifty members were never intended to be act over the people of this District as absolute masters, tyrants, disposers of the lives and property of the people, without restraint in the exercise of their capricious will or speculative theories. The people of this District never will give you jurisdiction over their property as a proof of their right to be taxed. You ask, for the jurisdiction, as one of old said, "for fire, earth and water; ask, too, as one of old did for the sword." You say, "I will give you the sword, as the head of the little republic which contained about the population of this District answered, 'come and take them.' Sir, the Persian war with its armed thousands, and left their bones to be trampled on by Grecian soldiers and Grecian slaves." Florida.

Let gentlemen remember it was not the actual oppression of Great Britain that caused the war in 1776; the revolution; it was the assumption of a right to tax, not the miserable pittance itself which was demanded. Common blood, common interests, united the people of the two countries; but the assumption of a right to assume the ligaments which united the thirteen colonies to the kingdom of the mother.

country. I ask gentlemen to reflect before they set up a right of jurisdiction over slave property, they may not cause similar results. The south is not to be united by common bonds, but by common interests, but they are bold and fearless people are not to be trifled with. Take warning, by this act, for you know not how quickly you may cause another separation. I am sure that the people of the north are divided by political feelings; on this question they all feel and think alike, and if you force the necessity, they will act alike. Mr. Speaker, I cannot separate an abolitionist from a fanatic. I cannot separate a man out a refinement which belongs only to a capitalist. The distinction which gentlemen draw is theoretical. The application of their remarks goes really to the heart of the matter. It is not a question of mischief which it produces. They agonize us with their speeches, yet rebuke us if we complain.—They would keep our minds on a Procrustean bed, and make them all of one size, and of the most vicious dimensions. But if all this is sport to them in the language of the fable, it is death to us. Sir, for one I repeat, I am tired with this siren song and I would rather please, but to decide, and charm me, than to destroy.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I have thus freely and frankly expressed my sentiments in reference to the conduct of those who agitate the question of abolition, I rejoice to say that there are men in this country, north and south, who are not only sensible of the violation of the south and the constitution, and to the injury and abuse the public mind of misapprehension on the subject of slavery. Among the distinguished individuals of the South, Mr. Austin, of Texas, is pre-eminently conspicuous, and he has been here to quote the following remarks from his review of the rev. Dr. Channing's letter on the slavery question:—
We, of New England, are as essentially parties to the guilt of the slave as the slaveholders of the South themselves; because we have secured to ourselves, and do actually partake the fruits, profits, and enjoyments of slavery, and can, therefore, have no moral right to interfere with our associates in the same course. Let us wash our own hands of the guilt-fulfilling iniquity!

"Our political duties are regulated by the constitution of the United States, and are to be determined by correct views of the principles and doctrine it contains.

"This constitution recognizes the existence of slavery in the United States. It provides for the continuance and security of the institution. It holds us as parties to it. Most of us have sworn to support this constitution. All of us are bound to do so, whether under oath or not. We enjoy its blessings. We partake of the advantages, which we exacted in return for the concessions we have made. We possess what we purchased in the freshness and fullness of our contract, and it is a base and false policy, or a vulgar and ungenerous and disgraceful fraud to tell us hypocritically that we are not parties to it, that only free citizens are of the price

"The morality which, under these circumstances enforces our interference with the southern institutions of slavery, is the morality of teaching us to violate our solemn contracts; it is the morality of sharpening that huckstering ingenuity which has been too justly ascribed to the Yankee pedlar, or hokier, to both ends of the bargain.

"There is no higher morality than that which enjoins fidelity to contracts—fidelity in the spirit as well as the letter; and no sneerer chicanery or fraud than that which attempts to creep from their obligation by keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. We need not enumerate the provisions of the constitution already adverted to in order to ascertain our duty as faithful citizens, because there is a broader and more expansive principle of honesty. We know what was intended at the time of the contract. We know its claims, the interest secured by Deeds, and the abolitionists had been proposed and insisted on in the convention, so constitution could have been formed.

"But the constitution exists, and we are at this moment reaping its advantages, and yet it is seriously proposed, as a matter of moral duty, so to interfere with its establishments, as to deprive one of the contracting parties of the advantages it secures to them. We eschew all such morality.

"But this interference is only by moral suasion. It only goes to persuade the southerner to enfranchise his slaves. An excuse this, the very quintessence of jesuitism. We exhibit the slaveholder to the world as a thief, a robber, a spoiler of other men's property—grossly guilty of immorality and crime. We venture to affirm that each one is marked by a felon's 'brand,' which the fame and talent of the most exalted of their statesmen cannot conceal; we send forth our missionaries upon their borders to play upon the passions of the servile class and encourage them to 'reek through blood a slaughter their long lost liberty.' We warn the peaceful citizens in the same way our would-be alarmed if a menagerie was to be turned loose in the population in our streets; we compel them to change their minds, to stand aside from the carnal pleasures, to restrict the indulgence of the slaves, lest insurrection should follow, cause naturally calculated, but not indeed intended, to produce it; we destroy, by the natural action of human passions, all kindness, sympathy and friendship between the two great sections of our citizens. We have thus succeeded in the perpetuation of the Immoral south, and spread broadcast the seeds of strife, jealousy and revenge, and all that we call a moral situation—deep reverence for the laws of God, commanded by pure morality, kindness, good will and brotherly love—the obligations of the Christian religion, and the rights of the human soul. It is not calculated to bring religion into scorn, it is only because we take our choice between fanaticism and hypocrisy.

"These considerations confirm our opinion that the citizens of the free states have no right to interfere with a southern domestic institution. To deal with the products of slave labor is to uphold and permit it. We are under no contract, and no political obligation to deal in these products. We have increased to an immense extent our demand for these products during our ignorance and delusion on the subject of slavery. New lands have been planted, new slaves have been bred, and new money has been paid for cotton and wool, and the demand for domestic slave trade, in separating families, and in encouraging the breeding of slaves."

"By our own demand, the value of slaves in the United States, which was in 1830 but five hundred millions of dollars, has now increased to twice that amount. Our factories for the employment of slaves, and our commerce with the slave country. We boast of them. Our secretaries of state reported the investment of our capital in the slave States of Massachusetts alone to be about sixteen millions of dollars, and our annual dealing with one single article, the product of slave labor, to be to the extent of twenty million dollars. We have a direct agency of twenty one thousand citizens. Of the navigating interest concerned, we have an equal amount, and of the indirect connexion which it has in every department of industry, we can form no estimate. The great amount is the wages of crime and sin and iniquity." All this was the monstrous Moloch of slavery. Our happiness is bound up with it. It is the prosperity and civilization of life and we have erroneously believed, but now we find it is the deadly fire in the garden of our Eden. We

"The tremendous sacrifice thus demanded of us is nothing, absolutely nothing, to that which we demand of our fellow citizens of the south. But we put it to the conscience of our own citizens, and to the letter writer himself, whether we are not as much engaged in supporting slavery as they are, whether it we have discovered its sin and they have not, we can enjoy its profits and rail at them for not breaking it up!"

Such a Mr. Speaker, are the views of the writer whom I have quoted, and I am happy to believe that they are the views of a large portion of the well-thinking and well disposed citizens of the north. The three millions of slaves held in the southern states are the principal capital of the people of the south, and upon whom they depend for the principal resource of the soil, while the principal staple of the manufacturing enterprises and industry of the north. But if the people of the north are really in earnest; if they find that by the contract under the constitution they are aiding and abetting the south in maintaining the institution of slavery; if they find that the institution is a curse and a sin, and that as a consequence of this they cannot any longer consent to it and admit its continuance; if they are tired of the union; if their family and ours, their servants and ours, cannot agree, let them tell us so frankly and in good brotherhood, and we will say, as did one of our fathers, "let us part in peace." (The speaker then said, "You go to the left and we will take the right.") Our blessing will be upon you, but let us part in peace.

Be honest and be manly. Tell us you cannot live with us, but do not insult us with your memorial and with your speeches. Yes, sir, let them peacefully, quietly and firmly exercise the powers which belong to them. Let them propose the means, and prepare the way, for a dissolution of that political government under which they can no longer conscientiously live. Let no memorials of the past or hopes of the future divert them from their undertaking. Let them forget the admonitions of all past times—the histories of all other governments.

CHRONICLE.

THE ABOLITION ELECTIONAL TICKET. It is a singular coincidence, that the number of votes given for the electoral ticket in Pennsylvania was exactly the same as the majority which the Harrison ticket obtained over the Van Buren ticket in that state—that is, three hundred and forty-three.

APPALACHICOLA, FLORIDA, according to the recent census, has 1,022 inhabitants.

BANK ARRANGEMENT FOR THE RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS. It appears to be understood on all hands that the banks that have suspended, will severally resume specie payments on or about the 1st of January.

The New York Express of Saturday, the 11th, says:—"The Boston capitalists and banks have been called on by the local banks in the city of Philadelphia, for a loan of two and a half millions of dollars, in post notes, having twelve and eighteen months to run, and bearing an interest of 6 per cent. This loan they have accepted, and have invited the New York banks to participate in the loan, to the extent of a million of dollars. The loan is to be made in Philadelphia funds, and the post notes to be made payable in New York. The banks have readily agreed to take their part. The Bank of Commerce has taken more, viz: $250,000—the Merchants' and Mechanics' $100,000 each—the Phoenix, State and City all mine, so that the sum will be made up without the slightest difficulty, and the amount will not give any inconvenience, as the New York banks have full a million of dollars in balances lying dead in Philadelphia, on which they have not for a long time received any interest; and the Boston banks have, no doubt, quite as large a sum lying dead. This arrangement is most desirable for all parties."

The Baltimore banks are to be in a condition to resume. The Louisville Advertiser states that the banks of Kentucky have been ready for some time to resume. The Little Rock Gazette states that the banks of Arkansas will resume on the 1st of January.

BEANS. Among the standing products of New England, next to ice and pumpkins, beans take the lead. Vessels fitted out in that part of the country carry a barrel of beans to every half barrel of bread, and a quintal of codfish to every ton of pork. G. L. A. Beverly captain once hoisted his colors at half mast on the wide ocean, and thus operated on the humanity of another captain, who came down and boarded him. There was found bread enough, war enough, fish enough, beef and pork enough—but only three barrels of beans for ten men, who had yet a month's passage before them. It is unnecessary to say that the circumstances of the case authorized the signal of distress.

CAMDEN, N. J. has a population of 3,360.

CATTLE. The supply in the Baltimore market is large. Of 1,300 head offered, $90 sold at from $4 25 to $6 per 100 lb.

THE COTTON MANUFACTURES OF BELGIUM, employs a capital of $11,250,000. The produce of the looms two years since amounted to a million and a half pieces of ginghams or calicoes, and 100,000 pieces of printed cottons. There has been an increase of 20 per cent. since. The number of spindles is 400,000. In 8 factories in Switzerland there were in 1836, 605,652 spindles. Since that time 39 or 40,000 spindles have been added, and two new factories recently completed, one of which contains 100 to 150,000, and the other 80,000 spindles. Some of these spindles are worked by males, and others by water power, which the mountain torrents afford to any extent. The factories in the single canton of Zurich, consume 40,000 cwt. of raw cotton annually, and employ 20,000 workmen.

Cotton spinning is greatly encouraged by the Austrian government. There are now upwards of 600,000 spindles and new mills in the course of erection. The raw cotton is brought all the way from Trieste on wheels.

COUNTERFEITS. One hundred dollar bills have been circulated on the Commercial bank of Lake Erie. Letter A No. 433, January 10, 1839. The signature of T. P. Handy, cashier, badly executed and mis-spelled.

Notes of the Consolidated bank of New Orleans of $50, have been altered to $100, and are circulating in that city.

DR. ELDREDGE, who was accused of a number of forgeries, has been tried at Philadelphia, and obtained a verdict of not guilty.

EMIGRANTS. The number of passengers which arrive at New York from the 1st of January to the 1st November, is 57,096. In one instance a entire community, having persons of all trades arrived, and are now settled on the bank of the Ohio.

EXCHANGE, New York on Philadelphia 23; on Baltimore 12½; Richmond 3; Augusta 5½; New Orleans 12½; Cincinnati 5½.

FLOUR. There has been no material variation in prices since our last quotations.

The quantity of flour and wheat delivered from the Erie canal, during the first week in November, the places named below, is as follows:

	Bris. flour.	Dutch wheat.
Schenectady,	1,791	1,803
West Troy,	23,244	27,038
Albany,	62,883	29,197

Total, 88,718 68,339

At Baltimore prices remain at $1 87½, for the wagons and $1 94 from the stores, for good brands. The stock is light. Inspection of the week 9,008 Howard street, 8 543 city mills, and 369 Susquehanna—total 18,226 bbls. and 534 half bbls.

At Cincinnati $3 62½ 75.

HAMILTON, COUNTY, OHIO, has a population, including Cincinnati, of 10,150.

HATCHING EGGS BY ART. Above 30,000 birds, chiefly the common fowl, have been hatched by the cold-water, in Fall Mall, during the last year. It has but lately become the public. The eggs used have exceeded 40,000, being a failure of about one-fourth. Most of the birds are reared and fatten well, the average loss being less than in the farm yard.

LAND SALES. The amount of money received for public lands in ten days' sale, in Burlington, Iowa—total 18,226 bbls. and 534 half bbls.

MONEY MARKET. There is more demand for money at New York, though the banks complain of the want of good paper.—At Richmond, they say they are easy, and quote Farmers bank stock at 99½.

MORMON CONFERENCE. The rapid increase of this society is one of the wonders of the day. It is said that they now have thirty-one hundred thousand members. The Quincy Ill. Whig says: "This people held a conference at Nauvoo, on Saturday last, which continued three days. It is estimated that there were not far from three thousand in attendance. A gentleman who was present, speaks in the highest terms of the appearance of the immense assembly, and the good order which prevailed. The mild and humane principles which abound among this people are having their just and proper effect upon the people. Their society is not only increasing its numbers, but individually their condition is greatly improved, surrounded as they are by the gift of an overruling power. We learn that they are expecting a large accession to their numbers in a short time from England—one of their preachers, a Mr. Turley, having met with distinguished success in that country."

John C. Kennott, quartermaster general of Illinois, was baptized at Nauvoo, in the belief of the Latter Day Saints, (Mormon faith) one day last week.

THE OHIO RIVER having swollen some eight or ten feet, was in navigable order at Maysville on the 7th instant.

OIL TRADE. Within the last three months 22,000 barrels of oil has been exported from New Bedford, at a good profit, to the north of Europe, and $900,000 worth of sperm oil to Great Britain.

ORANGE CROP. The Apalachicola, Florida Advertiser of the 31st October says:—"The Orange crop of this year, raised in this territory, will be worth $200,000. Heretofore that amount, and a much greater has been paid to Havana for that article of consumption."

PITTSBURGH. The late census exhibits the population of the city of Pittsburgh to be 21,296; in 1830 it was 14,647, showing an increase of 6,999. Allegheny city contains a population of 10,091, being an increase of 7,240 since 1830, when it was only 2,851.

RAIN. The rain which was pouring upon us during the whole of election day was one of the most copious which has happened for some time. In the space of thirty-six hours, it fell to the depth of 4 43 inches, which is the greatest quantity which has fallen within the same space of time for several years past. [Boston Daily Adc.]

REMAINS OF GENERAL MERKEL. The remains of this hero of the revolution which were entombed in the burial ground of Christ church in this city, are to be removed to Laurel Hill cemetery on Thursday the 26th inst. and a monument erected there to his memory. On the occasion there will be a civic and military procession. We have not been advised of the details of the arrangement, but learn that the St. Andrew's society will participate in the ceremonies. [Philadelphia Gazette.]

STEAMERS. The steamer President having refilled and replenished her stock of fuel, left N. York on the 11th for Liverpool. A few of the passengers that had embarked on the 1st last bar, but a greater number of new ones joined her. Mr. Jaudon is on board.

The steamship Columbia is about to run regularly between Havana, Charleston and New Orleans.

The Acadia reached Halifax on the 3d inst. in 42 hours from Boston, and sailed the same day for Liverpool, with 15 additional passengers.

A gentleman from London is said to have made a contract for the exclusive navigation of steamers up the Amazon for 45 years, and is negotiating for a communication, by steam, between England and Brazil.

THE STEAMSHIP CATA. The New York Evening Post says:—"The jury have rendered a verdict of not guilty in the case of captains Roe and Hancock, of the steamboats De Witt Clinton and Napoleon, indicted for having wantonly propped their boats into collision on the 13th of June last."

SPOKESMEN. A company of Englishmen, who, some months ago passed through Louisiana on a hunting excursion to the far west, returned on the 9th inst. in fine spirits and improved health.

STOCKS. United States bank shares, in N. York 67½; in Philadelphia 68.

SPECIE. The last Havre packet from N. York, took out $300,000. The Sampson which sailed on the 12th for London, took out $29,000.

SOUTHWAKE, PENNSYLVANIA, contains a population of 27,502, being an increase of 6,703 since 1830.

THE TEXIAN NAVY. The annual cost for supporting the Texian navy, with its present number of vessels, is estimated at $671,879 50.

TEMPERANCE. The Innis settlement temperance society, near Galena, Ill. was organized a year since, by one individual who had been for several years a confirmed sot. It now numbers about 100 members.

TOBACCO. Shippers having generally supplied their orders for the season, the demand last declined, without however as yet materially affecting prices; quotations remain unchanged.

TIDE. An extraordinary high tide occurred on the Atlantic coast last week. On Tuesday the 16th instant, it visited the eastern coast and reached the Chesapeake on the 11th and 12th. The Barnstable Patriot of the 10th says: "The tide in this harbor is now at its full height, with a severe gale blowing from the northeast. The tide is said to be a foot higher now than ever before known here. Our wharves are all swept, and we fear a considerable damage along the shores of the cape, though we have heard of none yet."

In Portland, the tide rose three feet above the ordinary high water mark. It was, as much above the height of ordinary mean tides in Boston, and done considerable damage on the wharves both there and at New York. The Newburyport Herald says:—"Mr. George, the keeper of the lights on Plum Island, writes us that one hundred feet of the island, upon an average, has washed away since the late storm commenced."

WASHINGTON, D. C. The value of real and personal property within the limits of Washington, is estimated at $10,447,000.

WEATHER. Snow fell at Baltimore on the 19th instant, during the whole day.

WESLEYAN CENTENARY FUND. It is stated that the amount collected on the 1st and second instalments of the Wesleyan centenary fund, up to the 19th of October, was £137,453 2s. 6d. or about $762,096 72.

WHEAT. At Rochester 77 cents. It remains at from 90 to 100 cents in the Baltimore market, and nearly 40,000 bushels of Pennsylvania were sold on the 16th and 17th instant, at from 95 to 102. At Richmond it is quoted at $1 00½ 15.

WHEELING. The census complete of the inhabitants of Wheeling and suburbs, exhibits a total of 2,793. Of this number 873 are negroes, 107 of whom are slaves.

WOOL. The stock of fine qualities in the Baltimore market is small, but there is a good supply of native and tub-washed at $24 25 cents.

WORCESTER, MASS. contains a population of 7,340.

"The captain of the Cyclops has confirmed the rising of nearly the whole of the inhabitants of the mountains."

It would thus appear that the eastern question, so far as Syria is concerned, is pretty well settled, and that the only point which now remains for discussion is, whether the dechance of Mehmet Ali from the pashalic of Egypt shall or shall not be enforced.

On Friday last, at noon, as the New York packet ship South America, captain Bailey, which sailed from New York on the 3d instant, and arrived at Toulon on Saturday, was entering the channel, she was suddenly fired into by a small vessel resembling an English yacht. Three shots were fired, the third striking the vessel on the quarter.—Captain Bailey then lay to; but two more shots were fired after that. A man in the strange vessel then entreated captain Bailey to let his destination and business, and so forth; and then the yacht made off. The same vessel was seen to come on English barge to heave to and hold her in parley for half an hour.

CHINA.

The ship Ann McKim, at New York, brings advices from Canton to the 25th June.

The news is of the highest importance to the civilized and commercial world.

We have gathered a variety of extracts from Canton papers, for the New York Herald, exhibiting some of the greatest military movements that has taken place in Asia, since the era of Ghengis Khan, of Alexander the great, or of Mahomet and the Caliphs.

The first portion of the British naval forces from India, arrived on the 9th of June in the Chinese waters, consisting of the Wellsey 74, Alligator 24, Cruiser 16, with some armed steamers, with some 14 transports with troops.

A regular blockade of the river and port of Canton was notified to take effect on the 25th June, by the commander of the Wellsey, J. J. Gordon Bremer, who is senior officer until the arrival of admiral Elliot.—The Chinese, on the arrival of the squadron, attempted to burn the ships by fire-raids—but they were quietly towed ashore by the boats of the squadron.

Foreign ships would be allowed to depart unless detained by the Chinese.

A cargo of poisoned tea, packed in small parcels, to be sold to the sailors, had, it was reported, been sent down by the Chinese.—It was, however, captured by pirates, and sold to the people, on the coast, among whom, in consequence, there had been many deaths.

A part of the squadron had proceeded to the north, the object being, as is announced, to proceed to the Tychoo district, in the province of Che-kan;—in other words, "the island of Chusan." This is a "fair, fertile, and populous district," and would be easily subdued.

Every one was preparing to leave Canton, and all foreign business would be wound up in eight or ten days.

Up to the 25th inst. no other hostilities had occurred.

It was reported in Canton that an edict was just published, offering rewards for capt. Elliot, and the rest of the English, dead or alive.

The appearance was, that no negotiation would be brought about, nor any efficient action on the part of the British beyond the blockade, for some months, as the fleet which sailed for the north could not well get back if it should try.

The stock of tea at Canton was entirely exhausted.

Macon, June 28, 1840. Since writing the proceedings yesterday, the April overland mail has closed, and we understand it has been determined that the force shall move immediately to the north, without attacking the Bogue forts. The reason of this must be the importance of immediately landing the troops, and putting the transports out of the range of the typhoon. It is whispered that the Chinese are preparing to resist the English, somewhere in the neighborhood of Peking, meanwhile Canton river is to be strictly blockaded, and all imports and exports stopped. But it is thought that ships already in the river will be allowed to come out, unless prevented by the Chinese. We have accounts from Canton, 20th June, all parties were proposing to leave, and the whole business would be finished there in ten days, by which time the Canton empire, to empire for force would be despatched. We are not yet aware if it is intended to send the Panama up. The blockade is to commence on the 28th inst. The Ann McKim sails to-morrow.

We think there is every reason to anticipate a long and tedious trade, say from six to eight months. The feeling there was, that they had naval force enough, but that they were in want of some land force; and as they have not frightened the Chinese as much as they expected, we think they will have to wait until next season.

"Arrival of the English. The list of arrivals in the Chinese waters has reference to the most important event that it has ever been our fortune to record in the pages of the Canton Register; the presence of an armed British force in the Chinese waters, for the purpose of opening up the British subjects and the restitution of spoiled British property."

The first arrival of this armament was H. M. ship Alligator, 28—Kuper, exq. captain, on the 25th inst. It was the 9th inst. in the Canton waters at the very moment that the Chinese officers had sent to about eighteen fire-raids, constructed of old outside fishing boats and some cargo boats, chained together two and two, and filled with combustible matter of all description, to burn the British shipping.

The fleet did not suffer any damage from these raids, set alight before the wind and tide; and they were speedily towed on shore by the boats of the squadron.

Thus at the very instant of his arrival, captain Kuper found his countrymen and the Chinese engaged to hostilities.

We may here repeat that previous to this third attempt to burn the English fleet, the Chinese government had sent a boat-load of poisoned tea, packed in small parcels, to be sold to the sailors; this nefarious attempt it is reported was thus discovered: The boat was captured by pirates, who dealt their cargo in their fellow countrymen; many deaths followed in consequence of its poisonous tea; so many, indeed, that it is said the attention of the district magistrate was drawn to the circumstances. Thus truly,

—Even handed justice
Commands the ingredients of their poisoned chalice
To their own lips.

The Alligator brought the overland mail of the 4th of March, and was followed by the hon. E. I. company's armed steamer Madagascar, captain Dico, which vessel arrived on the 6th inst. On the 15th and 20th, H. M. ship Alligator and H. C. ship Madagascar, respectively, anchored in the roads and saluted the city of Macao with 19 guns, which on both occasions was immediately returned by the Franciscan fort.

H. M. ship of the line Wellsey, bearing the British pennant of commodore sir James J. Gordon Bremer, K. B. K. C. H. commanding in chief of the Indian station, arrived last Sunday, the 21st instant, with H. M. ships Cruiser, Algerine, Battlesnake, troop ship, the H. E. I. company's armed steamers Queen and Atlanta, and eighteen sail of the line in company, having on board H. M. 40th, 26th, (Cammerons) 18th (royal Irish) the Sepoy volunteers from Calcutta, and a detachment of sappers and miners from Madras. We are happy to report that the troops have arrived in the highest condition of health and spirits, under the command of col. Burrell; but our readers will regret to learn that col. Oglander of the Cammerons is indisposed.

On Monday evening two of the squadron, with some of the transports, proceeded to the northward, this morning H. M. S. Wellsey, with the rest of the squadron, except those heretofore mentioned, stopped to the southward to join the transports said to be outside, after which junction the whole squadron and transports will proceed to the northward, (capt. M. ship Det. Volo, Hyacinth, Larne and the H. company's named steamer Madagascar, remain to enforce the blockade of the river and port of Canton by all its entrances, which blockade is to be established under the strictest form on Sunday next the 28th inst.

Two transports with troops are also left under the command of the senior officer, probably with a view of protecting this settlement, or to interior operations in this province on the arrival of admiral Elliot.

The rev. Charles Gutzlaff, second interpreter to H. M.'s commission in China has joined the Wellsey and Mr. John Robert Morrison, the chief interpreter, remian, to join admiral the honorable Geo. Elliot, who is due here with his suite, on the 28th inst. either direct from the Cape of Good Hope, or from Trincomalee. The Blenheim 72, Blonde 42, Nimrod 20, Wanderer 18, and the Pyrites 18, have sailed; and Pique 42, Inconstant 36, Andromache 26, and Hyacinth, a frigate, are expected to join H. E. in the Indian sea.

This island bears nearly the same relation to the province of Chekeang as the Isle of Wight does to Hampshire. In possession of this fair, fertile and populous spot, as the chief quarters—and the military possession of this district would be a severe blow to the imperial government, for part of the celestial territory would then be in the hands of strangers—from thence a mission might be sent to the Pei-ho, or north river, which is navigable for large boats up to the city of Tientsin—chowfoo, 12 miles N. by S. from Peking. We have little doubt that such a mission be sent, as a politic and friendly preliminary proceeding becoming a civilized nation and the high standing of England, it will fall; no answer will be given, much less positive and satisfactory answers. It will be ordered away; H. M. ships will be ordered to leave the Chinese waters, and the British troops to evacuate Tientsin; then, perhaps the imperial dragon may deign to give an answer, but not till then. In the present emergency, it rests with the commanders in chief, to take such measures to compass the objects of the expedition, which are, in the language of lord John Russell, to obtain reparation for the insults and injuries offered to her majesty's subjects, by the Chinese government; and in the second place, they are to obtain security for the merchants trading with China, an indemnification for the loss of their property, incurred by threats of violence offered by persons under the direction of the Chinese government; and, in the last place, they were to obtain certain and satisfactory answers. LATER.

The steamship Great Western arrived at New York on the 24th inst. 17 days from Bristol, bringing London papers of the 6th, and Bristol of the 9th.

The allied forces in Syria, aided by a formidable insurrection of the inhabitants, had in a pitched battle routed the Egyptians under Ibrahim pasha, son of Mehmet Ali, who were fled to the mountains with but 200 followers. The English were besieging St. Jean De Acre.

Private letters state that gen. Hamilton had on the 6th of the 5th concluded a treaty with lord Palmerston, by which England recognizes the independence of Texas, and assumes the task of mediating between Texas and Mexico.

ENGLAND.

Her majesty was married on the 8th of February, people are beginning to expect almost daily, reports of the appearance of the prince of Wales. A prince is most ardently wished for by her majesty, rejoicings will be on a much more extensive scale than in that event, than though the stranger should prove to be of the opposite sex.

The express with the speech of Louis Philippe reached London in 22 hours.

Sir Anthony Carlisle, the celebrated surgeon died on the 24th inst. in the 73d year of his age.

There had been no material change in the markets, except remaining scarce and dear. The duty on wheat is 28s. 8d. per quarter, and on flour 14s. 2d. per bbl. The value of four duty paid is 32s. 6d. 32s. 6d.; and in bond 28s. 2d. 32s. 6d. per bbl. The demand very limited.

The effect of the exceedingly stringent measures on the part of the Bank of England, for contracting the circulation, has been much more sensibly felt during the present week than previously, particularly at Manchester, which may account for the less favorable aspect of the cotton market, the prices of goods and yarns being greatly depressed.

Cotton, was in fair demand; prices had improved slightly for a day or two, but again declined, and at the latest dates was quoted as dull. At Liverpool, 4,000 bales were sold on the 4th, and 3,500 bales on the 5th inst.

The sales for the week ended this day, amount to 17,780 bales, of which 2,900 are opland at 556 $\frac{1}{2}$, 2,640 Orleans at 567 $\frac{1}{2}$, 5,150 Alabama and Mobile at 424 $\frac{1}{2}$, 620 Sea Island at 124 $\frac{1}{2}$, 189d. per lb. and about 1,200 bales were taken on speculation early in the week, said to be on American account.

The stock in this port is now estimated at 453,000 bales, against $11,000 at same period last season; the stock of American is about 365,000 or 85,000 more than it then was.

Tobacco. The supplies had nearly all been taken off, but there had been arrivals. Virginia was in a good condition. In Carolina rice there was no alteration, the quotation being 13¢. In American potatoes there was nothing doing.

The young queen of Spain, made her entry into Madrid, on 28th October, accompanied by ge. Estarero. She was well received.

FRANCE.

A disaffection between the parties that had constituted the Thiers ministry had weakened their opposition forces and it was now probable that the new ministry would have a majority of twenty in the chamber—upon the choice of president, however, the king opened the sessions in person, on the 5th with a speech, the tone of which confirmed the favorable operations in the funds and quieted all fears of a war. The whole business of Paris was foot on the occasion of the late session, the other half in barracks. Everything remained quiet.

Speech of the king of the French.

"Gentlemen peers and deputies: I have felt the necessity of assembling you round me before the ordinary period of the session of the chambers. The measures which the emperor of Austria, the queen of Great Britain, the king of Prussia, and the emperor of Russia have taken in concert, to regulate the relations between the sultan and pasha of Egypt, have induced me to do so. I have the dignity of our country at heart as much as its security and repose. In persevering to this moderate and conciliatory policy of which we have reaped the fruit for the last ten years, I have placed France in a position to face the chances which the course of events in the east may produce. The extraordinary credits which have been opened with this intention will be submitted to you, and you will appreciate the logic of them.

"I continue to hope that the general peace will not be disturbed. It is necessary for the general and common interests of Europe, the happiness of its population, and the progress of civilization. I depend upon you to sustain the peace which should rely upon the honor of France, and the rank which she holds among nations, commanded us to make our efforts.

"Peace is re-established in the north of Spain, and we congratulate ourselves on that happy result. We should be with grief that the evils of anarchy came to replace those of civil war.

"I have the most sincere interest in Spain; may the stability of Isabella II. and of the institutions which ought to sustain the throne, preserve this noble country from the long and grievous evils of revolutions.

"Not having obtained from the Argentine republic the satisfaction which we have claimed, I have ordered that my forces should be added to the squadron charged to ensure respect for our rights, and protection for our interests.

"Success has crowned several important expeditions to Africa, where the valor of our soldiers has been signalled—two of my sons have partaken their perils. Exertions are still necessary to guarantee in Algeria the safety and prosperity of our establishments. My government will know how to accomplish this task with the least delay.

"The city of Boulogne has been the theatre of a foolish attempt, which has only served again to call forth the devotion of the national guards, of the army, and of the population. All ambition will fall against a monarchy founded and defended by the all-powerful expression of the national will.

"The budget law will soon be submitted to your examination. I have prescribed the most severe economy in the establishment of the ordinary expenses—Events have imposed upon us unexpected charges. I have the confidence that public prosperity, at its extreme pitch, will permit us to support them, without affecting the state of our finances.

"Other dispositions which I have presented in you of public utility, in behalf of literature and education.

"Gentlemen: I have never claimed with more earnestness and confidence your loyal co-operation. Anarchical passions have not been discouraged by impolicy. Under whatever form they may be presented, my government will find in the existing laws, and to the firm maintenance of the public liberties, the necessary arms to put them down. As for me, in the trials imposed on me by Providence, I can only be grateful for the protection which it has not ceased to throw over me, as well as my family, and to prove to France, by a never failing attention to her interests and happiness, the gratitude which is in me by the testimonial of affection with which it surrounds me in these cruel moments."

There have been fearful inundations in the south of France, owing to the overflowing of the Rhone and Saone. In the lower town of Lyons, many houses and much property was damaged, and the country around was under water.

The French steamer Tage had arrived at Havre, from St. Petersburg, with eight magnificent horses from Copenhagen, which are to be sold in France on which the remains of Napoleon will be carried from the Seine to the Invalides.

SYRIA.

From the Malta Times, Oct. 27.

On the 10th instant, an engagement took place between the allied troops and those of Ibrahim and Soliman pasha, in which the latter were completely defeated, and took to the mountains with 200 cavalry and only two officers. Seven thousand in killing, wounds and prisoners, from the result of this engagement, falls into the power of the sublime port.

Emir el Kasim has been named successor to the emir Bechir, and with a large body of mounted troops, to chase the army of Ibrahim pasha, who has little or no chance of escape.

We are in possession of Beyout, which was evacuated on the night of the 10th, in consequence of a disposition manifested by Stopford and Handford to send troops, to chase the army of Ibrahim pasha, who has little or no chance of escape. The sick were beaten out with sticks by their countrymen. About 2,000 in all, who remained outside the walls, re-entered the next morning, and surrendered themselves prisoners. Gen. Smith has fixed his headquarters at Beirout.

The camp at Djani bay is broken up. The only vessels now remaining there are vice admiral Walker's and two Turkish frigates, one of which, with 800 prisoners on board, is to be sent immediately to Constantinople.

Commodore Napier, in the Powerful, and the steamers Gorgon and Cyclops, have quitted Djani bay to attack Tripoli.

By the taking of Beyout about twenty pieces of artillery, with ammunition and provisions, have fallen into the possession of the allied powers.

The defeat of Ibrahim pasha. The pitched battle with Ibrahim pasha afforded an excellent opportunity to an army of 8,000 men, to destroy the army of Ibrahim pasha on every strong position near Beyout with 3,000 men. Four thousand Turks were sent against him under the command of Selim pasha, assisted by gen. Jackson, commodore Napier, and the English navy. The battle was fought on the 10th of October, and the army of Ibrahim pasha was completely routed.

One thousand Egyptians were made prisoners, the rest were killed and wounded, or took to flight. With respect to the general war, the Egyptian army, at the moment of calculation, has lost 20,000 in killed wounded, prisoners and deserters.

A supplement of the Eco de Orient, published at Smyrna on the 12th ult., contains the following news from Syria: "On the morning of the 4th ult., the Ottoman army, under the orders of the shouk Francis and George, attacked Osman pasha and forced him to abandon his camp, containing his provisions and ammunition. In consequence of this defeat Osman pasha fled to Balbeck, where he arrived with only 1,000 men; the remainder either deserted or were killed, wounded and made prisoners.

On the 6th ult. 800 deserters from Osman pasha's corps arrived at the camp of Djani. Osman pasha was pursued by the mountaineers, and there is no doubt that he suffered severely before he arrived in the plain.

All the north of Mount Lebanon, with the exception of Tripoli, is in the power of the insurgents. The emir Bechir, who has been for some time in communication with the allies, concluded a convention on the 8th ult. with the Seraskier pasha and admiral Stopford. The prince of the Druses required that his life and property should be secured to him and in return he engaged to serve his master the sultan with fidelity.

On the 6th ult. he sent his two sons as hostages, until he could arrive himself, from which he was then liberated by the presence of Ibrahim pasha. On the evening of the 5th ult., the Turkish steamer boat Tahiri Bahri, having on board 600 Turkish soldiers from Constantinople, arrived at Beyout.

Twenty-two thousand mountaineers were under arms; they were incessantly harassing the Egyptian army, and caused them serious loss. It was expected that the Egyptian army would desert in a mass, because there was an arrear of twenty-two months pay due to them.

On the evening of the 5th ult., the 12th ult., says that Ibrahim pasha had been compelled to make a retrograde movement in consequence of the defeat of Osman pasha, who defended his left wing.

Necessary to a choice 145.

VIRGINIA. The governor has issued his proclamation, declaring the Van Burn electors to be duly elected. The official returns from some of the remote counties are not yet ascertained—and the exact majority is not yet known.

ALABAMA. The returns so far as received, show a Harrison majority of 2,373, and a Harrison gain of 2,383 on the vote of August last. The state in August gave a Van Burn majority of 7,546. There is no doubt of the success of the Van Burn ticket.

Later. The Montgomery Advertiser gives returns from all the counties of the state except four—viz:

For Van Burn,	11,665
Geo. Harrison,	6,293

Van Burn majority, 4,700

The remaining counties will increase the majority.

MISSISSIPPI. The unofficial returns in the National Free Trader make the Harrison majority 1,113.

ILLINOIS remains yet in some doubt. The Illinois State Register gives returns from all the counties in the state, and most of them official. The Van Burn majority is set down at 1,007.

The St. Louis Republican on the contrary, claims returns from all the counties except Hardin giving a Harrison majority of 571.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF MANUFACTURES, &c.

Patent office, November 20th, 1840. Notice is given that the hall in the new patent office, for the exhibition of manufactures, is now completed. The hall is spacious, being 273 feet long, 63 feet wide, 30 feet high, and of great strength.

The articles, whose names are annexed, will be received and forwarded, free of expense, articles which may be deposited with them. These articles will be classified and arranged for exhibition, and the name and address of the manufacturer (with the price when desired), will be carefully affixed. Few, it is presumed, will neglect to improve the opportunity now presented of contributing their choicest specimens to the NATIONAL GALLERY OF ARTS and MANUFACTURES, where thousands who visit the seat of government will witness with pleasure the progress of the arts in these United States.

It is in limited sections of our country has excited interest, what must be the attraction of the exhibition, and by daily attendance.

The agriculturist may be gratified to learn that commodious rooms are provided for the exhibitors.

of agricultural implements, and, also, for the reception of seeds for exhibition or distribution.

The commissioner of patents being authorized to collect agricultural statistics, avails himself of this opportunity to solicit information of the condition and character of crops in the several sections of the country. Those data will aid him in presenting, with his annual report, the aggregate amount of products of the soil, and it is hoped that the public eye may be guarded in some measure from the evils of monopoly, by showing how the scarcity in one portion of the land may be supplied from the surplus in another.

Years of agents who will receive and forward packages for the patent office. Collectors of the customs at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Portland, Maine, Burlington, Vermont, Providence, Rhode Island, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Richmond, Charleston, Savannah, New Orleans, Detroit, Buffalo, Cleveland.

Surveyors of the customs. Hartford, Connecticut, St. Louis, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Louisville, St. H. Edly, Boston, Massachusetts, David Gardner, (custom house), New York.

HENRY B. ELLSWORTH, comm'r. of patents.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

St. Louis and Boston. We copy the following interesting article from the St. Louis Gazette of the 1st ult.

The two cities of the United States which are now suffering most rapidly in population and wealth, at the present time, in proportion to their size, are undoubtedly Boston and St. Louis, one in the eastern, the other in the western section of the union. For many years—from 1800 to 1830—Boston was losing ground, in the race for greatness with New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore; but about the year 1830 a new era dawned on them, through the instrumentality of its enterprising capitalists, which has turned the tide strongly in its favor. At that time, the first rail road was constructed on one side of the city, and the first steam power loom establishment erected on the other; from that time to the present, Lowell has increased a population from 200 to 20,000, and in wealth from $100,000 to $20,000,000. The cotton manufactures of Lowell, and the hundred other manufacturing villages in New England, have given a stability to the trade of Boston unknown to any city in the union.

Massachusetts, formerly exporting, it was said, nothing but granite and ice, now produces manufactures valued at ninety millions of dollars per annum, a large part of which centers at St. Louis, as a place of distribution to all parts of the union.

At a latter period than that first mentioned, her ardent citizens became convinced that, although he had no river like the Hudson, the Delaware, or the Susquehanna, to bring to her what the products of the boundless and fertile west, yet that an iron pathway might be laid along her mountain ranges, over which a steam engine with trains of cars could move at the rate of thirty miles per hour, taking the produce of the lakes at the outlet of the great New York canal, and landing it at Boston in less time than it can be delivered at New York. About one-half of this road is completed, and the whole will be finished within twelve months from this time.

This road will cost not far from seven millions of dollars. It is calculated to support a single engine of fourteen tons weight, and to carry 1,000 barrels of flour in a single train of cars ten miles an hour. It is estimated that when finished, flour can be transported from Albany to Boston, 201 miles, for 30 cts. per thousand men are now at work on his road, in some sections, both night and day. The capitalists of Boston have also contributed largely to the funds required for laying down railways from Albany to Buffalo, between which places there will be a constant line completed. The same enterprise and capital will, ere many years, have tapped, continue the same line across Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, to St. Louis, in case the funds required or the work are not furnished by the states on the one side.

St. Louis owes its present prosperity to neither manufactures nor rail roads, for it has scarce a dollar expended in either.

Its progress has been accelerated mainly by the hundreds of thousands of emigrants who have overpassed the prairies of Missouri, Illinois, Wisconsin and Minnesota, come here for the sale of their agricultural and mining productions, and for the purchase of merchandise. The increase of this city in wealth and population, within the last ten years, is scarcely paralleled. In 1831, the population of the city and suburbs was estimated at 6,000. The number of buildings recently commenced is very great, and the value of those in course of completion will exceed a million and a half of dollars.

The trade between this city and Boston is greater and the commerce more intimate, than is generally imagined. The various staple articles of export from Boston, including domestic goods, boots and shoes, oil, candles, &c. required for this market, and which are forwarded from here for the upper country, cannot fall short of ten millions of dollars.

We shall close these remarks with a comparative statement of the value of western productions shipped from New Orleans to New York and Boston.

THE COTTON CROP. The Charleston Mercury has the following article on this subject:

It is important that a few facts should be placed before our readers in reference to the present crop. There is a universal belief at the south that the supply of cotton this year will be less than that of the last, and among the planters it is confidently affirmed that the crop will be less than for several years. We ourselves incline to this last opinion. It will be asked, then, if such be the case, why has not the price risen? We answer, the market has not felt the deficiency and in truth to the exporters and consumers of cotton, the fact of deficiency is not yet apparent. They will not trouble themselves in advance, however much the planters may and must, when they see one-half their storehouse empty.

The manufacturers feel it not, because the old stock in their seaports is very large, considerably more than it was last year, and they have besides been tempted by the low price of the article, to say by considerable in advance of their consumption. The present condition of Europe, rendering it hazardous to depend on the continuance of peaceable commercial relations; the increase of taxes and the absorption of vast sums of money in public loans for warlike preparations, have had no little influence in checking manufactures, by increasing the demand for money, and have added panic to the actual restraints on business. The consumption would undoubtedly be considerably less than in quieter times.

The exporters of cotton have not yet felt any deficiency. The stock on hand on the 1st of October, 1840, in all the southern ports and New York and Philadelphia, was 51,000 bales—same time in 1839, it was 43,650. The receipts since that, by the latest prices current, in New Orleans, Mobile, Georgia and South Carolina, have been 135,000 bales—same time last year only 125,300.

The entire supply in the market, then, since the first October, has been 20,000 bales greater than for the same period of last year, when the crop was the greatest ever known. There is besides this, the further and important fact that the southern banks are generally preparing to resume cash payments, which can never be done without somewhat increasing the value and the demand for money.

We trust we have fully accounted for all the present excitement in the cotton market, and it will behoove us to account for the opinion, which we seriously express that the supply of the year will be seriously deficient. The mere fact of a certain quantity of cotton coming early to market, proves nothing as to what remains behind. A short crop is soon prepared for market, and for that very reason is likely to arrive early. If the planter has but little to sell, the necessity will be the greater to realize the proceeds of that little as soon as possible. Increased facilities for getting to market, in the greatly improving condition of the country, be a cause of influence.

But the most important fact is that last year the yellow fever prevailed to a frightful extent in the parts of the whole cotton growing region, not even excepted Texas, which undoubtedly seriously retarded the bringing of the crop to market. This year the southern cities have been all healthy. Mobile is the strongest case in point. Up to the 7th ult. the receipts of cotton in that port have been nearly three times as great as in the same time last year. It should be remembered, however, that wherever the worm has committed its ravages, the destruction has fallen not upon the earliest, but upon the latest part of the produce of the plant, which still further confirms our supposition that the

Lastly in reference to that part of the planting region more immediately under our own observation, we know that the crop has been very deficient, and we have in the publications of agricultural societies and the statements of intelligent observers throughout the cotton states, convincing evidence that the season is true of the crop generally, and we have gone into these statements more for the sake of explaining the apparent contradiction between the present aspect of the market and the assumed deficiency of production, than from any the least doubt of the reality of such deficiency. That the actual failure of the crop may be to a small extent made up by an increase in the quantity of land planted, is true, but only to a small extent.

THE ARMY. Head quarters, army of Florida, Fort King, Nov. 15, 1840.

SIR: Early this morning, I was informed by the Arkansas delegation, that some of the prisoners in camp had disappeared during the night. On sending out to the Indians to search for them, it was discovered that all the Indians had gone.

This has ended all our well grounded hopes of bringing the war to a close by pacific measures; confident in the resources of the country, the enemy will hold out to the last, and can never be induced to come in again.

But the day before yesterday the chiefs not only expressed a willingness but a desire to emigrate to the west. Acting up in full faith to the promises I had made to them, their conduct is only to be attributed to the faithful disposition which has ever characterized them.

The partial decay caused by the emigration has not tended to the injury of the operations in Florida, inasmuch as it has been conducive to the health of the three regiments which have suffered an severely—they will now be enabled to take the field in larger force.

Immediately upon the withdrawal of the Indians, orders were transmitted to commanders of regiments to put their troops in motion, and before this communication reaches you, they will be scouting in every direction.

Having left nothing unattempted with the means in my power, I shall now press the war with increased energy, and hope soon to oppress the depriment of the capture or destruction of some of the enemy.

I have the honor to enclose you a copy of the order issued on the renewal of hostilities.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant, W. K. ARMISTEAD.

Brig. Gen. army of Florida.
Hon. J. R. Polk, sec. of war, Washington, D. C.

Among the passengers by the British Queen, arrived at New York from London, we notice the following names:

Mr. Hodgson, of Washington, from a mission to Berlin; majors Baker and Wale, captains Huger and Mordecai, of the United States army; and professor Bartlett, of West Point.

The National Intelligencer says: These officers of the army were sent to Europe last spring by the war department, on a mission to visit and report upon the military establishments of Europe. They are understood to have been in England, France, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden and Russia. Their reception by the emperor Nicholas is represented to have been particularly flattering. The day after their arrival in St. Petersburg, he was pleased to invite them to assist at a grand review of the Imperial guards at Czarskosselo, where they remained as his guests for several days.

THE NAVY.

A court martial, composed of commodore Shubrick, president; captains Morgan, Conner, Voorhes, Geisinger, McKeever and McCauley, convened on board the U. S. ship Delaware at Norfolk on the 25th inst.

The Ohio, U. S. ship of the line, appeared off Smyrna the 6th, and anchored. The Philadelphia Inquirer says: It is stated that Mr. Paulding has ordered the Ohio home, at the request of commodore Hall.

The U. S. corvette Cassin, capt. W. B. Lister, arrived there from Japan on the 24th ult.

The U. S. ship Macedonian, commodore Wilkinson, bound to the West Indies, went to sea from Hampton Roads on the 20th inst.

The sloop of war Independence, commander Smead, bound to the West Indies, dropped down from the navy yard to the anchorage of the naval hospital. The U. S. sloop of war Boston, commander Long, was to have sailed from Boston on the 20th for the East Indies, to join the squadron. She will touch at Rio de Janeiro, and from thence accompany the Constellation.

The Enterprise, Capt. Stevenson, of the barque Globe, arrived at Philadelphia, reports that the U. S. schooner Enterprise, lieut. com. Elbery, had captured a short time previous to the Globe's leaving Pernambuco, in the harbor of Bahia, a piratical brig, under American colors, the captain of which escaped on shore; the brig had been sent in charge of a prize lieutenant to Rio de Janeiro, for condemnation.

MAINE.

All the towns in the state were returned. The votes returned from the town of Kingsbury were not counted—the selectmen having declined to give notice of the meeting.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The legislature of this state convened on Wednesday, appointed the usual committee, and received the message of governor Page. On Thursday the two houses met in convention, and the secretary brought in the votes for electors. The convention was occupied during the day in reading and recording the returns, after which they were referred to a committee. Governor Page's message commences with an eulogy on the sub-treasury. It then notices the proceedings of the bank commissioners, and some remarks upon the state prison, upon the judiciary, and upon the proposed hospital for the insane, and closes with some notice of the geological survey of the state. The first annual report of the geologist, Dr. Jackson, is expected in the course of the coming winter.

NEW YORK.

We publish to-day the official canvass of the votes given in this state for electors, governor, senators and congressmen. The grand results are as follows: [Albany Evening Journal.]

Whole number of votes for president,	438,331
" " " governor,	438,720
" " " senators,	439,555
" " " congressmen, 438,181
Harrison,	225,512 votes.
Beward,	222,010
Harrison senators,	223,648
Harrison congressmen,	223,831

Van Buren,	212,519 votes.
Boock,	216,710
Van Buren senators,	215,907
Van Buren congressmen,	214,650
Harrison's majority,	15,238
Seward's,	5,600
Whig majority on senators,	7,741
Whig majority on congressmen,	9,181

The vote on senators and congressmen may be considered the fair test of the strength of both parties.

Average vote for Harrison senators and congressmen, 223,739.

Average vote for Van Buren senators and congressmen, 212,275.

Gen. Harrison runs ahead of the Harrison senators and congressmen, 2,073.

Gov. Seward runs behind the Harrison senators and congressmen, 1,729.

Mr. Van Buren runs behind the Van Buren senators and congressmen, 2,759.

Mr. Boock runs ahead of the Van Buren senators and congressmen, 1,432.

Although Mr. Boock's excess over the average of his ticket is not as great by 471 as that of Gen. Harrison over his, and although Mr. Van Buren runs behind the average of his ticket 1,034 votes more than governor Seward does behind his, the most obvious method of approximating to a correct average result of the election would be to compare candidates who run ahead of their ticket with each other, and in like manner candidates who run behind.

It is thus ascertained that

Harrison's majority over Boock is 9,180.

Seward's majority over Van Buren is 9,491.

Death of professor Davis. A letter from Charlottesville to the editor of the Richmond Whig, announces the melancholy fact of the death of professor Davis. He died on Saturday from the pistol shot he received on the Thursday previous. The letter referred to gives the following particulars of his death:—"The 12th of November is the anniversary of a celebrated rebellion which took place in the university some three or four years ago. On Thursday night last, the 12th, there were only two or three who could be found to commemorate the event. They went forth about 9 o'clock at night, armed with pistols and disguised with masks, &c. After making a good deal of noise upon the grounds of the university, they approached professor Davis' residence, with the design, as he believed, to insult him. He went out with the view of discovering who they were. He immediately came upon a very small person, who had a mask on, and who was otherwise disguised. He approached him, and reached out his hand to unmask him. The individual, without uttering a word, stepped back one or two paces, and fired the fatal shot. Thus has been cut down, in the vigor of intellect and the prime of manhood, a gentleman who was an ornament to society and the pride of the university.

"It is not yet known who was the perpetrator of this diabolical deed. A student was arrested yesterday, and after examining a great many witnesses, the case was adjourned over till to-morrow. The evidence against him thus far, consists of the vaguest sort of suspicion."

NORTH CAROLINA.

U. S. senators. The Raleigh Register states that "the resignations of Messrs. Brown and Strange have been sent in by the governor, and unanimously accepted by the legislature, but that no movement had been made in either house towards filling the vacancies."

The Richmond Whig states that Willie P. Mangum will be selected to fill one of the vacancies.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

A white man sold. The South Carolina papers give the particulars of a public sale of a white man named Rubeen Bradley, which recently took place at Camden, in conformity to a law of that state. It was a case of bastardy, and he was not able to enter into recognizance for the support of the child. His wife bid him off for one dollar, and it was thought she got very badly cheated at that.

MICHIGAN.

The legislature according to the Detroit Advertiser, will stand as follows:

Senate 12 whigs, 5 Van Buren. Whig majority on joint ballot 19.

There were no returns from Wayne county, on account of the destruction of a ballot box, which was left in care of a town clerk, who lost it in the road, and it was crushed to pieces by a wagon, and the tickets given to the winds.

A United States senator is to be elected in place of Mr. Norvell.

The governor of Michigan has appointed Thursday, the 26th November, to be observed in that state as a day of thanksgiving and prayer.

FLORIDA.

Apalachicola dates of the 24th ult. state that three white men who had connection with the Indians had been scented out by the bloodhounds, and were brought in—the first proof of the utility of the dogs.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

We content our extracts from the remarks of the public press upon the termination of the presidential election.

From the Bangor Whig.

A NATION REDEEMED. The most important event in the political history of the great republic was just transpired. The sun has set upon MARTIN VAN BUREN, and risen in all its moral splendor upon WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON. The consummation so devoutly to be wished has been gratified. The great loves of the American people have been realized, and that event which has been prayed for by millions of patriotic men is about to be witnessed. The election of general Harrison is a moral triumph—a brilliant victory of men—high-minded men—over corruption and power. We triumph not over Mr. Van Buren the man, for that is no victory, but over Mr. Van Buren the executive. We overthrow the combination, which, in the abuse of power, has centered round the executive. We overcome the Priorian cohorts of the head of government, man, man, also, who, in their insouciance of office, and in the pride of place and fancied security, have disregarded all those great lessons of justice which should govern men to whom have been entrusted high and responsible places. We are coming forth from twelve years' bondage, and the year of jubilee is just dawning upon us. We feel our triumph, and enjoy it. We see the fanaticism and ferocity of our opponents, and can pardon both. The sceptre has departed, and men leave their strongholds as men who seem to have imagined they were there, not by appointment and auferance, but by right. The power, higher than that of the executive, and superior to that of the executive clansmen, has risen in its majesty, and shewn itself where the constitution designed it should be seen—in the hands of the people. The demagogues of numbers have come forth, and, as an abused people, called for and decreed a change—a change of men, and, to that end, a change of administration. The people have confided in their administration, and that confidence has been abused. They placed Martin Van Buren at the head of the national ship, and he has seen her aground, and now they have decreed, at the expiration of the voyage, when his constitutional term of service is up, to place the ship of state upon the common stocks.

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON is the commander of the ship, and JOHN TYLER is the mate. Both of them have been tried and found faithful and experienced navigators. The one has occupied all the most important position in public life, and now has received from a grateful people the highest favor and distinction which they can grant. The other has done the state some service, and they know it. Both will do the nation great service, we predict, from the day of their meeting.

We have confidence in the integrity and sagacity of these men, and we believe that under their administration the country will become prosperous and happy. We have reached the foot of the hill, and fallen to a deep slumber which is being but the strong arm of Providence could raise us, and in the arms of Providence and the chosen instruments of its power we are willing to trust the destinies of the people. Any change must be a change for the better, and such a change as we seek will be an improvement upon all that has been during the administration now, thank heaven, about to expire. We have been called a party without principles, but we hope soon to convince even the most unjust of our opponents that we are not only without principles, but that we are, as well as without principles, good men that they are the principles of wisdom and justice. We have sought to carry out the great democratic principle of achieving the "greatest good to the greatest number"—not by mere profession of democracy, but by the inculcation of all those great principles which form the basis of a good government. If we have been ambitious, this has been the first great desire which has controlled us; and having accomplished a great moral triumph in the election of great and good men, we seek now, in the language of Henry Clay, "only to be the good servants of the people." We are anxious to reconvene a divided people, and once more to re-erect concord and harmony in a distracted land. We wish now only to contemplate the glorious spectacle of a free, united, prosperous and happy people.

From the Providence Journal.

The election returns are now mere matters of curiosity. The tremendous revolution in popular sentiment, which has been so long gathering, has burst with the fury of a tempest, and scarce a vestige of loco focism is left in its path. The arrogant party which but a short time since, secure in the possession of power, set itself above all sympathy with the people, and, for the first time in the history of the republic, declared that the government was not theirs, but that of the people, and that the people must take care of themselves, is now in a miserable and contemptible minority. Of its long array of states, only two are yet ascertained to stand faithful, and one of these is wavering, by an insignificant majority, obtained through outrageous fraud in two counties. The men who laughed at the attempts of the people to displace them, and who thought that they had bridged themselves round with an impenetrable barrier of corruption, have fallen before the free votes of their constituents.

The revolution has been achieved under every disadvantage on the side of the people, and every advantage on the side of the administration, and it is coming to think that about any future party, growing and lasting, by the long possession of power, in like manner upon the constitution and the laws, the present memorable contest will be looked back to by the patriot as convincing evidence of the virtue and intelligence and power of the people. It will be sufficient to warn every future administration against the folly and wickedness which have destroyed this, we are sure that it will always shun the people that, under the constitution and in obedience to the laws, their remedy is in their own hands.

THE LAST TEST. Right joyous are we that the campaign of 1840 is closed. Its character and incidents will furnish matter for mortifying reflection for years to come—the reflection compounded with but unavailing regret that a people so young, so reputedly enlightened, should have evinced so much of the viciousness and corruption of older and less favored nations. How many who have lent their aid to the wrong cause in this memorable contest will yet curse the blind infatuation that led them to the commission of political suicide, we pretend not to determine; nevertheless our impression is that the number will not be few, nor their regret light, though to them it may be unavailing. To us, the loss of the state, or of the union, will bring "no compunctious visitings of conscience," nor will such an event abate, in the least, our love for the principles we have endeavored to defend, or our detestation of whiggery as well as the means employed to achieve the national ascendancy.

As a lover of freedom and good order—as an ardent advocate for the supremacy of sober thought over noisy, senseless humbug, we sincerely hope that the political buffoonery of 1840 will ever stand far and alone, in the pages of history, a damning stain on the brow of federalism, and without a parallel in all coming time. No more may the world see comas, cabins and cider, usurp the place of principle, nor doggerel verse elicit a shout, while rogues, and rascals, and fools, are the arbiters of decisive issues. No more may agitators, knaves, and impostors, by proclaiming themselves democrats, when every act of their political lives stands forth to brand the lie on their foreheads, characters as well as deeds, as the arbiters of the people. Never again, may the American people behold the conjunction of political antipathies—the fragments of parties, broken off by the collision and disappointments of half a century, banded together, in connection with the military power, for the profane utterance of the democracy of the day. Never again, may we behold the aristocracy here successfully imitating the plan of the same class in Europe for the subjugation of the many—the division of the laboring portion of the community thereby causing the people to be so much divided, that they are not their own masters, but also of those from whom they most unwisely, most wickedly separated. Never again, may we see citizens, native or naturalized, so far forget the dignity of human nature as to vote contrary to their feelings and party associations, for fear of offending some other aristocracy, who employ the vote they may be tempted. Deeper or more damning degradation than this, it is not easy to imagine; and base indeed must that man be, who, to secure the treacherous smile of his aristocratic employer, will voluntarily incur it.

But enough of what has been. Be the result of the contest favorable or otherwise, we are unmoved except with increased contempt for federal whiggery and its electioneering paraphernalia. We detest its principles, scorn its treachery, and defy its power, and, should the aristocracy of the nation, in its selfishness, shall await with buoyant spirit the day (not distant) of its irrevocable overthrow.

From the New York Express.

NO SECTONAL DIVISIONS. The election of general Harrison has been the solution of all sectional lines in the union. The unhappy divisions of north and south are unknown in him. They who in the south advocated Mr. Van Buren as the northern man with southern principles, have been signally rebuked by the people, who have seen in him who in the north attempted to convert slavery or anti-slavery into a political question, have been not less so. The success of gen. Harrison is the complete abolition of all party appeals of a nature to break up the union, and his election rivets the links stronger than ever. The divisions in the north, between the non-slaveholding states and those in the slaveholding states, notwithstanding earnest appeals were made against him in the north for his vote on the Missouri question, and as earnest an appeal in the south, because of his nomination at Harrisburg, chiefly by the instrumentality of the non-slaveholding states.

General Harrison is in many respects unanimously elected president. The states that oppose him, with the exception of Virginia, are small states, chiefly under the personal influence and sway of leading men, which states have not so much supported Mr. Van Buren as the leaders among them, whom they have long been accustomed to follow. Thus, South Carolina supported Van Buren, and Mr. Calhoun—there and there can be no doubt in any mind that knows the small white population of that state and its peculiarly aristocratic composition, that if Mr. Calhoun, the patriarch, as it were, of the S. Carolina family, had filled the support of general Harrison, the vote would have been cast for him, with the vote of North Carolina and Georgia. Thus, too, New Hampshire supports Isaac Hill, and if he had willed the support of that state for general Harrison, New Hampshire alone, of all the northern and eastern states of the union, could not have been so distinct as to vote for Mr. Van Buren. The whole range of country, it will be observed, from Passamaquoddy bay to the Potomac and Mississippi rivers, (Illinois not yet heard from), supports general Harrison, and the vote of New Hampshire can alone be accounted for but by the fact, that it follows its state leader, without being influenced by the nation; or the questions on which the nation has interested itself. They again, Missouri follows its state leader, Thomas H. Benton, for of all the states in the west, unless the 12,000 foreign votes of Illinois have dissuaded that state from the west, Missouri stands solitary and alone of all the states in the great upper valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi. Its principles are the same as those of the non-slaveholding states of the west, and only peculiar causes, independent of what has affected the union, could have disjoined it from this union of the west.

The state of Virginia gives its nominal vote to Van Buren,—namely, we say, for Van Buren's majority is merely nominal and all of Van Buren's majority from the heavy yard at Portsmouth, and the public works at Harper's Ferry. Two counties, though in the east, and of Virginia, but hardly Virginian, to wit: Rockingham and Shenandoah, have given over 2,000 votes to Van Buren—namely, the majority of the 12 Virginia counties, the people that make the members of congress and the state legislature, have given their votes to general Harrison. The power of Virginia, the recent vote has just demonstrated to be with the whigs. They make, and are to make, its laws, and compose its government at home, and though Virginia has given its nominal vote by a bare majority to Van Buren, yet the state has not in point of fact discovered herself in this respect, from the

From this process of reasoning, we infer, with sufficient accuracy, that looking to the electoral colleges general Harrison as it appears by them, giving the votes of the states, has been unanimously elected president of the United States. And all geographical lines have been actually and morally obliterated, as all position. From Maine to Georgia, as the old saying used to be, the states have been of one mind. The cotton planter of Georgia, and the shipping merchant and lumber dealer of Maine, have shaken hands. Wheat and sugar cane growers have joined for one man. From the region of almost perpetual ice, to the land of the olive and the orange, there has been but one voice. There is a concord in this respect—a national harmony so to speak, delightful and new of late hardly to be believed. It is as if since the father of his country led our armies in the field, and presided over the states. It has been as powerful, so over-mastering over state associations and state pride, that this great member of the confederacy of states has received a citizen of its own to the union, presenting to the world for the first time in our history at least, the spectacle of a state surrendering the once chosen emblem of its power and its sovereignty in the person of one of its own sons, to another state and another citizen—for what it believed to be the good of the whole union.

General Harrison is now the personification of this national harmony. All general assent is to be heeded in his inauguration. The perplexing principles that have before almost dismembered our union, in the new re-adjustment thereof, he is to preside over, as the executive chief magistrate, not of this state nor of any one state, but of the whole. He has no prejudices to indulge, no sects of the union to look to with more favor than to the whole,—no principles of this end of the confederacy or of that of further—no more the friend of the planter than of the manufacturer, nor of the farmer than of the mechanic.

The importance of such considerations as this cannot be exaggerated, when we dwell upon this condition in which he will find the treasury, the revenue, the public lands, the patronage and the general principles of the government. An empty treasury will be laid before him, and a revenue must be raised by common and universal consent. A tariff is to be re-adjusted by rule of the north, the south and the west—for there must be more ready to pay off the debts of the government, and to meet the expenses of the government. No man can induce the idea of running in debt by a systematic issue of treasury notes. The public lands to offer in exchange for the prey of demagogues and politicians, must be snatched from all such perils forever. Above all, the love and honor of the government must be restored to the Washington and Madison era.—What was a monarchy, and the state of the people, public. Power must be made to flow in its old channels from the people, or the representatives of the people, and not from the executive to the people, and to effect all things, will require all the popularity and all the strength of General Harrison's administration; and if he can effect them, he will have been one of the greatest benefactors of his country, ranking next to Washington.

From the same.

THE GREAT RESULT. No ardently doubt now remaining of the election of general Harrison president of the United States, gloom and despondency have naturally seized hold of the Van Buren party—and we must say, we have never seen so disappointed and chagrined. Thousands of them have been duped by their organs into a mad confidence, and into large bets, and thus added to the disappointment of party hopes, is the loss of large sums of money. One of their papers, for example, in exchange with 15,000 copies of the state of Pennsylvania, and another, the Standard, even when it might well have known of defeat at home, flattered its partisans with false hopes, if it did not keep back well known facts. The Evening Post has all the while festering at wing papers for an alleged manufacture of election news, seemed to manufacture news for itself, if it did not to fact. The Boston Morning Post, with full returns from a large part of New York before it on Saturday, was the first to announce that to influence the Massachusetts election coming off to-day. Thus added to the chagrin of being beaten by open adversaries, is the pain of having been duped by professed friends.

We are well aware, that for the whigs, if defeated there would have been no sympathy, but that there was in preparation for them a series of outrages upon their feelings, if not upon their property. We do not wish, however, to add to their affliction, to what the members of the administration party must feel. There are many worthy men among them, worthy in private life, whose love, or possession of, office has drawn them into political extremes, but with us we have no further cause to reproach. We wish to shake hands and be at peace. Let us act together now if we can, for the common good of our common country. Where offices has been perverted to political purposes, where it was the pay of party, it cannot be expected that such places can be retained, but there is no cause even though such changes must take place for a further embittering of that party spirit that for twelve years past, under an unrelenting, and fanatic administration, has poisoned the social relations of the land, and made politics the primary business of the country.

As whigs let us rejoice over our great, our prodigious victory with calmness and moderation. We have won so much we can afford the largest magnanimity. General Harrison, we do not wish, to restore the country to the condition in which general Jackson found it. A stable and equal currency will soon follow his administration of the government. He comes in with an immense popularity, and will have no power to carry out his well known principles. His adversaries have sadly undervalued him, and his friends have hardly sufficiently esteemed him—but it will soon be seen by all, that with fewer faults than fall to the lot of most men, he has as many virtues as any man, and though he may do nothing dazzling or dashing, yet his good common sense, his sound political education, his long acquaintance with mankind, and the springs of human action, will soon put the republic on the right track, and proper men on board the ship of state.

Mr. Van Buren has been signally rebuked by the 42 votes of his own state. He abused the power these votes gave him, and they have now sent him back to Kinderhook, with the record of no vote, with no claim for sympathy here, or elsewhere,—dishonored by repeated abuses of power, and disgraced by the signal condemnation of an immense majority of his fellow citizens.

From the New York Era, Nov. 9.

"TRUTH CRUSHED TO EARTH MUST RISE AGAIN." For the first time, since the adoption of our constitution, a democratic president has been defeated in his own state before the people, and what! Whatever may have been the immediate causes in proleptizing such an unreplicable anomaly—infamous frauds upon the ballot boxes, debauching the minds of our population by bribery, direct or indirect, or deceiving them by the very falsehoods and sorceries that were ever uttered—the hidden influence that has incited the opposition in their desperate efforts cannot but alarm many, and particularly the returning feeling under an agonizing infatuation alienated themselves from their first love. Painful and mortifying as the reflection is to the mind of every true patriot—discouraging as it must be to the advocates of popular liberty in either branch of our government, and as it may shake our governmental fabric—we trust in heaven that the obsequiousness to wealth that has marked the conduct of those who have turned the scale against us will not become habitual with any great portion of the free people.

The opponents of the democratic party have not fought a bold and manly fight—they deserve no credit for the advantage they have obtained over us—they have had resort to a system of ambushes displeasing to those as individuals, and which will hereafter be brought up in judgment against them as a party with fatal effect. The democracy entered the field as an unarmed philosopher and politician—bringing with them truth without a spear, and a conscience unbacked with artillery. Mighty as truth and argument are, in this conflict, they have been prostrated. Never was a party so armed in right, as was the democratic party. But the unwelcome truths that when told—their long and arduous struggle advanced—were not permitted to impede the progress of the money power. Britain, with her powerful but insidious influence, always successful when purposely directed to a particular object, determined to reverse our governmental policy, and her tools and commandants here obeyed the behest. We are defeated. The force of fraud and falsehood has thrown us in a nominal minority, much to our disappointment and regret. We have this one consolation, however, that our invaluable legacy to leave to our children; that in the great political contest of 1840, when the whole money power of our own country and Britain was arrayed against Martin Van Buren, the candidate of the democratic party, the statesman pure and unsullied, the man whose morals could not be impeached, nor the lure of wealth lured from the path of duty, that in such a battle there are at least was true to the principles of democratic liberty. This is the only consolation that we can draw from the members of the democratic party. In those who will be broken down to the yoke—who will permit the money of independence to be weakened—their manly spirit faded! If there be, bring him out, and let us scan him from head to foot. Unlike the being he once appeared to be, ranging the field of political philosophy, delighting in liberty, and fearless of man, let him crawl in the snare—let him voluntarily enter the cage—and let his masters teach him to stand on his hind legs, and play in the tricks of the amusement of the most contemptible and disgusting gang of aristocrats that ever attempted to oppress the people. Let him leave his democracy, and as he walks the street, his very looks will speak his degradation, and he will be pointed at by a few awful and bold, as one accursed whose neck the gold chain of corruption has been riveted—as a living automaton and self-acting tool of his country's worst enemies.

From the New York American, Nov. 16.

The peaceful working of our political machinery has never been more strikingly and creditably illustrated than in the quiet and ready acquiescence with which the result of the heated and protracted contest for the presidency has been received. In a few days ago, all the passions, interests and prejudices of millions of freemen were in full and opposing play—and fierce, indeed, was the struggle—yet now, when, through the efficient instrumentality of little bits of printed paper, placed, with due formality, in some little wooden boxes, the decision of the majority of these millions is ascertained, the storm subsides at once, the hoarse voice of controversy ceases and all men bow to the supremacy of the law, which themselves have made and agreed to abide by.

We confess our pride in pointing to this spectacle which has in it so much moral sublimity—and which goes so far to prove to all doubters the capacity of man for self-government.

There is another characteristic of the recent contest, not less consolatory, as we read it, to the friends of republican liberty and republican institutions; we mean the great increase of votes. A great deal we know has been said, and with truth, of the influence of British gold of "slaying pipes," and other mere partizan solaces under defeat—but the real truth we hold to be, that the intense interest excited by this election reached every class and brought forth the people, who heretofore have so commonly neglect the high and sacred obligation of voting; and thus have the aggregate numbers been every where swelled.

It will be perceived, on examining most of the returns, that the defeated party have lost the battle, not so much by any diminution of their former vote, as by a large accession to ours; and this accession comes, as we believe, for the most part, from a class of voters, who, contrary to the usual, and even ordinary circumstances, content themselves with moulding their own business, and interfere not at all with that of the state or with politics, so long as the state and politics do not interfere with them. We do not unduly trust that this class of voters will be so commonly committed to every freeman, nor for himself alone, but for the community of which he forms a part. On the contrary, we condemn it utterly; but it is nevertheless a fact that such a class does exist, and the question we draw from it, is, although indifferent generally to political contests, there are occasions and abuses which will draw them from their neutrality, and enlist them warmly in the defence of the institutions, liberty or prosperity of their country, when these are seriously menaced.

It is on this hypothesis we account for the greatly increased vote every where; and since all cannot be prevailed upon at all times to exercise their political franchise, it is, we repeat, not without consolation to reflect that this reserve corps may at least be always relied upon to make a stand, at an emergency, for right and liberty.

From the N. Y. Courier and Engineer, of Nov. 11.

The recent victory of our country bears the strongest possible testimony to the value of the republican institutions, and the permanence of our constitutional system. Men had become apprehensive that our government could sustain itself by corruption, and that the more corrupt the government became, the more corrupt would be the administration by party agencies; and it was feared that an appeal to force would be ultimately indispensable to the restoration of our system to its old integrity. When they saw the vicissitudes of the administration, its disregard of public opinion, its assaults upon state credit and state institutions, and its general bearing of insolent and arbitrary absolutism; they could not hesitate to the verdict which an honest and unbiased jury of the people would render upon its merits. But the patronage of government was immense. It paid and fed more than an hundred thousand individuals, interested to sustain it whether right or wrong. It was a vast and standing college of vigilance, with their manifestations of correspondence reaching the most obscure villages of the country; and were all to be moved to harmonious and co-operative action by a word or sign from the central point at Washington, under ordinary circumstances, such a phalanx would be quite invincible. If government were honestly and wisely administered, the outholders might have every thing their own way without molestation or rebuke. The very members of the administration would have been invulnerable. As long as they are protected in their personal rights and liberties, and are the institutions they have inherited sustained in their original vigor, they care not whether one man or another may be the chief executive magistrate of the country. A desperate struggle has taken place of late between the constituency and the crown. All the resources of corruption have been applied to the elections; the influence and patronage of government have been exerted to the utmost; all its janisaries have been under full pay and in full employment; and the battle of the people has been gloriously won. The experiment of a "bribe by corruption" has been tried by Mr. VAN BUREN and has signally failed. It has been demonstrated that the honesty and intelligence of the people are an overmatch for the lures and seduction of official patronage and power. The overwhelming majority by which the citizens of this republic have condemned the war and profligate rulers, teaches us that a corrupt administration cannot stand in this country; and that what the PEOPLE WILL THEY CAN ACCOMPLISH.

Another gratifying indication of the recent election is the evidence of a more improved mutual understanding between the different sections of the country. It has been a part of Mr. VAN BUREN's policy to conquer the whites by division.—He has fostered local prejudices, jealousies and animosities. He has spent his money in the south against the north on the questions of abolition and the tariff. His emissaries in this quarter have been busy in exciting ill blood against the south; and the vain hope was entertained of creating a serious diversion from the whig ranks by the anti-slavery nomination for vice presidency. The machinery of southern commercial conventions for the last two or three years has been managed with reference to this question. The sub-treasury has been urged, on the express ground that it would be beneficial to the south. In the case of the north, in every quarter there has been a movement intended to array section against section, and interest against interest; in the belief that the whites might be thus broken up and conquered, while the bond of a common interest would be strong enough to keep the negroes united.

What is proved by the result? How it laughs to scorn the factious tirades of Mr. VAN BUREN in the columns of the Washington Globe. How little has been effected by the wild outcry of the Richmond Enquirer against the abolition of general HARRISON! How utterly unavailing have been the appeals of CALHOUN, McDEFIE, PICKENS and their associates to the fears and interests of the south.—We find Georgia allying herself with Maine—Virginia taking her stand as a candidate in Massachusetts—North Carolina echoing back the whig thunder from New York. The efforts of the administration to sow discord and animosity have not only completely failed—they have brought about a result the very opposite of that which was intended. More cordial than ever before the north and south are united—in feelings, interests and hopes. They have rallied on a common ground of RESTORATION AND REUNIFICATION—and are willing to lay aside all less worthy considerations, devote themselves to the accomplishment of this great work, and adjust all questions of difference and dissent at a more fitting period. Never before have we witnessed throughout the country a spirit that augurs so well for the perpetuity of the UNION, as that which now animates the heart of the people.

As nothing but a mighty necessity could have produced this extraordinary state of the public mind—we have no fears that it will be lightly disturbed. The sympathy and union between the now dominant party of the south and the north, will give a tone and color to the policy of government by a new administration, and will cement interests and attachments too strongly to be easily discovered. Great conflicting questions will be adjusted to a spirit of concession and compromise. We shall see no violent war waged of local prejudices, and no party quarrels. We shall hear nothing more of reducing the free labor of the north to the level of southern slavery; nor of letting loose upon the south the fanaticism of northern abolition. We may look forward in exciting confidence to an era of PEACE, UNION and PROSPERITY.

It is announced by the official organ of the federal executive that general HARRISON has been elected to the presidency of the United States; with an intimation that the result has been achieved by a process which does not entitle it to be called an election. "It is," says the Washington Globe, "a mockery to call this an election. It is a result brought about, not by the free action of the popular will, resulting from the popular intelligence, but by the defiance of it. It is the first instance in our republic of the triumph of the power of money over the intelligence of the country."

This eulimatory on republican institutions appears in a journal in the confidence of the federal executive; and receiving many thousands annually from the treasury of the United States. This journal is sent at the public expense to all our foreign legations, and is read at every court in the civilized world. A few months since it put on record the general HARRISON, in all his battles, was a fugitive from the British arms. For weeks it has been filled with the foulest libels on the character and conduct of this illustrious soldier, and with the grossest perversions of our national history. There is no stain on Mr. VAN BUREN's person or public career more disgraceful than the fact that he has employed the public money, in recompensing venal scribblers for the base depreciation of a competitor for the presidential chair. Whatever pretensions Mr. VAN BUREN may have had at any time to the character of a "gentleman"—henceforth he must be content to abandon them. He has encouraged and stimulated a warfare upon general HARRISON, which has been waged with the weapons of calumny and falsehood. If he had conducted the contest with decency, no one could have complained of any severity of censure and invective. But he has employed mean instruments, and exhibited a malignant spirit; and what is worse, he will not retract. He has refused the rebuke that has been administered by the American people.

Mr. VAN BUREN now insults the freedom of this republic by announcing through his official organ that the election of general HARRISON has been carried by the agency of MONEY. It is the result of bribery and corruption, falsehood and fraud. The electoral college has been packed by British gold. The 13,000 property in NEW YORK, the 10,000 in INDIANA and VERMONT, the 20,000 in KENTUCKY, the 15,000 in MASSACHUSETTS, the 25,000 in OHIO, the 10,000 in PENNSYLVANIA, the 10,000 in ILLINOIS and bankers. So little virtue is there in the American people, that they can be purchased by thousands and tens of thousands. Such a farce and mockery is republican government, that the most overwhelming majority of popular suffrage is only an indication and proof of corruption and fraud! This is the aspect in which the recent election is considered by the administration, and presented to the wonder and indignation of mankind!

From the stand assumed by the Globe, we are almost induced to believe that Mr. VAN BUREN will occupy similar ground in his message at the next session of congress. He will read a lecture on horrible discontents and abominable frauds! He will tell us that the whole country has been bought and sold with the exception of himself. Mr. BUTLER, STEVENSON, KENDALL, BLAIR, EDMONDS, and few other worthies of similar immaculate reputation, there are no honest men in the country. The cities, he will tell us, instead of being seats of only pure and virtuous men, are seats of intelligence and virtue; and the agricultural districts, the homes of the hardy native yeomanry, are the abodes of profligacy and corruption. The election in his eyes, is a "mockery." The ballot box is only an engine of fraud. The system of republican administration is a farce and a failure.

We are not surprised at these rabid manifestations of the official press. Our hope is that they will induce no corresponding violence in the whig journals. We have achieved a splendid victory over the administration, and we are proud of our popular triumph has been won, without parallel or precedent in history. Let us so enjoy its fruits, as to prove ourselves worthy of our brilliant success. A high responsibility now rests upon the whig party of the union. They come into power when the people are impoverished by the extravagance of the republican groans under the burden which have been imposed upon it. To restore its institutions, and reinvigorate its shattered system, will require time and patience—prudence and wisdom. The boldest sagacity may be required to prevent the work of restoring shanty and symmetry from the chaos which has been piled up about us by the ten years labor of these architects of ruin.

We hope therefore that the whigs will enter calmly and with dignity on the career that is before them. The joy with which every patriot must contemplate their glorious achievements is too sacred to waste itself in the idle exultation of ordinary triumph. Our victory is itself its own best celebration. We cannot add to it, by feyval or boisterous rejoicing, by processions, by the firing of cannon, or the burning of gunpowder, or the blaze of bonfires. We have no heart for such manifestations of the earnest and devout gratitude in which we contemplate the perils that have surrounded us, and the triumph with which we have emerged from them. Never before, since the institution of governments, have a PEOPLE won a victory over POWER—thus glorious and bloodless. Let us show that we rightly appreciate its momentous consequences, by abstaining from any other expression of our joy and gratitude than may accord with a victory which is to restore tranquility to distracted councils, peace to an agitated country, bopu and happiness to an afflicted PEOPLE.

From the Twentieth Century.

We copy below a very just and able article from the New York Evening Post, as to what has been decided by the result of the recent election beyond a mere change of men. It shows clearly the utter lack on the part of Harrisonism of any thing like the higher political aims upon which parties generally are and always should be organized. When citizens go to the polls the presumption is that they have other motives for voting than the mere personal elevation or depression of this man and the other man—something beyond individuals and mere principles and measures in contemplation—that they are not only opposed to certain doctrines and certain actions, but are likewise in favor of a particular course of government, which they desire to see put in practice. All this appears, on one side at least, to have been lost sight of in the past contest. It is true that in sections of the country, but not in every part of it, the rallying cry was hostility to Martin Van Buren and the independent treasury, but nowhere was the inquiry generally made, "What was in connexion with this man, of Harrison?" It was merely Harrison—Harrison and nothing. The name was not, and is not, identified with a single principle or outline of action. There was opposition, to be sure, to the present constitutional mode of collecting and guarding the public revenue, but not a hint at a substitute. There was to be no constitutional treasury, it seemed; no responsibility to the people on the part of those entrusted with the money of the people; but it was impossible to learn whether the abolition of the bank or state banks, were the place of existing arrangements, and it was equally impossible to ascertain the kind of currency to be received in place of gold and silver, for public use—whether it was to be paper depreciated five per cent., or paper depreciated twenty per cent. Such was the case throughout, and, though this shooting in the dark and riding without saddle or bridle has for once proved an effective mode of electorizing, yet we must say that it does not appear either rational or creditable.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

A victory has been won by the enemies of the democratic party; but what has been decided by it, beyond a change of men in office? Upon what question of government or legislation has the nation given its judgment by electing Harrison? Let us see.

So far as the election was influenced by corrupt means so far as it was bought with money, which every body knows was used more profusely—vastly more so than was ever before by any party in the United States, nothing was decided. There were in some quarters a frightful looseness of morality in regard to corrupt voting, greater than any ever known in this country, and of this the whigs by means of the immense funds which they raised, were enabled to take advantage.

But although the whig vote was greatly increased by these foul practices, we are not willing to believe their majority was owing to this cause. There prevails throughout the country much discontent. The whigs are angry because the whig party need themselves to aggravate that discontent, and to turn it against the administration, and have been in a great degree successful. They made many honest people believe that because the hard times and low prices came on under the administration of Van Buren, that the whig party were to blame for the hard times and low prices. They reasoned precisely as the worthy fisherman on Long Island Sound, who used to affirm that the building of a certain light house was the cause of the spotted fever, and the whig party were to blame for the fever prevailing in the very same year. A vast many people, of right intentions but weak heads, were fooled by this kind of reasoning, and made up their minds that a change was necessary, or at least that it would be well to have a change of administration by way of experiment.

Allowing all due weight to these causes, we believe that this will be found to have wrought by far the greatest effect in giving the majority to the inconstant, to the anti-democratic party. Supposing this to be the case, the whig party are to be congratulated upon what great public measure or course of measures has the nation in electing Harrison, pronounced its opinion?

Not surely on the question of a national bank. The whigs would not allow that question to be presented to the people, and yet admit that it was involved in the election, and not only kept it out of sight, but in some instances vehemently and angrily south, the interests of the whole union, will call upon us to pursue the same illustrious example of '98, '99, '90. With a view of preparing us all for this achievement, we shall begin to lay before our readers in our next paper, the resolutions of '98, and Madison's report of '99. Let us be all eyes and ears right again—and what better can we do than sound the bugle note of the democracy of '99?

Meantime we lay before our readers the following very interesting extract of a letter from one of the most distinguished men of Pennsylvania—

Extract of a letter from Philadelphia, Nov. 13, 1840.
 "Intend of stopping under defeat, we feel that we are all summoned to new and higher duties. Rough times before us, but we must meet them and conquer. The democratic principle and all its modes of administration, are in more danger than in Jefferson's time; the confederacy against them being more extensive, the money power greater, and the alliance with England far more universal, with the means of rendering it far more potent and quick, than ever heretofore. Add to these the new and terrible danger from abolition, which the south will have to wake up before the 8th of March, whether as a home or an international question."

What do the whigs propose to themselves by Harrison's election, now, that they have sung him, and drunk him into power? What are their intentions? Look at them here in Pennsylvania where their principles in politics are as well known as anywhere. When they take the state administration into their hands at the close of '35, Mr. Biddle and the whigs ruled every thing, through gov. Ritner, for three full years, at the close of which, they left the affairs of the state in the most wretched confusion. What have we had? We had broken banks, broken faith, general stagnation of business, and I know not what amount of individual and public calamity of all sorts. This was seen and confessed by all parties—at least, the sensible of all. Mr. Biddle's great bank which was to work wonders under its new charter from the state, when thus fresh from federal intermeddling, and all other whig projects of that day, having worked nothing but mischief here and over half the union, before earning disrepute and ruin, and leaving the same party in the city of Philadelphia, where for seven years they have had uncontrolled sway, and mismanaged the city in all ways, increasing the taxes enormously without corresponding benefits, and draining the beautiful city of its wealth (in some amount) by abuses and jobbing seeking to think of. Are these the forecasts of whig policy on a national scale? I fear so. I fear things much, which I cannot stop to enumerate. You have yourself well understood a portion of them in your letter, and will understand the rest better than I do. We must not, my dear sir, lay down our arms. We must not disband. We must not relax a muscle. Mr. Van Buren has acted consistently, firm and cool, and has been well supplied with all our objects and principles, and sustained them nobly to the last. Well might he exclaim with Brutus—

"I shall have glory by this losing day."

More than Octavius, and Mark Anthony,

By this vile conquest shall attain unto me."

"Virginia, the mother of states, and of statesmen, how proudly does she stand forth in her independence, intelligence and spirit, not to have been the dupe of the miserable delusions to which others have yielded! Boast of your state, you have a right to do so; we will all do you homage, if we do you justice."

"What would your Washington have thought of Webster in 1812 or your Jefferson and Madison, of the annually countenanced of their principles, than which no clown upon the stage could have acted a longer part? Your justly renowned commonwealth, now stands almost alone in her moral grandeur."

From the Pennsylvania (Virginia) Jeffersonian.

After a long and arduous struggle, extending through twelve years, and accompanied by vicissitudes of aid and hope and distressing fear, the whig party, have at last reached the goal of success, and have now an opportunity to carry out practically the principles which they have heretofore advocated as conducive to good government, and the happiness and prosperity of the country.

That this opportunity will be readily embraced, we do not entertain a doubt. We look forward confidently to the time when all the promises made by the whig party will be redeemed, when the abuses of government will be corrected, and the constitution as it was intended by its framers will be the supreme rule and guide of the federal administration.

Gen. Harrison comes into office under many advantages. He is the choice of at least twenty states, and has earned a majority of at least one hundred electors.

The anti-slavery cause will meet after his inauguration, will contain in both branches, a majority of those who are friendly to his administration, and be will have the greater portion of the virtue and talent of the republic from which to select his cabinet officers.

With these advantages, we may hope that the pledges made by his friends will be fairly redeemed, and that amidst his two incoherent professions he will perform, in its moment of need, the duty which he will perform of promises on the faith of which that power was attained.

In connection with this subject, we extract from the Boston American the following article, the tone and temper of which we much approve:

THE RESULT—THE CONSEQUENCES.—For all practical purposes the presidential canvass is at an end, and the majority by gen. Wm. Harrison is chosen to occupy the chief of Washington. It is decisive as to leave him at liberty to pursue what we cannot doubt to be the bent of his own inclination—the large and liberal policy of a nation's favorite, governing for a nation, and not for a party.

Some days will yet elapse before all the details of the battle and the victory can be ascertained, and the feverishness of the public mind, while the strife was raging, has not yet subsided into that calm and rational tone to which alone any arguments as to the future should be advantageously addressed.

Meantime, however, we may throw out a few suggestions—not, certainly pretending to speak for any one but ourselves—as to the course which we still hope the new administration will pursue.

The position that we have already assumed, that gen. Harrison will be the president of the whole country, and not of a party, of itself establishes a marking contrast between the new administration and that which will succeed, and carried out to its legitimate consequences, includes, necessarily, a return, a real and bona fide return to the true standard of appointments to office. "Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the constitution?" will now be the first question to every appointment, and we do not think it can be answered affirmatively, no supplementary merit of party services, or personal devotion will be permitted to avail.

The standard of official appointments will be raised, and those who will be required to fill the offices they hold. But, more than this—they will be required to attend to their duties, and leave all those connected with electioneering, with missionary services as parties, attending public meetings, making speeches, and otherwise bringing the "patronage of the general government into conflict with the freedom of elections," all such duties they shall be required to leave to others, or lose their office.

The standard of "the fitness" will be repudiated as a rule of action. Changes, indeed, should be made, must be made, not only in cabinet and diplomatic appointments, which for the most part must take their rise and color from the head of the administration, but also among the incumbents have made themselves self-sustaining in politics.

When it shall be seen that men who do step out of the line of their duties to mingle in party strife are punished for their misdeeds, those who shall succeed them will learn the invaluable lesson of minding their business, and letting the people mind theirs.

We are more emphatic on this point, from the brazen and notorious impudence with which the custom house officers of this city have interfered, both in this state and other states, in the recent election.

We have seen them at the polls buying up voters, slawhanging, belting, bullying and challenging voters, and have felt that such a course of interference on the part of federal officers ought to be severely rebuked.

On the contrary, however, when men in office have confined themselves to the single exercise of their official duties, without obtruding themselves offensively upon their neighbors, or seeking to interfere with them, and are diligent, competent and faithful in the execution of their public trusts, we hope, we presume, they will not be disturbed, whatever be their political preferences.

From the Savannah (Geo.) Republican.

MODERATION IN VICTORY.—The extreme composure as well as gratification with which the whigs of the United States receive the news of their victory, the absence of all public demonstrations, and the rejoicings, are so many convincing proofs of their proper American feeling. It is and ought to be evident to all that a party which tempers victory with the moderation of all public rejoicings, and the confidence of the whole country. The course of public rejoicings, processions, and festivals are abundant, but we have seen nothing more than sober republican manifestations of the most unmingled joy and satisfaction. For thirty years, for the last twenty years, and even, when the election of Jackson and Van Buren, the thunder of artillery was heard from the lakes to the ocean. The joy felt by true Americans resides in the heart, and the great whig victory just achieved, has been celebrated by the friends of liberty, by a proper and unpretending interchange of heartfelt congratulations. Pending an election, processions and the firing of guns may be excused, but, in an hour like this, the prevalence of the cheering and the shouting, and the importunate characters to admit of mirth and exhilaration.

From the Green River (Kan.) Gazette.

THE PROSPECT. The great agony is over. The battle has been fought, and the victor is chosen. Harrison will come into the presidency with the almost unexampled approbation and enthusiasm of the citizens of the union. It is altogether probable that he has obtained the vote of every state except two, and that he has secured the assent of the vast sentiments of the citizens of these two or three are doubtless in his behalf. In the result of this contest of liberty against executive power—the people against their own agents, and those who aimed to enslave them—there is much to encourage the patriots of our revolution and the friends of liberty and republican institutions throughout the world. The glorious results of this election will give strength, stability and prosperity to the democratic institutions of the country. It will give us every friend of liberty and of representative government with a confident assurance that the people, when properly aroused and enlightened, are competent to govern themselves, and that they will not long submit to unauthorized encroachments upon their rights—to high-handed oppressions, violent pledges, and insolent disregard of their feelings, and their interests by their own agents.

The history of the two last administrations discloses a series of errors, locomotions and wrongs of profligate poverty, party subversion, and contempt of the feelings, interests and rights of the people, that will constitute a dark page in its annals, and which will read with wonder, disgust and indignation by enlightened freemen in all succeeding times. These pages will be rendered doubly dark by the brightness and purity of the pages that will precede and follow them. Authentic history will portray the conduct of J. Q. Adams as one of the purest, brightest and best since the organization of the government, and from the well-defined and established character of Harrison, as a patriot and statesman, we look forward with confidence to the future. The new administration is pure and useful. We confidently rely upon his fully realizing the wishes and expectations of the real whigs and his true friends. "That he will serve but one term," and that he will not permit the patronage of the government to be used for the "freedom of elections." That he will not attempt to influence the deliberations of congress. That he will not remove an honest and competent officer from office for party purposes. That he will appoint no more members of congress, or those who have been declared unworthy of office by the people themselves, and that he will curtail the exercise of executive discretion and power, and the expenditures of the government. In a word, that he will struggle with honesty, to reform the abuses introduced by the late administrations, and give purity, efficiency and usefulness to our representative system of government.

From the Lancaster (Pa.) Eagle.

Whether our cause is again triumphant, in the re-election of Mr. Van Buren, or whether it is temporarily borne down by the extraordinary efforts and monstrous appliances of federalism, cannot yet be known. But we have felt that the cause of the people that make foul success, disgrace, and defeat upon our part, honor; and because such was the means brought against it, it has fallen to rise and rise with renewed strength and a firmer ascendancy. The progress of democratic principle—the principles that government is instituted for, and should be directed to, the equal advantage of the many—not the exclusive advantage of the favored and aristocratic few, is onward. It may be delayed, but it cannot be defeated. Another and another conflict may eventuate before its final triumph. The politics of the revolution endured many a privation, and fought many a battle, before they redeemed this fair land from the thrall of British arms. And yet you think that the influence of British gold will be less easily conquered? Not—not less easily, nor yet less certainly! For one, I see motives for renewed exertion growing out of the past contest, but not a reason for despair.

From the Boston Post.

It will be seen that the democrats of this city, and indeed of the state, have done grandly, and increased their vote largely since last year—but the whigs have not done so well. We are obliged to submit with as good grace as possible to our defeat, confident of better luck next time.

The result of the election in Massachusetts, a great many more votes polled than there were last year.

A uniform for sale.—Inquire at this office.

The uniform. We offered our uniform for sale, yesterday, but the whigs have spent so much money in "playing pipe," they could not raise enough to buy it; so we shall keep it until 1842, when we shall have a chance to wear it again. Governor Davis' aids will be obliged to appear in citizens' dress.

[There is every probability that John Davis of Worcester—nicknamed "Ironhead"—has been elected governor of Massachusetts for one year from the 1st of January, 1841. Wish you happy new year, John.

All those with whom we have met. Please call one at a time, approaching our office from Washington street, and departing through congress street, keeping in a line, so as not to block up the highway.

We're not alarmed. We shall run our flag out a little while this morning, merely to dry them—therefore we beg our whig friends not to be agitated at the sight. We assure them that general Harrison and Mr. Davis have both succeeded. The whigs won't believe it until we say so, if the Atlas should swear to it for a month.

[If you are doomed to be whipped, there is a satisfaction even in having it done so effectually that there is no mistake about it—we do not like any of your half and half business—give us a decisive triumph or a decisive defeat.

The whigs behave very well about their victory—they were as polite and good natured yesterday as gentlemen need be, and the democrats evinced that cheerfulness which ever accompanies a conscientious discharge of duty.

That's the punk. The democratic boys of ward One paid us a visit last night, and gave us three as hearty cheers as their throats were capable of delivering—stick to it lads, and before you are men you will see a democratic president.

[There is some fun about the whigs, after all. On a banner in a whig convention, held somewhere "out west," was the following:

HARRIET LIVERMORE. Those of the readers of the Messenger, and others, who listened some years since to the public lectures, of Miss Harriet Livermore, in which she labored upon the wrongs of the "poor Indian," and dwelt much upon the near approach of the millennium, will doubtless be gratified to learn her whereabouts.

Eight years ago she lectured in our own city of Richmond, since which time she has visited many of the tribes of our western Indians, and at one time proposed to spend the remainder of her days with the red people in the vicinity of Fort Leavenworth, but her intentions were frustrated, she says, by the machinations of the commander and the Indian agents, who wished to dislodge her. Perplexed and disappointed, she was then led to exclaim "what shall I do?"—and a still small voice seemed to reply—"peace be unto thee;—then shalt go to Jerusalem." Accordingly we have before us a letter from her, dated in the confines of Judaea. Yes, twice has this, in many respects, extraordinary woman, visited the sepulchres of the prophets; and now she says, "it is to die there."

Believe what we may, there is something simple, beautiful and affecting in all this; this unsensational faith, this self-sacrificing obedience, this spirit of duty. It is a spirit akin to the primitive Christians; a spirit, which the selfishness, the expediency, the greediness of gain, and the matter of fact character of the age in which we live, are fast extinguishing from mankind. It is akin to that which saved the good, yet, even the great Obelisk, great with small means, and the pastor and legislator of the secluded Ba de la Roche. Miss Livermore may accomplish nothing to be hereafter blazoned on the roll of fame; but the simple lives of truth and duty paramount in her own mind will bring to her its "own exceeding great reward."

At the date of her letter she had scarcely reached her place of destination, and it is accordingly difficult to obtain gratifying to her private friends, but of hardly sufficient interest for the public eye. It abounds with sentiments of the most ardent piety, and faith in Him who has hitherto protected her in her solitary pilgrimage, and who has promised to "temper the wind to the shorn lamb." It must be borne in mind that she travels alone, apparently unaccompanied by any of our missionary laity.

At Gibraltar she was hospitably entertained by its worthy consul, Mr. Sprague, who seems not unmindful of the apostolical injunction to "entertain strangers." With a pleasure highly creditable to her heart, she dwells upon the many proofs of kindness and benevolence she experienced in his amiable family, and the substantial comforts they provided for her long and perilous journey.

While entering the bay of Malte, she was saluted with the familiar air of "Hail Columbia," played by a Maltese, who came alongside, and thus did honor to her country. She threw him some coin, while her thoughts were far away with the home and country she should see no more.

On her arrival at Valletta, she was met, with particulars of the city made holy by the footsteps of the Saviour, and the witness of his death and resurrection. The remarkable aspect of the times, the change of the seat of war between civilized communities, from the East to the West, and the concurrent testimony of prophecy, whether to be understood literally or otherwise, seem to point out this portion of the earth as a theatre on which great events are yet to be revealed. The circumstance of the Rotschilds holding a mortgage of the Holy City, which seems to be well authenticated, adds not a little to the peculiar interest with which all eyes regard this interesting portion of the world.

MARY JENISON. The history of Mary Jenison, a name of some notoriety in our annals, is thus written in a letter from the Genesee Valley, N. Y., to the Commercial Advertiser:

The Gardow reservation, to which I have referred, and upon a section of which general Brooks resides, was a tract of ten thousand acres which the Seneca Indians reserved in their sale to Robert Morris, in 1797, conferring it upon Mary Jenison, the celebrated "white woman," who resided upon it till her decease, a very few years ago, she died, or fifteen years ago. Mary Jenison was truly a remarkable woman. She was of Irish parents, and was born at sea on their passage to America in 1742 or '43. Her parents settled on what was at that time the frontier of Pennsylvania. She had an uncle in the command of Washington, who fell at Braddock's defeat. In the spring of 1755, Mary, her parents, two brothers and several inmates of the house, were taken prisoners by a party of half a dozen Seneca Indians and four Frenchmen. They were all hurried into the woods, and the whole party murdered afterwards, Mary alone excepted. She was exposed to all the hardships and privations of a prisoner until her arrival at Seneca town; where she was adopted into an Indian family, as daughter, and henceforward treated with kindness and respect, living life, and for a season meditating upon the means of escape. These being frustrated, she at length resigned herself entirely to the Indian life and customs. At a proper age, she was married to a Delaware Indian, whom she loved, and by whom she had one or more children. She visited our frontiers several times, and occasionally resided among the Shawnee Indians.

Her husband died, and she afterwards married a Seneca chief, living in the Genesee Valley, at about the beginning of the war of the revolution. Her Seneca husband was a man of blood, but kind and affectionate to her. She retained her family name, Jenison, and also the English language, which she spoke fluently, until the day of her death. But although she had been religiously instructed by her parents, she embraced the religion of the Indians, and, in a word, became thoroughly Indianized; adopting and becoming enamored of all their manners, habits and customs throughout. Her life was full of incident and wild adventure. The Indians ever entertained an exalted opinion for her, and she was evinced by the Gardow treaty—embracing a rich section, both of interval and upland, upon which she resided until her death. In obtaining this grant, or reservation, moreover, she showed all the cunning of her adopted people. Mr. Thomas Morris, who conducted the treaty for his father, has told me that when the request was made to him for a reservation for "the white woman," he supposed they meant only a farm of some two or three hundred acres, but that the woman herself, by artfully inducing certain bounds with which he was not exactly familiar, actually overreached them, and obtained the large tract already mentioned, including the whole of the Gadow flat, and the romantic walls of rock and hill within which they were sequestered.

During the war of the revolution her house was often the quarters of col. Brant and col. John Butler, when making their incursions upon the frontiers of the colonies. She attended the treaty of Genesee State, by general Schuyler, in 1775, and her life taken down in writing, from the year 1725, was full of incident and adventure. She would not throw off her Indian costume even after the white population had completely surrounded her residence; but adhered to the Indian customs with the utmost tenacity to the last. She was rich, not only in land, but in herds and flocks, and had tenants who worked her lands. One of her sons was educated a physician, and obtained a surgeon's commission in the navy, dying a few days ago on the Mediterranean station. In many respects Mary was a valuable woman—humane and benevolent—and doing great good among the people of her adoption.

MONUMENT TO GEN. MERCER. One of our reporters has obtained, through the kindness of Messrs. John Struvers & Son, the following description of the monument which is to be erected at Laurel Hill on the 23d instant, and beneath which the remains of the gallant MERCER are to repose after their removal from their present resting place (Christ church yard on Second street) on the 26th instant.

The lower base upon the ground is plain, four feet six inches square, and seven inches in height; over this is another base, plain and moulded, three feet eight inches square, and sixteen inches in height; from this rises the shaft, at the four corners of which will appear a chaste and classic pilaster, between which, and carved upon the panels of the die, will appear the inscriptions; the die will be two feet ten inches square, and three feet three inches in height; over this will be a cornice, upon which is sculptured an American sword and scabbard, crossed, and surrounded by a radii or glory. This was the piece which was exhibited at the Franklin institute. It is three feet two inches square, and thirteen inches in height. Upon this rests the plinth of the urn, which is plain and ornamented, is two feet square, and eleven inches in height. The whole surmounted by a tripodical urn, supported by three Roman auries. The urn is two feet four inches in height. The total height of the whole monument will be nine feet six inches.

Below we give the inscription, precisely, we believe, as they are to be engraved upon the panels of the die:

WM. P. DARNES, whose trial at St. Louis has excited so much attention, was found guilty of "manslaughter in the fourth degree," which subjected him to a fine of $500.

ELECTRICITY. It has been ascertained from careful and often repeated experiments, that the electric fluid travels at the astonishing and inconceivable velocity of two hundred thousand miles in a single second of time! So that if a wire was passed around this globe of ours this subtle agent would traverse the circumference, about twenty-four thousand miles in about the right part of a second.

A WAR IN ASIA. This fall of the St. Onofre, a vessel from Asia, was lost last year born unfortunately attended. The Tartars, Comacs and Cabardians brought in 30,000 wild horses. It also collected 10,000 horses of finest breeds, 50,000 oxen, cows, bulls, steers and heifers, 100,000 sheep, 10,000 swine—these were run every morning. A Circassian horse, rode by its owner, gained a prize of 25,000 roubles. Two horses from Kashg. in Tartary, were the next in success. A Circassian horse, however, gained a race extending to the length of six French leagues, with a stake of 500 dollars, and all the twelve horses which ran against him, each of which was worth 1,000 roubles.

THE GERMAN REFORM CHURCH. From the proceedings of the late general synod of this church, we learn that the subscription number attached to the union, exclusive of the synod of Ohio, exhibits an aggregate of about 200 ministers, 60 congregations, and 75,000 members. The periodicals of this church, the "Weekly Messenger" and "Zeitschrift," are reported to be liberally supported, and an effort is being made to swell the subscription list of each to at least 5,000. Their literary and theological institutions, located at Mercersburg, Pa. are in a very flourishing condition; and at the late meeting of their general synod, it was resolved, during the centenary year 1841, special efforts should be made to raise an additional sum of 100,000 dollars for the complete and permanent endowment of the institutions, in connection with the cause of beneficent education. INDIA RUBBER. This most remarkable article, which only a few years ago was sent to this country as ballast, now sells, in a fine state, as high as 10s. to 11s. per pound, when spun into thread. One firm spins as much India rubber thread every week as would reach from London to Canton, the country it is imported from. There are twelve patents for this article, and these patents have cost more to defend in law than the amount paid for India rubber since the article has been known to us as of any value. Experiments are now making in England and France to apply the article to the cure of consumption. [London paper.]

INDUSTRY. The hon. John Quincy Adams, who is now 74 years of age, delivered a lecture before the Boston Association in his lecture hall on Monday evening last; he went there from Boston the same day. On Tuesday evening, he delivered a lecture before a similar institute in New Haven, and on Wednesday evening he lectured before the New York Association in the Broadway tabernacle in New York city. On Thursday evening he delivered a lecture before one of the Brooklyn associations; and on Friday evening he delivered a second lecture, on faith, before the New York lyceum.

LAKE ERIE HARBORS. The British government have directed a survey and report of the condition of all the harbors on Lake Erie in the province, and the roads leading to them, with the view to their improvement.

THE LAW OF NEWSPAPERS. We learn from the Boston Courier that Judge Williams, in a late case before the common pleas, laid down the law in relation to a question interesting to editors of newspapers, as follows:

1. Where a subscriber to a newspaper orders it to be discontinued, and it continues to be left at his residence, the presumption is, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that it is left by the subscriber's orders, and upon a promise to pay for it.

2. If a newspaper is left from day to day for a person at his place of business with his knowledge and consent, and he expresses his consent, or if he has reason to believe that it is left under the expectation that he is to pay for it; in that case he will be bound to pay for it, unless he gives notice to discontinue it.

THE LOG CABIN STATE. We claim this title for Pennsylvania. In this state—in this county—in this town, the impudent sneer of the Baltimore Republican at G. N. Harrison's poverty was first publicly resented, by inscribing the "log cabin" upon the banners of the people. Here, in Harrisburg, the first republicans in the world, and the first of our principle, and of our contempt for the sneers of the officeholders. Soon after the article appeared in the Baltimore Republican, declaring that, with $2,000 a year, Gen. Harrison would be content to live in the log cabin and drink cold water; it was suggested that the people should reward the author of this sneer by electing him, and therefore the writer of this drew a log cabin, which was painted on a transparency and exhibited on the 20th of January. Since that time log cabins have become famous. Thus it will be seen that here Harrisburg was started, and here his "log cabin" was started also. After this, who will doubt our claim to the title of the log cabin state! [Harrisburg Chron.]

NEW HAMPSHIRE. The population of New Hampshire in 1800 was 483,555; in 1810, 214,460; in 1820, 244,161, and in 1830, 269,638. It now contains a population of 254,181. Increase during the last ten years 14,845.

OXALIC ACID. It may be important to mention especially in this case of loving acid, that two ounces of magnesia, mixed with about a quart of water, or the same quantity of common whiting, thrown into the stomach by any means (stomach pump being readily and most preferable on such occasions), will effectually neutralize and render inert this most active poison.

SHIP BUILDING. The first vessel built in New England in 1840, at Plymouth, and was a large boat or shallop. The second, was the "Blessing of the Bay," a vessel of forty or fifty tons, built by Gov. Winsthrop, in 1631, at Mistic, now Medford, and launched on the fourth of July. The third was built in 1634 at the Indian harbor, (Marblehead) by the "Salmon people." This vessel was one hundred and twenty tons burden, and called the "Daire." In 1641, the "Plymouth people" built another of fifty tons.

SILK. The Tennessee silk society held their annual meeting last month. Some very fair specimens were exhibited.

STEAMERS. A new line. The New York Commercial directory announces that the preliminary of a project for a new line between that port and England is nearly completed, and that the keels of four gigantic vessels of 2,000 tons, with engines of 800 horse power each are to be laid. They intend to improve the existing steamers, and to make the passage in ten days.

The great Russian war steamer, Kamskatic, built under the superintendence of Messrs. Schuyler, N. York, at the yard of Mr. William H. Brown, was launched in dry dock on the 24th inst. Burthen 2,049 tons.

The steam ship Neptune, Rollins, arrived at Havana on the 12th inst. in three days from Charleston. She was expected to leave for New Orleans on the 13th, to resume her station in the Texas trade.

STEAMBOATS. The Queen of the West, arrived at New Orleans on the 26th, in four days and twenty-two hours from Cincinnati.

STEAMBOAT ACCIDENT. The steamboat Persian on her way from New Orleans to St. Louis, when a few miles below Napoleon, Arkansas, collapsed a flue, by which nineteen persons were instantly killed and thirty badly scalded, principally deck passengers. The total number of the sufferers in a New Orleans paper, according to which, but 12 persons are ascertained as yet to have been killed. The Vicksburg Sentinel of the 11th inst. states, that the melancholy accident occurred "after a well contested race between the Persian and the Queen of the United States." The Sentinel adds, that this "accident may be relied upon as correct," as it is given upon the authority of the captain of the Meteor.

WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY. The catalogue of this institution for the academic year of 1840-41, gives the total number of students at 135; of which there are seniors 34, juniors 43, sophomores 29, and 23 freshmen. The rev. Dr. Olin, recently arrived from Europe, will, in a few days, assume the duties of president of the university.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

THE REMAINS OF NAPOLEON. The French frigate Belle Poule, commanded by the prince de Joinville, accompanied by the Favorite sloop of war, reached St. Helena on the 8th October, from France. The remains were received with due respect. The mortal remains of Napoleon were to be taken on board the frigate on the 15th October, that being the day on which Bonaparte arrived at St. Helena, 23 years ago. In the retinue from France for the purpose of the prince are counts de Choiseul, Las Cases and Marchand, and generals Bertrand and Gourgaud, and four of Napoleon's former domestics at St. Helena.

There is a sarcophagus of ebony by the "Belle Poule," for the purpose of holding the coffin of Napoleon. On board the "Belle Poule" is a chapel fitted up for its reception, which is lined with black velvet, in small panels, sprinkled all over with silver stars, festooned with silver cord and tassels.—There is an altar, with a crucifix over it, at one end of the chapel. This sarcophagus is supported at the corners by four eagles. On the top of it is to be placed an embroidered black velvet cushion, and on the cushion a crown. Suspended to the ceiling, immediately above the crown, a ball with a cross on the top of it, and under the ball the emblem of justice. In the chapel are also four pyramids to hold candles; suspended to the ceiling are four vases to burn incense; there is also a rich velvet pall, which is said to have cost 25,000 francs, to cover the sarcophagus.

MUNITIONS OF WAR. The N. Y. Commercial Advertiser says that the naval forces of the different powers, now in the Mediterranean, are presumed to be as follows:

France—Twenty sail of the line, ten frigates and ninety smaller vessels, including steamers.

England—Sixteen sail of the line, four frigates and twenty smaller vessels.

Russia—Ten sail of the line and eleven frigates, corvettes and brigs.

Austria—Two sail of the line and five smaller vessels.

Egypt—Seventeen sail of the line and forty smaller vessels.

Turkey—Three sail of the line and nine frigates, corvettes, &c.

Sardinia—Four frigates, corvettes and brigs.

United States—One sail of the line, one frigate and one corvette.

Total, two hundred and sixty-five vessels.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Journal of Commerce, writing from Macao under date of 22d June, says—

Nothing is known of the intentions of the English government, but it is conjectured that Canton will not be attacked; that the Bogue forts will be taken possession of, and the river blocked; and if the force then move immediately to the north. If they go to Peking at once, they will be unsuccessful; the probability is that they will take possession of Chusan, or some similar position, and operate from thence on such points as seem to offer the best chance of distressing the Chinese without great loss of life. These probably are the months of the grand canal with them. There are parties who believe this will be sufficient; but to me it seems wholly inadequate to the end proposed; which, as I have often written, is virtually to revolutionize the immense empire. Such a result may be brought about, but only I think by a system of intimidation, and such a show of force as shall convince the Chinese that resistance is wholly useless. The may be affected without difficulty, by a resolute power; for the great cities of China, on the coast, are wholly defenceless, their forts every where dilapidated, and their arms, matchlocks and bows, almost rusted. But the fear is that the English will be contented with a little, and they will not take proper steps to secure even this permanently; but a few days may enable us to form a better opinion of what is to be done hereabouts.

Meanwhile the Americans are in Canton; almost all their ships are out of the river, and they will not take proper steps to secure even this permanently; but a few days may enable us to form a better opinion of what is to be done hereabouts. The Chinese proclamation. The following curious affair has been issued by the Chinese authorities: Promission of rewards for destroying the English. An offer of rewards which will truly be awarded to any one who shall destroy the English.

1st. Whether civil or military officers, soldiers or people, whoever shall be able to take an English man-of-war carrying eighty great guns, delivering the same to the mandarins, shall receive the reward of $20,000. For a smaller vessel, carrying fewer guns, less will be given. For every great gun less the reward will be diminished $100. Whatever the great vessel contains—besides the great guns, weapons of war and opium, which must be given up—the mandarins, excepted—such as clocks, watches, clothes or money—all these in addition shall be awarded to the takers of the vessel! Again to any one who shall destroy a great man-of-war of said foreigners, not leaving any of the vessel, or substantial evidence being produced of the same—shall be given the reward of $10,000. For a smaller one less in proportion.

2d. Whoever takes an English merchant vessel, shall have as a reward what the vessel contains—excepting the vessel, great guns, implements of war and opium, which must be given up to the mandarins—such as goods and money. In addition to which, for a large vessel with three masts, the takers shall receive the reward of $10,000; two and a half masts, $5,000; two masts, $3,000. For taking an English barge (sloop) or passage boat, $300; a small one, $100.

Whether large or small, for the destroying or sinking of each English vessel—substantial evidence being produced of the same—the proportion of one-third of the foregoing rewards shall be awarded.

3d. For taking alive a foreign mandarin or officer, on inquiry should it be ascertained that he is the said man-of-war's chief officer, the reward shall be ($5,000); if a second officer, or any other officer, more or less, according to his rank and office—his rate of pay—for every degree lower, the reward shall be diminished $500.

4th. For killing foreign mandarins or officers—substantial evidence being produced of the same—one-third of the proportional reward for taking such alive shall be awarded.

5th. For seizing alive Englishmen or parsons, whether soldiers or merchants, for each one a reward shall be given of $100; for each one killed—substantial evidence being produced of the same—$20. As for taking the black devil, it ought to be decided whether they are soldiers or slaves, and the reward granted accordingly!

6th. For taking Han vessels—Chinese—who supply the barbarians, or deal in opium, the same on trial being condemned, decapitated and their heads exposed; for each of such $100 reward; besides these, for those of less crime, a less reward will be given! Translated by I. J. R.

TEXAS AND MEXICO.

Galveston papers of the 15th of November say: "We are further convinced," says the Galveston Courier, "from intelligence received lately by the office of the Post, from Corpus Christi bay, that there has been no serious collision between Austin (centralist) and Canales (federal). At the latest accounts, Canales was making rapid marches from town to town, in the direction of Tempico, and every place he visited declaring in favor of the 'constitution of 1824,' and joining in his march against the 'Houston Star,' of the 11th, contains the following:

Success of col. Moore's expedition. We learn by letter from Austin, received by last night's mail, that on the 21st ult. the troops under the command of col. Moore came in sight of a large Cumanche camp, on the head waters of the Colorado, about 200 miles northwest of Austin, which they attacked, and succeeded in killing about 150 Indians, captured 82 prisoners, and about 500 horses and mules. Among the captives were two American soldiers. Col. Moore, with his command, arrived at Austin, on the 7th inst. and was received by the inhabitants with the highest demonstrations of joy and commendation.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

According to the requirements of law, the electors of president and vice president were on Wednesday last the 24 December, to assemble at the seat of government of their respective states, and cast their ballots for president and vice president. They are to make three lists of the votes. One of these is sent by a special messenger, appointed by the electoral college of each state, to Washington, and is to be delivered to the president of the senate, on or before the first Wednesday of January; another is required to be forthwith forwarded to the president of the senate by mail; the third is to be forthwith delivered to the district judge of the United States in the district in which the electors assemble. If a list of votes shall not have been received at the seat of government on the first Wednesday of January, the secretary of state is required to dispatch a special messenger to the district judge for the list left with him.

On the second Wednesday of February, congress is required to be in session, and the certificates of the votes, which have been received, are to be opened by the president of the senate, in presence of the house of representatives, and counted, and the persons elected ascertained and declared. The presidential term commences on the fourth of March.

In case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability of the president, the vice president executes the duties of president until an election. If there be no president or vice president, the president pro tem. of the senate executes the duties; and if there be no president of the senate, the speaker of the house of representatives does the duty. In case the offices of president and vice president are both vacant, the secretary of state is to notify the executives of the states, and to give public notice of an election of electors, to be held at the time and in the manner of the regular election, if there be two months after notice before that time, if not, the next succeeding year.

WHICH IS THE BANNER STATE?

The whigs at an early stage of the electioneering for the next president, proposed to designate which-ever state should give the Harrison ticket the largest majority, as THE BANNER STATE. There has been considerable rivalry for the honor, and the whig candidates, for the most part, have been anxious to be designated as the banner state, but because not one Van Buren candidate was elected in their recent election; the state, every county in the state, and every hundred in every county in the state, having elected for all officers without exception, the whig candidates, leaving out one man of their opponents in place.

A writer in the Delaware Journal on the signature of the old revolutionary appellation of "The Blue Hen's Chickens," who urges their pretensions, says: Delaware is not under the same portion of the union with but ten thousand votes which can bring at one election to the aid of old Tip, and his friends two senators in congress—that is, one twenty-sixth part of the whole legislative power of the nation.

"Delaware is indeed the little one among the sisters of the great American family; and because she is the little one, she is entitled to be the pet, provided she has done most for the family according to her means." Sure I am she has been compelled to work hardest.

YAMONT aspired to the honor, not only by giving what it was supposed would be the largest proportional majority, viz: 14,088, out of an aggregate of 50,792 votes, being 27.73 and a fraction per cent. on the whole vote, but also because in all the vicissitudes of the whig party, whilst every other state in the union has at one time or other wavered from the faith, Vermont remained invariably firm; never yielding to the Jackson or Van Buren policy.

KENTUCKY, however, comes in with their claim, not only as having given in fact the largest proportional majority—that is, a majority of 25,574 out of an aggregate of 91,105 votes, being 28.09 and a fraction per cent. on the whole vote, but also as having given the largest of all the majorities, notwithstanding her majority of 4,300 of her own statesmen, who was amongst the foremost of the candidates looked to by the whig party, and whose claims were postponed upon the occasion. Upon this tack, old Massachusetts comes in also with high pretensions for distinction.

MARYLAND bases her claim upon the fact, that the nomination of Harrison and Tyler was first made by Maryland—at the whig state convention of 1835. The proposition, if we mistake not, came originally from the delegate from Frederick county to that convention.

THE BANNER COUNTY. Designation is claimed by Worcester, Massachusetts, which gave Harrison the largest aggregate majority, viz: 4,772. Lancaster, Pennsylvania, the next highest, gave a Harrison majority of 4,300.

The comparative majorities in Tennessee in some instances is still larger. Sevier county gave for Harrison 936, Van Buren 47; and Jefferson county gave for Harrison 1,911, for Van Buren 131—being more than fourteen for one.

There was an actual and splendid banner at stake between the two counties of Kentucky, Shelby and Mason, which should give the largest Harrison majority. Shelby bore of the prize, but it was a very poor bit as will be seen by the following returns: The Commonwealth insists that it is so near a draw that each county deserves the prize, and the central committee should present them both with banners.

Shelby,	1,070	508	1,002
Mason,	1,556	564	992

It will thus be seen that Mr. Van Buren got four more votes in Shelby than he did in Mason, while general Harrison's majority in Shelby is ten more than it was in Mason.

The nearest match of the parties, occurs in Jasper county, Georgia, where, at the October election for congressmen, 496 votes were given for the candidates on each side—and at the presidential election, Harrison and Van Buren each received exactly 496 votes.

The following nine counties in the U. States gave majorities over 3,000 for the Harrison electoral ticket.

Counties.	States.	Majorities.	No. of votes polled.
1. Worcester,	Massachusetts,	4,772	15,484
2. Lancaster,	Pennsylvania,	4,206	15,150
3. Windsor,	Vermont,	3,206	7,630
4. Massachusetts,		3,160	16,750
5. Kennebec,	Maine,	3,296	10,469
6. Genesee,	New York,	3,243	10,866
7. Suffolk,	Massachusetts,	3,218	12,001
8. Erie,	New York,	3,100	10,474
9. Alleghany,	Pennsylvania,	3,047	12,193

32,517 114,073

The majorities in any six of these counties will overbalance Van Buren's majorities in all the six states that he had majorities. Three of the above counties, it will be observed, are in Massachusetts. Suffolk county comprises Boston and the town of Chelsea. Windsor county, Vt. gives the largest majority in proportion to the votes polled. The Van Buren party have some counties fully a man for any paraded by their opponents. Jackson county, Alabama, for instance, gave Van Buren 2,115, and Harrison only 58 votes.

The Globe thus notices these pretensions:

Whig premium flag. The federal papers having nearly exhausted the "reported" (which is usually the official) majorities in the several states for their candidate, are now casting about to find out which state, county, city and township are entitled to flags, for having given the largest federal majority in proportion to their population. Most of them concur in opinion, that Vermont is their flag state, Windham county, in the same state, the flag county; Boston the flag city, and some township in Mississippi—which they do not name, but say it gave but one democratic vote, and the person who gave it offered the judges $10 (the kind of money they also omit) to let him take it back—in the flag township. They have not named the devices for their flags; but we suppose the ruling passion of the several places will govern. As Vermont is composed chiefly of abolitionists and antislavery, the most appropriate flag for that state, and the county in it, would be a negro in chains, and a Moslem in gales. Boston and Mississippi, being renowned for broken banks, we suppose that a flag with the device of a paper null upon it, would be the most appropriate for those places.

Nothing is said about the "standard bearers;" but as Mr. Blaine is the head of both the abolitionists and antislavery in Vermont, we suppose that he will be selected in that state. The presidents and directors of the broken banks in Boston and Mississippi stand out, in bold relief, as the first persons to bear the paper null flags.

It strikes us that the federalists have omitted to make provision for the most numerous and most meritorious of their troops—those who have borne the brunt and decided the battle—in allude to the "piper layers." What could they have done without them? Nothing. Look at the counties we enumerated last night in Ohio, where they beat the census all hollow. In the little county of Delaware, they beat the census 987 votes. They would have had a flag by all means, and Lenoxy, the pipe layer, should be the standard bearer. As it is late, and our foreman wants to put the paper to press, we have not time to think of a device for it.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Some gentlemen of Charleston, S. C. belonging to the V. B. party have addressed a letter of inquiry to the hon. JOHN TYLER, in view of the possibility that he may be called upon to fill the chief executive chair. After summing up their objections to gen. HARRISON, with whom Mr. Tyler has been associated in the late political canvass, they say:

Finally—sir, with the opinions and declarations of gen. Harrison, as here collected, and particularly in the last of the two preceding queries, do you believe that any sensible man ever so qualified to guard and promote the liberties and the happiness of our country—that such a man can be a republican in any just acceptance of the term?

The concluding portion of Mr. TYLER's letter in answer runs thus—

I unhesitatingly declare it as my firm conviction that William Henry Harrison is qualified to guard and promote the liberties and happiness of his country, because he is the stern and unflinching advocate of popular rights, and the uncompromising opponent of the bold and daring assumption of power which have of late years been claimed and exercised by the chief executive magistrates of this country; because he regards the public offices of the country as created for the benefit and advantage of the people, and not for the political advantage of the president, and in that spirit, utterly, and denouncing the right, on the part of the president, to remove from office one "who is honest, capable and faithful to the constitution," to make way for another, whose chief recommendation is to the office, a vulgar, vulgar and clamorous demagoguery and partizanship because he would carry with him into the administration the principles of Jefferson, and would require of the officeholders to abstain from interfering in the election, and to bestow their attention to their duties, in place of the active partizanship which is now every where exhibited—because he is committed, by his principles, to recommend and to urge upon congress the adoption of such measures as will ultimately in the committee of the public moneys to other hands than the president's, so as effectually to separate the purse from the sword—because he is in favor of economy in the public expenditures, in opposition to that wasteful course of extravagance which has attracted the public moneys to increase in ten years, from $13,000,000, exclusive of the payment of the public debt, to near $40,000,000 annually—because he is the sworn enemy to corruption, and the lover of virtue—because in his election to this office, he has solemnly and faithfully secured that greatest of all reforms, without which, the effort at reformation is hopeless, viz: the limiting for all future time, the presidential term of service to a single term of four years—and because he is an honest, a patriotic, a virtuous principle; and a patriot in practice. I might find other reasons to the history of his past life—a life devoted to the service of his country—nor I have felt unworthy your inquiries. I am, gentlemen, truly and freely to your inquiries, I am, gentlemen, your most obedient servant, JOHN TYLER.

TREASURY NOTES—According to the monthly report of the secretary of the treasury there were outstanding on the 1st inst. $4,333,332 28, a considerable portion of which is on interest.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE. Official Information has been officially received by the department of state of the erection of six new light houses on the coasts of France; of which the following notice is published for the benefit of vessels sailing in that part of the world:

1. End of the Strait of Gibraltar: 49 deg. 29 min. 65 sec. longitude 3 deg. 29 min. west of Paris; the light situated on the fort, about 55 feet above the level of the sea, and may be perceived, in fine weather, at the distance of three leagues.

2. Port Navarre: the light situated on the point of the Morbihan; the light situated on the point, about 70 feet above the sea, and is visible, in fine weather, at the distance of 3 leagues.

3. Cape Verde, about one mile north of the entrance of the basin of Arcahon, in latitude of 44 deg. 38 min. 43 sec. longitude 3 deg. 35 min. 18 sec. west of Paris; the light situated about 200 feet above the level of the sea, and visible at the distance of 6 leagues.

The above are on the Atlantic coasts. The following are on the Mediterranean, near the mouths of the Rhone.

4. La Camargue. In place of the small light-bouy on the east bank of the entrance of the old Rhone, a new one, of the first order, and fixed light has been established on a tower, at the height of about 95 feet above the level of the sea, in latitude of 43 deg. 20 min. 30 sec. longitude 2 deg. 20 min. 30 sec. east from Paris; the light visible at the distance of 6 leagues.

5. Port de Camus, in latitude of 43 deg. 12 min. 30 sec. longitude 3 deg. 11 min. 40 sec. east from Paris; on the left side of the entrance of the port, 90 feet above the level of the sea; visible at the distance of 3 leagues.

6. Port de la Caudal. Another light on a tower at the end of the new mole, on the right side of the entrance of the port; in latitude of 43 deg. 10 min. 30 sec. longitude 3 deg. 10 min. 30 sec. east of Paris; visible at the distance of 3 leagues.

This second light will prevent all possibility of making Clotet for Cassis.

TRADE AND COMMERCE.

COFFEE—from Rio Janeiro. The following statement of the shipments to the United States for the last three months, and for the corresponding period of last year, shows a deficit of 73,756 bags, or near 12,000,000 pounds. The exports from Rio to Europe last month were 55,575 bags.

COAL AND IRON TRADE. The value of the coal and iron of Pennsylvania when the industry and enterprise of the country shall be again called into activity may be surmised, when we are acquainted with the following facts recently stated by the rev. Dr. Buckland, president of the Geological Society of London, to the annual address to that society. Dr. B. says, in speaking of a new work published by the society, of the "Economic Geology," which forms part of the memoir connected with the map of Cornwall and Devon, Mr. De la Bache has placed, in a more prominent light than has ever yet appeared, the value of the geological resources of England, and the statistics upon political economy; and proves, by tabular documents, the important fact, that the average value of the annual produce of the mines of the British islands amounts to the enormous sum of £29,000,000, of which about £8,000,000 arise from iron, and £9,000,000 from coal.

This value is estimated of the iron after fusion into pig. The coal is valued at the pit's mouth.

Now the average cost of coal in Great Britain at the pit's mouth is seven shillings, and the quantity mined is stated by other political economists to be 30,000,000 tons per annum, which approximates very closely to Dr. B. Bache's calculation.

Let us suppose that one half of the coal raised in the mining districts, and that the other half is carried to a market (from the Tyne and Wear they ship 4,000,000 tons) at a cost of one dollar and fifty cents per ton. The total cost then per annum of 15,000,000 tons, the place of consumption, would be the enormous amount of $67,500,000. In these facts may be seen the basis of the prosperity of the greatest nation of Europe.

McClulloch very properly says, "It is hardly possible to exaggerate the advantages England derives from her vast beds of coal." And again, "our coal mines are the principal sources and foundation of our manufacturing and commercial prosperity."

THE COLONIAL TRADE. The Portland Advertiser says that a memorial to be presented to congress it is presumed, is now in that city and numerous signed, upon the subject of the British trade with the colonies. There is no commercial law, even the semblance of reciprocity in the trade. "Our vessels are not admitted to all British colonial ports, where custom houses are established, in like manner as British vessels are, into the ports of the colonies. There are they subjected to carry all the productions of this country, to her ports, and freely offer them for sale. Our fish oil and salted fish, the staple articles of our New England states, is prohibited by her altogether, in the colonies; the ports to which we may trade are limited also; and the articles which we are allowed to take there, taxed more liberally than like articles, entered and coming from the colonial ports in British vessels. The monopoly of a large proportion of the carrying trade by British vessels, operates injuriously to the American vessels, a trade which they enjoy the principal share of prior to the opening of those ports.

The plaster trade alone, of which there is probably more than one hundred thousand tons annually, and employs a large amount of tonnage, is now almost wholly imported in British vessels, the annual freight on which probably amounts to one half million of dollars. This was a trade greatly advantageous to United States vessels, prior to the opening of the ports to us, and from which we are now driven in a great measure, and it is only from certain free ports, and at a select price, the American vessels are allowed to take; while British vessels are privileged to take it direct from the quarries, and at a diminished price, equal at least, to the amount of freight from the quarries to the place of exportation.

SEIZURE OF THE BARQUE JONES. On the 7th inst. we mentioned that the barque Jones, capt. Gilbert, had been seized by H. B. brig Dolphin, on suspicion of having been concerned in the slave trade, and that she was at St. Helena on the 9th of September.

By the Ann McKim the following particulars have been received. The Jones belonged to Messrs. P. I. Farnham & Co. of New York and to a slave at Salem.

The barque was left from the coast of Africa with part of her original cargo laden at Boston, consisting of lumber, furniture, glass, salt, fish, &c. together with a quantity of ivory and palm oil, and about $9,000 in gold and silver. Having completed her business at St. Helena, where she sold a portion of her lumber and glass, having ready for sale, the mate and part of the crew became disorderly, and refused to return to the coast of Africa and complete their voyage agreeably to their contract. This proceeding detained the vessel. Meanwhile the mate threatened to desert, and to engage a prize in H. B. M. brigantine Dolphin, lying in the Roads, of which captain Gilbert took no notice, not apprehending any trouble from a British officer, without first being called upon for some hearing, particularly in the case of a vessel having ready for sale, the mate and part of the crew became disorderly, and refused to return to the coast of Africa and complete their voyage agreeably to their contract.

On learning that an officer was on board the barque demanding the papers, captain Gilbert and the supercargo, Mr. Saxon proceeded on board, and found their vessel in possession of an officer and crew of the Dolphin, who refused their admittance on board, denying them so much as a trunk of wearing apparel. Returning to the shore, capt. Gilbert, through the American consul, addressed the commander of the Dolphin, also the governor, the former returning his letter unopened, and the latter declining any interference in the business. During the following day, the cargo of the barque was overhauled, every part of the vessel ransacked, and the money taken was sent to British officers, and within articles, such as shoes, tobacco, &c. and the latter distributed among the crew.

During Sunday night, the barque was taken under charge of a lieutenant, midshipman and eight seamen from the Dolphin, and a British officer, steward and mate belonging to the barque, leaving the remainder of the crew on board of the Dolphin; one of whom, a boy, being on shore the morning of Ann McKim's arrival, confessed that all they found on board the barque was five sets of hand cairs (an unusual small number for a merchantman), three wooden spoons, bought by the steward on the coast, a quantity of codfish, upon which the British officer stated he had on one occasion seen slaves fed—together with a few trifles on one sitting on the table, and set to keep a quantity of powder dry when originally shipped at Boston; these were the only items discovered to justify them in their proceedings.

Liquor was taken on board the barque, and the mate kept in a state of intoxication most of the time. He was regularly examined by the American consul, and papers deposited with the American consul, where they still remained. The chronometer was on shore, which was likewise seized upon by the commander of the Dolphin.

Shortly before the commander of the brig, meeting captain Gilbert on shore, accused him in the street, and shrilly demanded his manifest. With this exception there was no communication with any one belonging to the barque except the mutinous mate and crew.

The men left on board the Dolphin were uncomfortably situated, from the fact of a part of them declining to say the barque was not bound, neither had been on any illegal voyage. The Dolphin's company were beginning to doubt themselves as to the propriety of the steps of H. B. M. officers, and did not believe they had secured a prize. Not the slightest suspicion existed at St. Helena as to the vessel being engaged in any illegal business, and, although the proceeding seemed unwarrantable, and doubtless a wrong in taking the vessel away without any hearing from the captain, the agent, Saul Solomon, esq. or the American consul, W. Carroll, esq. solely listening to the mutinous mate, who, as the steward, seemed to be the chief leader in the business.

Captain Gilbert and his supercargo were to leave for the United States the first vessel after the Ann McKim left. It is supposed that the Jones will be taken to Sierra Leone.

Capt. Joseph Bonnell, 6th infantry, at Philadelphia, Penn. 27th Sept. 1840.

First lieutenant D. H. Tufts, 4th artillery, at Detroit, Michigan, 4th Oct. 1840.

First lieutenant B. J. Brander, 2d artillery, at West Point, New York, 24 Nov. 1840.

Memorandum. The name of William Smith, a captain of the corps of engineers, having been changed by the legislature of the state of New York to William Davidson Fraser, he will hereafter be known and recognized accordingly.

The St. Augustine News of the 20th inst. says: It is rumored that all the posts are to be destroyed except a few necessary depots; wagons sold, company officers to march on foot, and the old system of hunting the enemy to be revived.

Head quarters, army of Florida, Fort King, Nov. 16, 1840.

Order No. 87.—Part II. The Indians having acted with their usual want of faith, the armistice is at an end; the commanding officers of the different regiments and posts, will therefore be prepared to act offensively at the promulgation of this order.

111. The general commanding has reason to be gratified with the zeal and energy heretofore displayed by the officers and troops under his command, and in calling for increased energy on their part, he is confident his wishes will be met, and he anticipates the happiest results from the approaching active campaign.

Should the enemy hereafter appear with the white flag, they are to be made prisoners, and diligently guarded until further orders. By order of Brigadier General ARMISTEAD. W. J. NEWTON.

Lieutenant and aid-de-camp.

R. Ridgely, adjutant 3d artillery.

THE NAVY.

On the 12th inst. the U. S. brig Conestoga, "engaged in a triangular survey" of the coast of the United States, anchored off Apalachicola. The journal says the entire coast of Florida is to be accurately surveyed.

The U. S. frigate Constitution, com. Claxton, and schooner Shark, captain Bigelow, sailed from Puna, 3d October, 1840, all well, for Paya and Calao. They visited Guayaquil in the Shark, and exchanged salutes with the town.

At the same time, the Don Victor, Rocaforte, gave com. Claxton and all his officers a grand entertainment. All were very much gratified with their visit to Guayaquil.

The Yorktown sloop of war, commander Aulick, has crossed the bar from the navy yard to the anchorage off the naval hospital, Norfolk, bound to the Pacific.

The U. S. brig Enterprise arrived at Rio Janeiro early in October, from Bahia, with the brig Malke Adel as a prize, seized by the U. States consul at Bahia on a charge of piracy. The Journal of Commerce says:

"The Malke Adel touched at Fayal, bound to the Pacific, and put into Bahia for supplies. If we are rightly informed, the crew consists of the captain at some merchant vessel, and it is said the captain of the Malke Adel does not deny it. This individual abandoned his vessel at Bahia, and is now in this city. We understand he attempts to exculpate himself by saying that his fired upon said vessels to bring them to order to discomport and regulate the chronometers." The same paper of the next day, Oct. 9th, contains a card from Joseph Nunez, captain of the Malke Adel, in which he denies that he abandoned his vessel at Bahia, but states that she was seized by the Enterprise in the night, when he and two passengers were on shore. He further states, that he had brought with him all his papers in due form, and a passport from the Brazilian government, which he would exhibit to the public in due time.

National Intelligencer. We invite attention to the annexed communication. It is from a highly intelligent and responsible source, corrects some of the errors of the Boston press, and furnishes some valuable information as to ship building, and particularly with regard to several of the prominent vessels of our navy.

[N. Y. Times.]
The Boston Mercantile Journal of the 12th inst. contains some remarks on the sloop of war Boston, now ready for sea in the harbor of New York. The worthy editor, who by the by is an excellent seaman, says "a clean run is in important when fast sailing is desirable; but does not seem to be considered such by the chief constructor. By not attending to this point, many fine ships belonging to the government have been spoiled."

The editor is wrong in his conclusion. The chief constructor holds the doctrine of a clean run to be correct, and he has always practised on that principle. His ships are among the sharpest below in what is usually called the run, and thus he considers it impossible to fast sailing; and in fact, when he and he also considers that great capacity at the load floating line is essential to hydrodynamic stability. In support of this doctrine I shall quote the writings of distinguished mathematicians and naval architects as Enophras, which was as Charles Dupin, Atwood and admiral Chapman, the celebrated Swedish constructor.

1st. "A deficiency in stability is frequently of the most serious consequences. It may cause the loss of a ship on a lee shore; it may prevent a ship in a heavy sea from engaged with an enemy from French her lee gun."

2d. "Le Scipion, Le Hercule, Le Pluton, French ships of the line, are instances of the want a stability. Alterations in the distribution of the ballast were made, additional quantities were put on board; but no increase of stability was gained by these arrangements, and it was only by doubling them with light wood to the thickness of a foot at the extreme breadth, and ten feet under water, decreasing to four inches length and depthways, which corrected the defect. Here it was evident that the defect of instability was not so much owing to a want of extreme breadth; but in diminishing the breadth at the place of flotation too quickly fore and aft."—To this case may be added a more recent one in the Caledonia, British third deck ship.

3d. "The form of a ship's hull, its body, and the weight of its armament are the chief terms in the composition of stability, and they are only to be attained in the requisite degree by full dimensions near the load water line, with sufficient capacity."

4th. "The water section is the most important element in the whole, because the stability of the ship depends principally on it."

5th. "The most easy and advantageous way of obtaining stability is by a large area of flotation, and great fullness between wind and water; or which is the same thing, by keeping the centre of gravity of the displacement at as short a distance as possible below the water's surface. The old notion long entertained by constructors of ships, that a flat floor gives stability, led them of course to increase the breadth of the ship as much as possible at the floor, at the greatest depth below the surface of the water. In conformity with Atwood's demonstration, ships ought to be for the sake of stability, made as broad as possible at and near the water's surface, and they must consequently be less broad at the floor. It will now be seen that a great breadth at the depth of the floor is calculated to retard the motion of the ship, more than an increase of breadth at and just below the water's surface."

6th. "The principle by which, however, for a fast sailing ship, which the present state of our knowledge would lead us to adopt as the best calculated for fast sailing is that which is determined by making as large an area of flotation, and as much rise in the floor, as is necessary to give the least possible displacement in the whole, which the centre of gravity of the displacement is at the least distance below the water's surface."

7th. "We must also increase the area of the load water section, so as to give a sufficient degree of stability, which is necessary to give the least possible displacement below the surface of the water in order to obtain the maximum of stability and the fastest rate of sailing."

8th. "Increasing the breadth of a ship within the limits of the parts immersed and emerged by inclination, certainly adds to the stability, and has been found beneficial in many instances, and may probably be tried with advantage in many others."

It was in accordance with this principle here laid down, that the Franklin, the Boston, and their sister ships, and the frigate Macedonian, have been constructed.

The character of the ships indicate the correctness of the principle, and the validity of it, cannot now be impaired by the mere opinions of any person. Some there are who seeing a ship capacious in her after part and at above the load water line, may suppose erroneously that this fullness extends to the keel. One test of a vessel's fitness for fast sailing is the draught of water, and the ships constructed by the chief architect drew a greater difference of draught of water at the time of launching than any ships of their class in the navy.

The act of congress for building ten sloops, gave an opportunity to the constructors to try their skill.

The ships were to be of the same dimensions, and to have a light of draft water. The chief constructor, then attached to the navy yard at Philadelphia, gave the drawings and models for the Boston. This ship on her first cruise gave such ample proof of her excellence, and combined the qualities of fast sailing, quick working, capacity and stability, to so great a degree, that the navy commissioners gave directions for the remaining sloops to be built, to be of her model, and that she was a form was never considered an important requisite by the chief constructor. It is well remembered that the Boston papers of that day, spoke in terms of commendation of this vessel, which I recommend to the special attention of the editor of the Journal.

The difference of draught of water of the ten sloops, excepting the Falmouth, is here unjoined, and from this statement it will be seen whether the remark of the editor of the Journal was correct or not. Perhaps he can furnish the draught of water of the Falmouth!

The launching draft of water of the Boston,

Vincennes, Fairfield,
St. Louis,
Concord,
Vandalia,

Was all 18 feet 5 inches, forward 9 feet 2 inches, difference 4 ft. 3 in.

The foregoing ships are alike in form, and were drafted by the chief constructor.

The launching draft of water of the Warren was all 12 feet 2 inches, forward 10 feet 7 inches, difference 1 foot 7 inches.

Natchez was all 11 feet 10 inches, forward 9 feet 9 inches, difference 2 feet 1 inch.

Lexington was all 12 feet 10 inches, forward 9 ft. 1 inch, difference 3 feet 9 inches.

Falmouth, no information.

The chief constructor claims no agency in the construction of these four ships. The Falmouth was planned and built in the Charleston navy yard under the Board, and was intended by her constructor to be a superior ship. How far she succeeded, I leave for others to determine.

The characters of a part of the first named six, as drawn by their commanders, is here added, and any conversant with the subject, will be able to determine what credit is due to assertion without proof.

Character of the Boston—Jan. 1826. We sailed from Boston with a strong wind from W. N. W. and stood out of the bay with single reefed topsails, fore-and-aft main top-gallant sail, steering before the wind until abreast of Cape Cod, the ship going 10 knots per hour. After hauling up S. S. E. to go out of the south channel, took the third reef of the topsails, and took in the main top gallant sail. She averaged eleven knots and could have carried whole topsails and main course at the time. The observed latitude near land justified the distance given by the log, being seventeen miles to the south of that account. I had occasion to stay her several times under topsails and courses, and she worked admirably, and no doubt will combine all the good qualities that a vessel need possess. She is very stiff, and bears her canvass as well as any ship I have sailed in.

Character of the Vincennes—Jan. 1827. I have reason to think that of far as my experience and observation has gone, I must confess myself in better opinion of her greatest superiority is in sailing close hauled, with as much wind as she can conveniently carry, double reefed topsails and courses to—Under top gallant sails, royals, and under any sail, her sailing appears to be extraordinary, both from her velocity through the water, and her capacity for holding a good wind. With the wind abeam, or a point forward or aft of it, under any sail, but more especially to strong breezes under low sail, she appears to possess greater excellence than is usually found in vessels of her class. The chief excellence of this vessel evidently consists in the great facility with which she performs all maneuvers, and her capacity to carry a great deal of sail without straining or losing her. She appears to steer and work more readiness and advantage than the ships I have heretofore sailed in, and from these circumstances I am disposed to think in the points specifically referred to, her carrying, working and steering, she is almost unrivalled.

In a head sea, with fresh and strong breezes, under reduced topsails, courses, &c. she can compete on a wind with any vessel.

For comfort and security generally, equal to any, and superior to most vessels.

In the only northern experienced wharf at anchor in Valparaiso bay, she rode beautifully, with but little strain to her cables.

My regard for the Vincennes is based upon a knowledge of her most excellent and superior qualities, and I will only add, that if she was my own vessel, I would do what I propose, and try to better her what I think she nearly is already, a nonpareil. [Note:—The proposition was to alter some part of her internal arrangements.]

Character of the Fairfield—1831. I have never sailed in a finer vessel. She steers well, bears her sail well, works well, sails well, and in short, has all the properties which could be desired in a ship.

To the following questions the answers are answered.

How does she sail close hauled in a top gallant gale?

Answer. Fast, and bears her canvass well.

How does she sail close hauled in a topsail gale?

Answer. The same—fast, and bears her canvass well.

How does she sail under reefed topsail and courses?

Answer. Admirably.

How does she steer, wear and stay, under all circumstances?

Answer. As well as could be desired.

How does she lay to in a gale, and under what sail does she behave best?

Answer. Close reefed maintopail, reefed fore-sail and balance reefed spanker or stern mizen. She is very comfortable, unless it blows extremely heavy, when the main topsail alone I find to be the best.

How does she sail with the wind on the beam?

Answer. Her best sailing.

How does she sail with the wind on the quarter?

Answer. Her best sailing.

How does she sail with the wind aft?

Answer. Her worst sailing—rolls easily and is easy on her masts.

How does she stand under her sails?

Answer. Very well.

At a subsequent period the following additional testimony was received.

The Fairfield arrived at Norfolk having had a passage of 66 days from Valparaiso. She has proved to my perfect conviction that she possesses all the best qualities of a ship. She sails well under any and all circumstances, and I think there can be no better sea boat.

Character of the St. Louis. The St. Louis is an excellent ship, possessing more good qualities than any other vessel. In sailing in, to reaching, laying to, or sailing by and large, she is the safest and most manageable ship I have been in. She sails 9 and 10 knots by and large with great ease, and I have frequently made 11 and 12 knots for 24 hours.

The frigate Macedonian has been cited as being too full in the run, and for not possessing the qualities which should characterize a ship of war. The launching draft of water of this ship was all 17 feet 4 inches, forward 16 feet 10 inches, difference 5 feet 4 inches.

This difference of draft of water was greater than that of any ship in the service, and compared with the Brandywine, Potomac and Columbia, whose launching drafts are given below, shows it to be a full four feet more than either of those last named. Her character will be seen in the reports below.

The form of her stern has been censured on account of its appearance. If those who criticized this ship had been aware of the reasons why the chief constructor chose that form, perhaps their observations would have been spared.

The objections to the sterns of frigates then stood, excepting the United States, (it is full 13 years since the plan of the Macedonian was drawn) and those on the stern, excepting two, which I have bettered, was, that the chase guns could not clear the stern when run out for firing, and it was to remedy this defect, that the stern of the Macedonian was formed as it is.

It must be borne in mind that this ship was intended to sail on an even keel, or nearly so, to have a light draft of water. These two points are not favorable to fast sailing, and in addition to these disadvantages, she was filled in from the keel to the load line to fit her for the exploring expedition, of which she was to form a part; and she now presents a solid mass of timber from her load line downwards, with all the joints and hulls caulked.

In there a man who will assert that fillings or a high poop conduce in any degree to fast sailing? Will they not rather say that both are injurious? Notwithstanding the outcry raised against this ship, it will appear that she sails and works well. It was no fault of the constructor if she did not perform quickly at first, when in a trim different from that designed for her, and the sailing qualities of vessels are not intended to depend on this single point.

This ship was constructed on the same principles as the Boston, and her qualities indicate their correctness.

Launching draft of water of the Brandywine, all 16 feet 6 inches, forward 12 feet 6 inches, difference 4 feet.

Potomac, all 16 feet 8 inches, forward 12 feet 6 inches, difference 4 feet 2 inches.

Columbia, all 16 feet 6 inches, forward 12 feet 4 inches, difference 4 feet 2 inches.

Character of the Macedonian, 1839. About the qualities of this ship as a sea boat, there can be no difference of opinion. She is easy, dry, stands well under her canvass, and is, so far as we could judge, weatherly.

We crossed the Gulf stream with a strong wind, almost a gale from N. E. with a short tumbling sea on the beam and quarter, which incommoded her as little as I think it could have done any ship of her class.

The pilot who brought on into this bay, (Pensacola), expressed an opinion that a strong wind from the outer bar to the entry, with a light breeze, she moved and worked quicker than any of the sloops on this station would have done under the same circumstances, excepting perhaps the Levant.

The Macedonian outalls, with ease in every way, the Erie and Ontario, and sails with it, she does not outsail the Levant. One quality of great value, a ready obedience to her helm, she has in as much perfection as any ship can have. On our return to port, we beat over the bar and round the shoal called the Spit, with the wind at N. W. as much of it as we could carry single reefed topsails to, and vary unsafely in faster. No ship could work better, or stand up better under her canvass.

I have to inform you that the alterations made in the trim of the Macedonian, and the cleaning of her bottom, have much improved her sailing. On the passage from this place, (Eastport), we found that we could spare about half her canvass to the sloops. My opinion now is, that the Macedonian is a fast ship, going free, and a fair sailing ship on a wind.

When we left New York there was only 4 inches difference in the draft of water taken at single anchor with 30 fathoms of chain out. The improvement in the working and steering of this ship, is remarked by every one, and she is the easiest ship that I have ever been to see in."

So much for the character of these ships, and I think that they will bear a comparison with foreign ships of war.

British naval architects, with all their experience and with all the science aided as they have been by eminent men of the profession, are still seeking the true form. Their perseverance and research may enable them to reach the designed goal.

As far as the experience of this country has gone, it shows that those ships which have the greatest length in proportion to their breadth, are the fastest sailers. In this country ships are built and launched by naval architects, and here their duty seems to be; the equipment, the quality and position of the ballast, the dimensions of masts and yards, and trim of the ship, are determined by other persons.

The ship departs on a cruise, is found not to answer the expectations formed of her, and she is pronounced a failure. The constructor alone is censured, and sometimes without an effort on the part of the commander to alter the trim of the ship and test her qualities under different circumstances.

A case is on record which shows that shifting two guns from the bow to the stern, made a brave sailing ship a fast one.

We have cases in our own navy of a similar character. Witness the frigates, the States and Constitution. That errors may have been committed in the construction of ships of war is not denied, and on a subject so complex as naval construction, where opposing qualities are to be brought together, and the ship is not to be looked for, but close observation on the character of ships ably drawn by their commanders will do much to improve the science.

The commander and architect must have free communication with each other, and with a knowledge of a ship's character, and of her dimensions and calculated elements, the size and position of her masts, the quantity and distribution of her ballast, defects may be remedied in succeeding vessels; but improvement cannot be expected, if there should be no harmony amongst those who are to associate for this purpose.

Superiority must not be claimed unless justly awarded to superior talents and attainments.

It is hoped that the foregoing statement of facts will satisfy the editor of the Merchants Journal, that the chief constructor has not deceived him, and sure which has been attempted to be cast on him.

H. 8.

Russian steam frigates. The frigate Kametchka, was launched at New York on Wednesday, is thus described in the Times.

The Kametchka is, in appearance, about the size of the Great Western, though her actual dimensions are somewhat larger. She is pierced for 16 guns. At present she does not draw more than about nine feet water, and her machinery and armament on board she will probably draw from 16 to 17 feet.

Her masts and spars look rather dwarfish, but this, perhaps, arises from her great height above the water; when brought to her bearings by the weight of her masts, her funnels, guns, &c. we dare say it will appear come it full in every particular.

The Kametchka was constructed for the emperor of Russia, by Mr. William H. Brown, from a model furnished by the officers of the Russian navy, and her build promises great speed. Her bow and stern are decorated each with a double headed eagle, surmounted by an imperial crown. The cabins are spacious and convenient. They are to be fitted up, we understand, for the use of the officers of our packet ships.

She is very strongly built, of solid red pine, white and live oak. Her engines will be about 500 horse power. They are being made by Dunham & Brown. The following are her dimensions and armament:

Glocester,	98	179
Charlston,	50	86
West Greenwich,	71	63
Corenty,	203	164

There was but one scratched vote given. That was in the sixth ward of Providence. The name of Jesse Howard was erased and that of Wm. Rhodes inserted. The totals therefore stand:

Harrison.		Van Buren.
Nicholas Brown,	5,212	Henry Bull,	3,263
George Engs,	5,212	John D'Wolf,	3,263
Wagner Weeden,	5,212	Jesse Howard,	3,263
William Rhodes,	5,212	Thos. J. Taylor,	2,263
Majority for Harrison,		1,950
Add New Shoreham,		27

1,977 being about 23½ per cent. This is the largest vote ever given in the state. Scattering votes are not counted in an electoral section, a plurality electing on the first trial.

NEW YORK.

The New York and Erie line of rail road, we are glad to hear, is vigorously prosecuted, and in a state of great forwardness. Over one-half of the whole line from Tappan to Dutchess, was laid, in either completed or in prosecution. The work is of the best order, with the heaviest kind of rails, and is to be carried on with great animation during the winter. It is not at all improbable, therefore, that New York city will strike Lake Erie by the way of the southern tier of counties before it reaches Buffalo through the New York and Albany road. In the meantime the Bostonians are also pushing on their road with equal animation. There is a glorious strife thus for the trade and enterprise of the west.

Canals. What a splendid exhibition does the subjoined statement show of the great resource and increasing wealth of this state.

The amount of tolls received this year prior to the 4th week of November, viz. is $1,752,672 97 being an increase of $1,726,291 55 over and above the actual receipts of 1839, which were $1,616,382 92. The commissioners of the canal fund, estimated as a basis for the loans necessary to complete the enlargement by 1845, an annual increase of 7½ per cent. which for the present year is 121,228 65 being less than the amount actually received on the 22d ult. 1,787,610 67

by the sum of $15,062 90. Should the remainder of this season prove as favorable to navigation as was the last, and the navigation is entirely free throughout the whole line of canal, the entire increase for the present year would probably exceed two hundred thousand dollars, or about 50 per cent. more than is necessary to sustain the calculations of the canal board. [N. Y. Star.]

A proclamation, by William H. Seaward, governor of the state of New York. Gov has been pleased to preserve our lives during another year, and to bless our land and make it very piteous. Health, peace and liberty has dwelt among us, and religion has ministered its divine counsels and consolations. No danger has menaced us from abroad, nor has the alarm of intestine emotion, sedition or tumult disturbed the quiet of our dwellings. The clouds have not been withered from the earth their timely rain, nor the sun its genial heat. The plough has not been stayed in the furrow, nor has blight or mildew diminished the abundant harvest.

We have exhibited to the world the sublime spectacle of millions of freemen, carefully discussing the measures and policy which concern their welfare, and peacefully committing the precious trust of their interests and hopes to the care of their chosen magistrates. While our confidence in the stability of republican institutions is thus strengthened, their benign operation has been manifested in the away of mild and equal laws, the enjoyment of equal privileges by all classes of citizens, the security of personal rights, and the intellectual and moral improvement of society.

In remembrance of these signal and manifold blessings and privileges, it becomes us to lift up our hearts and ascribe all the power and glory to Him who looketh down from heaven and considereth all them that dwell upon the earth. I do, therefore, in pursuance of a custom sanctioned by the people, set apart and appoint THURSDAY the seventeenth day of December next, to be observed throughout this state as a day for the annual offerings of PRAISE, THANKSGIVING and PRAYER. I respectfully recommend to my fellow citizens to abstain from all secular occupations on that day; to gather themselves in their solemn assemblies; to render to our Heavenly Father the homage of hearts softened and warmed by his abundant goodness; to commit to his tender care the poor, the neglected and the oppressed, and to supplicate a continuance of His favor to this people throughout all generations. However we may be separated by opinions or associations, all the citizens of the republic have equal political rights, and have the same motives to desire its peace, happiness and perpetual prosperity. The church of the living God is one, and embraces all those who in humility of spirit receive his holy faith, and through divine aid seek to keep his commandments. Let us therefore in perfect harmony and charity, one with another, as patriots and Christians, inspire Him to sustain and bless all our civil and religious institutions, and to dispense to us abundantly that heavenly grace without which in the Lord Jesus Christ, leads through the way of virtue here to the blessed society of the redeemed in his everlasting kingdom.

Given under my hand and the privy seal of the state, at the city of Albany, this ninth day [i. e.] of November in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and forty.

WILLIAM H. SEAWARD.

By the governor,

SAMUEL BLATTENFORD, private secretary.

NEW JERSEY.

Finances. The expenditures of the state, during the past year, were as follows:

State accounts	$2,946 03
Legislative expenses	3,369 75
Legislative salaries	42,720 50
Incidental expenses	5,945 72
State prison	1,216 30
Transportation of criminals and costs of conviction	3,930 00
State arms	605 00
For instruction and support of blind	1,925 01
" " deaf and dumb	2,252 81
Revolutionary pensioners	1,994 50
Military officers	270 00
Expenses	946 81
Painting	2,272 00
Postage	1,069 25
State library	289 75
Constables attending supreme court	289 75
Accounting to $67,524 45. The regular receipts amounted to $81,539 67; being as follows:
Dividends on stocks	$30,000 00
Transit duties	30,267 39
State tax	20,000 00
Peoples' taxes	553 28
Interest on bond	510 00

Thus after paying the ordinary expenses, a balance remains of $14,005 19; which together with a balance of $9,518 15 in the treasurer's hands, amounting to $23,523 34, is now on deposit in banks of the state, excepting $17,000 00 in Camden and Amboy rail road bonds, and $315 25 due from two churches of Paterson.

School fund. The revenue from the school fund during the year has been $64,818 14 as follows:

Bank tax,	$24,153 72
Dividends on stock,	1,180 40
Interest on loans,	10,500 00
State lands at Paterson,	29,974 02

Of this amount $30,000 were distributed among the counties, and $740 25 applied to the defraying of incidental expenses. $9,018 11 of the bank tax has not yet been received, being the amount levied upon the Morris canal.

The revenue this year exceeds these sums, by $29,068 11. The excess last year of revenue above the expenditures, viz. was $7,191 18. The sale of the state lands at Paterson this year, has produced $28,000.

The whole amount of the school fund is $319,202 63. [State Gas.]

Candidates for governor. The Van Buren party appear very generally to sequence in the re-nominating governor Porter for a second term. The whig party are now starting candidates, and there seems to be no lack of them if we may judge from the following, extracted from the U. S. Gazette:

Candidates. We have given place to two suggestions relative to the candidates of our party for governor. Mr. McKenyon, of Washington, and Mr. Dana, of New York, were announced as candidates at that time. We see to the papers of the interior the name of judge Banks proposed with earnestness. The hon. Richard Biddle and Walter Forward, esq. are also mentioned. And we look also to see in our next Lancaster paper the name of Mr. Siroch, of that county, brought out. And it has often been a matter of surprise with us, that George Chambers, esq. of Franklin county, has not been looked to as a candidate for the first office in the commonwealth. We have a few more also in the southeastern portion of Pennsylvania, whose names will be suggested when the time for such matters shall arrive.

Resumption of specie payments. In relation to the question, whether the banks of the state will resume by the 15th of January, as required by law, the Pennsylvania says:

"We have availed ourselves of the opportunity afforded by the visit of the governor to this city, to ascertain whether his views on this grave subject remain unchanged, and if it affords us much pleasure to be able to assure you that on the best authority that no postponement of the day of resumption beyond the 15th January next, will receive his approbation. He is anxious as any one can be, to allude the commonly from embarrassment and distress; but he is not of opinion that it is the true mode of ministering this relief, to entail upon us for a day longer than is already allowed, the hopeless evils of the present suspension."

A few weeks ago we supposed from what we met with in the public journals, that there was no doubt of the resumption of specie payments by the 15th January; and we are not at all surprised that now appears in the journals of both Philadelphia and New York, it is questionable whether that object can be effected. There are more difficulties in the way than the public were apprised of. We have been looking with no little anxiety for an exposition of the real state of affairs. A writer in the Philadelphia Sentinel, over the signature of "A Citizen," has drawn the curtain to a certain extent, and as he appears to be in possession of facts, we avail of them for the information of our readers, without pretending to endorse his conclusions.

To the editor of the American Sentinel:

Sir: It is not without reluctance that I propose to obtrude my views upon the public in reference to the great topic of the day, the resumption of specie payments. Under the misapprehension that our bank south says that important subject becomes daily more obscured, and it seems indisputable that this community should have some light thrown upon it, if not from a very luminous, at least from a disinterested source. With these views, the present discussion is commenced. The public is anxious to understand the position of our banks, and their practice speak so vaguely that we need priests who understand the rites to interpret their meaning. In the absence of such, the uninitiated must attempt it.

Desiring to treat the subject with perfect fairness, though in plain phrase, I will state what are presumed to be actual facts, and what are the difficulties.

1. The Bank of the United States cannot resume on the 15th of January next, the day appointed by law, without assistance.

2. The following banks, owing to their involvement with that institution, are in an equally helpless condition, viz:

The Farmers' and Mechanics' bank,
The Philadelphia bank,
The Bank of Pennsylvania, and several other banks of minor importance.

3. The Girard bank, the Commercial, the Mechanics' and the Southwark banks, and possibly one or two others, are not involved in the same difficulties, some not at all, and others only to a limited extent.

The United States bank being admittedly the most helpless, it behooves us to examine into its actual condition in order to determine what measure of assistance will be likely to accomplish the desired object.

In the absence of positive data, we will assume its liabilities to be as follows, viz:

Circulation including 2 millions of post notes,	$12,000,000
Deposites,	3,000,000
Bank balances due to banks in this city,	$2,500,000
Elsewhere,	1,500,000
	4,000,000
Total,	$19,000,000
Of this sum the city bank balances, say,	$2,500,000
And a portion of the circulation here by the city banks, say,	4,000,000

Equal to $6,500,000 would, of course, form an instantaneous demand upon the specie fund of the Bank of the United States on the day of resumption. But, if it is understood, the bank has $3,000,000 of specie.

But there are not the only items of demand obligations upon that bank which would immediately appear. Large sums held by it on deposit, and a considerable portion of the foreign currency, if it is reasonable to suppose, would also be demanded, together with a very large amount of its notes, now in the vaults of the country banks, and in the pockets of the people because of their inability to obtain any other medium, would be immediately replaced by the issue of banks in better credit, to which institutions the U. States bank would thus become a debtor.

What the aggregate of these demands would be, it would be hazardous to estimate; but when the crippled credit, and intangible resources of the Bank of the United States are considered, it would not seem extravagant to suppose that one-half of her immediate liabilities would be immediately called for. This, if our suppositions approach to accuracy, could not fall far short of ten millions.

The specie we have estimated at three millions, and we know of no masses of specie balances elsewhere which would increase the available means. But, have we not put the sum likely to be immediately demanded on a resumption "which will not command the public faith," too low? Prior to the late suspension the demand circulation of the Bank of the U. States was about four millions, and now ten. It is likely that it will range hereafter higher than heretofore! Undoubtedly not. Still leaving the whole sum to be demanded at ten millions, and the immediate cash resources at three millions, how is the specie to be provided? The excess of obligations, or in other words, deficiency of means, is six millions. It has recently been alleged in the public prints that certain of the banks in this city, in with the Farmers' and Mechanics', Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and others, all entirely dependent for their means of resumption, on the resumption of the Bank of the United States, have agreed to borrow of the eastern banks, two millions and a half of their specie, and others, all having 12 and 15 months to run, for the purpose of loaning the same to the Bank of the United States.

Let us examine the operation of this measure. The New York Express, the Journal of Commerce and the Boston Courier all aver that the million and a half which Boston is to lend, and the million which New York is expected to lend are already here, and that therefore, there will be no transfer of money from either of those cities to this consequent upon the above loan but on the contrary, that its only effect so far as they are concerned, would be to place balances on interest and make them payable at a fixed date, which are here now on deposit without interest, and not payable at any fixed date. We propose to the contrary, that the U. S. bank in the shape of private deposits we have no means of knowing, but it is probably considerable.

We will suppose, however, that the whole sum should be immediately applicable to the uses of the Bank of the United States. What then? The deficiency of actual means as compared with actual demands after exhausting the specie will still be four millions and a half. It will be seen that in what we proposed the note and the specie are the banks themselves carrying any portion of the weight of the Bank of the United States, which some of them have expressed a willingness to do. The effort on their part would prove a fiasco. They lack both the disposition and the power to do so.

The question has been examined thus far on the hypothesis of the loan of two and a half millions being a bona fide loan of money from distant cities. But, if the view it has been shown to be entirely inadequate to the proposed object. But how much more inadequate,—indeed, how infinitely ridiculous will it appear when it is known that the eastern banks refuse to loan a dollar, except on institution of their own credit, and that the majority of the post notes in small sums, either issued by themselves or issued by the Bank of the United States, and bearing their endorsement! And this absurd proposition, we are told; has been accepted by the banks, who were deputed to represent our banks in the foreign cities. Will not this community with one voice rebuke a committee so little acquainted with the nature of the business they undertake to negotiate? Does not every one perceive that our banks, after having undergone the humiliation of suing to their inferiors for assistance, have put it into the power of the lenders to abstract the sum borrowed from their own vaults.

It is, indeed, some consolation that several of our institutions have conducted their business as to save themselves from this degradation. But strong banks, the sound banks—so called by the Journal of Commerce—they, alas! are thus fallen!

The first and second heads of the subject proposed when this essay was commenced, after what has been said, may be disposed of in a few words. The project of a resumption of specie payments by the bank, alluded to on the plan suggested is absurd and impracticable. A resumption based upon it will fail; the banks undertaking it will be involved in an intricate labyrinth of difficulties, and the effects upon our present banking system may be fatal.

As to the third head, viz: What course will it be proper for the Commercial, Mechanics', Girard, and other banks similarly situated, to pursue, in case the project of resumption above referred to should, as it probably will be abandoned, it is not easy to determine. That these institutions, judging from their independent bearing, are in a situation to resume, and maintain specie payments without the other banks, and at all hazards, seems probable. But, will the interest of the community be best promoted by their so doing? This is a grave question. If the situation of the other banks were hopeless, we should have no difficulty in deciding in their favor. For it is certain that so long as the banks do not pay specie they are in a most precarious position. Yet would the resumption of a small portion of our banks restore the currency in the west and south? Certainly not. And without that restoration could our resumption, so few in number, furnish and maintain a circulating paper medium convertible into coin at pleasure, adequate to the wants of our people? It is clear that they could not. What then would be the object of their resumption? Vain glory. The object is not equal to the sacrifice. The inconvenience of two currencies now suffered by our citizens would be increased, not diminished, by a partial resumption. The restoration would be advertised. The resuming institutions would be made for their own ruin in a civil war, and would be assisted by the non-resuming, and by those persons having claims on them from abroad. Our own citizens, much as they desire specie payments, would not acquiesce in the measures for specie made for their ruin by the banks, whilst others would be willing to receive in full payment of them, paper of equal nominal value, which they could purchase at a depreciated rate. Thus new difficulties would encounter us at every step.

In the state of things it will naturally be asked—what then is to be done? No question is more easily answered. The Bank of the United States is unable to resume, on her own resources, on any day fixed by law. Certain other of our institutions are equally unable to resume. This is the fact. All rhodomontade is useless. All attempt to disguise the truth by false pretensions is idle. The politicians are so divided, so hazy, so hazy the loan of smaller sums to these banks on their post notes to be immediately discounted here and converted into specie on their instant resumption to bring it about; but they well know that any such movement on their part would be a confession of their weakness both of intellect and means. They well know that the error of our resumption of 1835 was, that it was based on the same fallacious principle, (though in a different form) that is now advocated by them for the revival of the currency.

Our banks should have the manhood to look at the subject directly and without flinching, and to take their measures afterwards, according to their best judgment. In our view, their duty is plain. Let the directors of the United States bank, the fair and honest, and in such condition (the days of delusion are past) to the legislature of the commonwealth as soon as it assembles, showing the efforts they have made to conform to the law; let them submit an outline of their proposed plan, and let the legislature meet to meet their wishes, let them give such pledges, as men of their standing, will command respect that they will, honestly and zealously as they have done, pursue the course most likely to bring the immediate liabilities and active means of the banks into a just ratio with each other; and ask with frankness of manner and integrity of purpose for such an extension of time, in the present suspension law, as will enable them to put their institution in a condition to meet resumption. This could probably be accomplished in another year. Let these views in the shape of a memorial, together with the statements forming its basis, be submitted to the other institutions, and let those institutions, in the report of their committees, the abundant and cogent reasons at their command, to show its propriety. No difficulty should exist in the banks agreeing to publish monthly statements of their progress, and to submit to the public the sincerest efforts to bring themselves into a proper position to resume specie payments at the period fixed in the new law.

There are many reasons, independent of those derivable from our own local situation, which would suggest to the directors of the currency to even urge the propriety of the measure. A prominent one may be named here, viz: the overthrow of the existing national administration, and the induction of a new chief, with different financial views into the seat of government at Washington, on the 4th of March next, soon after which the great question of the currency must be taken up by the collected wisdom of the nation. Shall our institutions, unprepared as they are, rush into danger and plunge into the jaws of death, at a moment like this. Is it the part of common prudence to do so?

In conclusion, it cannot be too earnestly urged upon the directors and executive officers of our banks to treat, in the present emergency, with the same manliness and candor as to its important bearing upon the interests of society, and instead of averring that their respective institutions are each in a situation to resume, but for the weakness of the currency, to submit to the legislature the truth of the general positions herein assumed.—All these positions are simple: it has not been deemed necessary to involve the question in any of the details of political economy; to show the probability of a complete restoration of the currency to the propriety of a protective tariff. Such a plan of treating the subject would have induced us to wander too far from our main object, which was to show that too far of our banks could, on the scheme suggested, save themselves from the extreme suspension on the 15th of January next, and that those which can sustain themselves would accomplish no public good, but much evil, by resuming on that day, which they would only be justified in doing in case the legislature should refuse to extend the period of the present law. Such a refusal on the part of the legislature would seem, under the circumstances of the case, highly improbable, and we have already in this country, and in France, to the great advantage of the subject of the currency, to feel no apprehension of any hostile action on the part of our present enlightened chief magistrate.

The above is the average vote for electors in each county. The majority of the highest white elector, P. F. Causey, over the lowest Van Buren, N. Clark is 1,108.

MARYLAND.

The presidential electoral college of this state, assembled in the senate chamber at Annapolis on the 24 inst. all the members being present.

Gov. George Howard, was elected president, and

Ed. J. H. Nicholson, secretary.

The nomination of gen. WILLIAM H. HARRISON, of Ohio, for president, was made by J. L. Kerr, esq. of Talbot, and that of JOHN TYLER, of Virginia, for vice-president, by R. J. Bowie, esq. of Montgomery, and the ten votes of Maryland were cast for them; after which the college adjourned sine die.

Queen Anne's county census. According to the Sentinel, the whole population of this county is 13,169. Whole number of whites 6,450—males 4,253, females 2,297. Whole number of blacks 6,519—males 3,410, females 3,109. Free—males 1,307, females 1,233. Slave—males 2,169, females 1,876. VIRGINIA.

The governor's proclamation of the 23d of November, announces that Arthur Smith, of Isle of Wight,

John Cargill, of Sussex,

James Jones, of Nottoway,

William R. Baskerville, of Mecklenburg,

Charles Vanecey, of Buckingham,

Richard Logan, of Halifax,

Archibald Stuart, of Patrick,

William Jones, of Gloucester,

Austin Brockmeyer, of Fairfax,

John Gibson, of Prince William,

J. D. Halyburton, of New Kent,

Thomas J. Randolph, of Albemarle,

Walter Holmes, of Spotsylvania,

Isaac Hurner, of Fauquier,

James Gibson, of Hampshire,

William A. Harris, of Page,

Jacob D. Williamson, of Rockingham,

William Taylor, of Rockbridge,

Augustus A. Chman, of Monroe,

James Hoge, of Pulaski,

William Byars, of Washington,

Benjamin Brown, of Cabell, and have been duly elected electors for and on behalf of the state of Virginia, to vote for a president and vice president of the United States. The electors are required by law to meet at the capital in the city of Richmond, on the first Wednesday in December inst, by the hour of ten o'clock in the morning.

The Virginia college of electors assembled in the capitol on the 2d inst. and cast the vote of this state for Martin Van Buren, for president, and Richard M. Johnson, for vice president of the United States.

Arthur Smith, of Isle of Wight, voted for Mr. Polk, of Tenn. for vice president, instead of Col. Johnson.

The legislature convened at Richmond on the 1st inst. Mr. Nass (V. B.) was elected president of the senate—Mr. Good, of Wheeling, one of the whig members, not being present, gave the Van Buren party a majority of one. Were all present, each party would have sixteen senators.

Mr. SOUTHALL, of Albemarle, (whig), was elected speaker of the house. The vote stood,

For Mr. Southall, 67

For Mr. Goode, of Mecklenburg, (V. B.) 60

Four whigs and two V. B. absent. Three seats vacant—one from Frederick, one from Fairfax—both contested on the return—and one in Louisa, where the member elect has resigned.

The house proposed to the senate to go into the election of a U. S. senator on the 4th inst.

State debt. The public debt of the state of Virginia, according to the Norfolk Beacon, is at the present time, $6,500,000, exclusive of its liabilities under acts authorizing loans for works of internal improvement, which amount to $2,442,120 mrs.

Congressional candidates. Colburn Powell, esq. of Loudoun, is announced as a candidate to represent in congress the district of Fairfax, Loudoun and Fauquier.

Mr. McCarty declines a re-election.

University of Virginia. The Richmond Whig says, that the visitors have appointed Nathaniel P.

Howard, esq. of Richmond, professor of law in the university, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of professor Davis. Mr. Howard is a young gentleman of accurate and extensive legal acquirements, and one of the most elegant and accomplished scholars in the state.

A Charlottesville paper says:—"Pike Powers, esq. has been temporarily appointed to fill the mathematical chair, vacated by the death of professor Bonycastle."

NORTH CAROLINA.

United States senators. The hon. W. M. Pamung and hon. W. A. Graham, speaker of the house of commons, have been elected senators to the congress of the United States from North Carolina—the former for six years from the 4th of March next, and to fill the unexpired term of Mr. Brown; the latter to fill the unexpired portion of the term of Mr. Strange, which is two years. The vote stood, for Mangum 99, Graham 98, Brown 63 and Strange 64.

Official returns of the election for president.

* New members. Those in italics are whigs.

The legislature of South Carolina assembled on Monday, the 23d ultimo. The speaker, Aaron Patterson, was unanimously re-elected speaker of the senate, and D. L. Wardlaw re-elected without opposition speaker of the house of representatives. Both houses being organized, the governor (B. K. Henegan, on whom the duties of the office devolved after the decease of governor Noble) transmitted his message on Tuesday the 24th.

The whigs held a meeting at Charleston on the 26th ult. preparatory to a public dinner to W. C. Parson, at which it was

* Resolved, That we are indebted with great gratification the able and meritorious exertions of our senator, the hon. Wm. C. Preston; our late representative, hon. Waddy Thompson, and our distinguished fellow citizen, Hugh S. Legare, throughout the struggle now so happily terminated. These gentlemen have added greatly to their previous well earned reputation, by their eloquent orations in defence of liberty, and by their gallant resistance to a bitter and intolerant majority at home, have deserved well of the country at large.

"That we tender to the hon. W. Thompson, in his regretted retirement, our sincere thanks and cordial esteem.

"That we take no peculiar pride in the elevated position and extensive popularity of hon. Hugh S. Legare, and ardently wish that the time may soon arrive when his native state shall more properly appreciate his worth, and again avail herself of his valuable services.

"That we offer to the hon. Wm. C. Preston, the warmest expressions of our confidence and admiration—unmoved by menaces and unhurt by calumny, he has long been among the foremost to manly and consistent opposition to the destructive measures of an unprincipled administration. We exhort him to persevere in his honorable course, and pledge ourselves to sustain him to the utmost of our ability, by a cordial and unshrinking support."

Extract from Gov. Henegan's message.

P. The school system.—"Our free school system has lately attracted especial attention. I trust that, from the many reports of the commissioners to our late governor, you will be able to derive important aid in the patriotic and benevolent effort to place, and to secure a more useful and correct foundation. Without presuming to give you even the outlines of a system, I would respectfully submit a few remarks on the subject. The pay of the teachers is altogether too moderate. The very small compensation may be said, without much of a figure, to poison the whole system. If we value professions by their usefulness, none can be more important than that of the teacher. His duties are most arduous and laborious, and his occupation in life calls for a rare combination of talent and character. The foundation of a complete education can be surely laid, only in our elementary schools. The importance of a thorough English education, is too generally and justly believed, in our modern systems, and our youth is hurried into the study of the ancient classics, without even a decent knowledge of their own tongue. It is a humiliating fact, that many, fresh from the walls of college, cannot write a paper without betraying their ignorance of the structure of our language. This is no imputation upon the professors, as young men are not sent there to learn the rudiments of English, but are presumed to know them before their admission. It is not my design to deprecate the dead languages, or a knowledge of their literature, but that education is imperfect, indeed, which looks too exclusively to such an attainment.—

A critical knowledge of our own language, with its literature, should be the primary object of attention, and, under no circumstances, should this be neglected. There can be no occasion for this neglect, as the thorough knowledge of our language only facilitates the acquisition of another. It is no easy matter now, to acquire a good English education in South Carolina. A who would offer to teach alone, could not calculate upon making his bread. Our modern notions require something else; and hence every head of a petty country school, advertises to give instruction in Latin, Greek, Italian and French, and those higher English branches, which can be properly taught only in a college. To know what Homer and Horace wrote, and to be able to read the Grecian and Roman anthologies, is regarded of more importance than the knowledge of our own history and country. The legislature can do something to reform this state of things, by elevating the character of our free schools, and requiring that applicants for admission into the college, should be examined in certain English departments, with which now they are only presumed to be familiar.

There is a more important relation, however, between the teacher and the pupil, than the merely intellectual. It is the moral relation. How vastly important the teacher should possess the requisite moral qualifications; that he should be able to give that kind of instruction which alone can qualify us for the higher duties of life, which alone can qualify us for eternity. The education of the mind is the education of the heart, together they constitute what will be for our children to continue in the depths of native ignorance. I would not convert our free schools into theological seminaries; but it becomes the legislature to guard, in every proper manner, the morals of the children, and protect them against those sinister influences which make them any thing but good and useful citizens. In the words of a distinguished modern writer, "education consists in teaching what makes a man useful, respectable and happy." It is all important to elevate the character of the teachers of our free schools. The relation between teacher and pupil is of a most responsible nature, and involves all that importance which belongs to authority, on the one side, and submission on the other. In addition to literary qualifications, no one, if possible, should neglect the education of the youth of the state, who is deficient in moral character. Who, I would ask, are the teachers of our free schools? are they men to whom the legislature can commit, with confidence, the great business of education?

What is the amount of their literary qualifications, and what is the tone of their morality? It is not my design to indulge in unnecessary remarks upon this subject, but truth requires me to say, that as a class they are grossly incompetent to discharge their high and sacred functions. So far as my observations extend, with but few exceptions, they are very ignorant and possess a very easy morality. With the poor pay allotted them, we cannot reasonably calculate upon a better state of things. The men who take charge of our public schools, and accept so miserable a pittance as the reward of their labor, are they who cannot get employment on any other terms.—Necessity forces them to make the offer of their services, and necessity forces the commissioners to accept them. It is now in South Carolina a reproach to be a teacher of a free school, as it is regarded a price fierce evidence of a want of qualifications. Men will not embark in the business of education, from mere motives of patriotism. You cannot command superior talent and attainment, without adequate compensation. The lawyer, the physician and the artisan, bestow not their labors gratuitously, and upon what principle of reason or justice, can it be expected, that he who has qualified himself, by years of severe toil, for the most useful of all professions, shall labor at a salary which will not supply the wants of nature.

Charleston exported the last year:

225,181 foreign, } bales of short cotton,

60,178 coastwise, }

12,300 from Georgetown,

31,569 total, at $30 the bale, $9,047,070

19,310 bales San Islands at $75, 1,448,250

100,000 barrels of rice, at $20, 2,000,000

Total, $12,495,320

Exclusive of domestic productions of minor consideration, but which it included in the estimate, would swell the export of South Carolina, to at least $13,000,000.

Savannah exported the last year:

189,842 foreign, } bales of short cotton,

76,290 coastwise, }

10,587 from Danco,

266,678 total, at $30 the bale, $8,000,340

5,108 San Islands, at $75 the bale, 608,000

$50,000 casks rice, estimated at $20, 1,000,000

Total, $10,208,340

The exports, therefore, of South Carolina and Georgia, nearly the whole of which pass through the ports of Charleston and Savannah, amount to the aggregate of $23,308,340.

The Courier remarks that the amount of exports from Charleston and Savannah is nearly five times that of the port of Baltimore; while the population of the two former cities together is less than one-half the population of the latter.

Election returns—official. The Millidgeville Journal publishes the following as the aggregate of the votes received by the presidential electoral candidates in Georgia:

Harrison ticket. Van Buren ticket.

D. L. Clinch, 40,349 W. B. Bulloch, 31,889

J. W. Campbell, 40,349 M. Echols, 31,889

J. Whitehead, 40,328 Jones, 31,855

E. Wimberly, 40,328 J. Bates, 31,850

The aggregate whig majority is 8,577.

General Clinch and Mr. Campbell, the two highest upon the Harrison ticket, are 8,380 votes ahead of Mr. Bulloch, the highest on the Van Buren ticket. And general Wimberly, the lowest on the Harrison ticket, is 8,390 votes ahead of general Bates, the lowest upon the Van Buren ticket.—Twenty votes cast for the Harrison ticket, and fifty the Van Buren ticket.

The whig majority in the congressional election in October, was 3,845—and the aggregate vote 74,096.

Legislature. A resolution being under consideration in the senate for procuring, on the 4th inst. to the election of a senator of the United States, to succeed Mr. Louisa on the 3d day of March next, a motion was made by Mr. Jones, a Van Buren member, to lay it on the table for the remainder of the session. Some half a dozen Harrison senators being absent, and advantage being about to be taken of a majority in the senate thus obtained by the Van Buren party, on the suggestion of Mr. Miller, the Harrison members of the senate withdrew in a body. After they had withdrawn, the secretary proceeded to call the names of the members in order to record the yeas and nays. After the call was made, the president declared that there was no quorum. The senate adjourned over to the following day, when they again met; and after some discussion, took a recess for an hour, in order to ascertain whether some arrangement could not be made to settle the difficulty. At the second meeting of the body, a motion was made to lay the resolution on the table for the present, which was carried by a vote of 63 to 18. The senate then proceeded to the regular business, a point of which was a preamble and resolution in regard to the constitutionality of a national bank.

Alabama.

United States senator. Hon. W. R. King is re-elected senator in accordance with this state's declaration from the fourth of March last. The vote in the legislature stood as follows:

W. R. King (V. B.) 75

G. C. King (Whig) 15

We understand from the Monticour that in the senate there are 21 Van Buren and 12 whigs, as the line has been heretofore drawn. At this election for senator, Messrs. Watrous and Ross, both whigs, were absent. In the house of representatives, the parties are 18 to 18. The senate then proceeded to the regular business, a point of which was a preamble and resolution in regard to the constitutionality of a national bank.

Mr. King is one of the oldest members of the senate, having represented Alabama in that body ever since it became a state. He was chosen vice president pro tem, at the close of the last session when Col. Johnson left the chair.

State debt. The amount is $10,560,000, and is invested in the capital stock of the banks.

We learn from the Wetumpka Argus, of the 25th ult. on the authority of a gentleman direct from Tusculoo, that the official majority in Alabama is 5,547.

MISSISSIPPI.

The fires. We have been recently conversing with a friend from Mississippi, who represents matters there as, in most respects, not at all improving. There is a good deal of emigration from the state, of sundry kinds, in different directions; but principally to Texas. There are but few new comers.

Lands, when sold at all, go for a mere song, in comparison with the rates common two or three years ago. Plantations, which would then have commanded forty or fifty dollars per acre, can now be had for five and ten dollars; and in some cases, even below the least of these figures.

A vast quantity is bound by judgments of court; but little yet is sold under the hammer, in consequence of an appraisal law, which operates as a stay of execution. By this law, lands are to be appraised; and, if, when offered by the sheriff, they fail to bring two-thirds of their valuation, the debtors hold on twelve months longer, when the lands are to be sold, unconditionally. In some of the courts, the sheriffs disregard this law; but generally the state courts and authorities are governed by it. At the end of the year, in some cases not many months hence, a vast deal of land will be brought into market and sold at an enormous sacrifice.

The depreciation in the price of lands, of course affects everything else in a greater or less degree. Negroes have fallen one-half. Corn, of which large quantities have been raised this year, is about forty and fifty cents. Hogs are being raised to great abundance, for the farmer has discovered that, with cotton at seven cents a pound, he must raise his own "hog and homony" and not be dependent upon the upper country for it.

The banks are in the worst of cases possible. The feeling is one of deadly hostility; and every plea put in by the debtor of any bank, against the sale of the bank, is favored both by court and jury. The Brandon bank is, it is known, shut up. The same may say they can pay, and they may pay others, if the public at large, who are in debt, will pay them. Shetton, the president of the bank, of whose flight, so many stories are told in the newspapers, is still in Brandon, from which place he has not passed, a distance of twenty miles, for a year past.

As one good effect of hard times in Mississippi, he mentions the flight from the state of a goodly portion of the rowdies and ruffians who infested it. Connected with this course, may be the successful operation of the five gallon law. Our informant states that the reduction in the number of coffee houses, in the several towns and villages, is really astonishing. And the law is very generally carried into effect.

Upon the whole, Mississippi seems to be under the salutary operation of sundry depopulating medicines, that are cooling and purifying her system. The temptations for investment in the state will be almost non-existent; and cash being paid up, men will feel settled and certain in their business operations as planters. The experience of the past will serve as a good lesson for some five or two years at least; and if cotton keeps down at a "fair living price," the spirit of speculation will not be excited. Under these circumstances, Mississippi will start afresh; and with her vast natural resources and her enterprising population, will surmount present obstacles; and "go ahead," with more alacrity and vigor than ever. LOUISIANA.

Banks. There are sixteen banks and banking companies in Louisiana, according to their last reports. Their nominal capital is $54,950,000. Their capital paid up is $41,763,214. In real estate and other investments, $3,850,555. Their circulation on the 31st of Oct. was $5,360,143. The amount of specie in their vaults on that day was $3,398,298. The "capital gained and profits undivided" of all the banks in the state is $6,892,650.

The ren. H. B. Barlow. D. D., professor of moral science and belles lettres, in the August college of Kentucky, has been unanimously elected to the presidency of the college of Louisiana, at Jackson. The late postmaster of New Orleans has, according to the reports of the papers of that city started for Texas, both a defaulter to government and an absconding debtor to individuals. He had carried off considerable property with him, and his creditors have started in pursuit, with hopes of overtaking him. His name is McQueen.

The Bulletin says: "We learn that the government is not the only sufferer from the Swartwoutism of the late contractor of this city. Private individuals are taken in for large amounts. Several creditors of the absconding defaulter have started in hot pursuit, and some hopes are entertained of overtaking him before passing the confines of Texas."

ARKANSAS.

The official returns for the election of governor show that, of 10,953 votes cast, Archibald Yell received 10,554; H. Smithson 392, and Scims J. Judge Cross, (administration) was elected to congress by a majority of 2,500.

The boundary line between the United States and Texas, when established, it is said will leave Miller county, Arkansas, wholly within the limits of Texas.

The Arkansas annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, commenced its fifth session in the city of Little Rock, on the 4th inst. bishop Beverly Waugh of Baltimore, presiding, about thirty ministers were present and several others were expected.

KENTUCKY.

Congressional election. John H. Thompson (whig) has been elected in the Harrodsburg district to fill the vacancy in the present congress, occasioned by the late death of Mr. Anderson.

Bank of Kentucky. We have before us a circular, dated 28th October, from the officers and directors of that bank, giving a statement of its actual condition, and explanations concerning the forged certificates of stock issued by Lewis, the cashier of the Schuykill bank in Philadelphia.

It results from investigation, that near 19,000 shares of this spurious stock had been issued—of which 147 have been surrendered since, by the party with whom they were placed. A process for tracing and discriminating between the forged and fair stock, is now in progress, which, it is believed, will completely succeed.

Mr. Anderson's opinion is unhesitatingly expressed, that "the entire proceeds of the sale of the spurious stock of the Bank of Kentucky, amounting to upwards of $900,000, were appropriated for the use and benefit of the Schuykill bank." It is added, that the Schuykill bank has ample means to refund this money—and to it the holders of the spurious stock must look. The state of the bank may be thus summed up:

Oct. 1, 1840,	$696,756	increase,	318,986

Notwithstanding the steady reduction in currency and bank accommodations evinced in this table, the amount of business done in the state has been large, and during the last few months constantly increasing. The following in relation to the trade of Ohio is from the New York Herald:

"A table of arrivals of produce at the port of Cleveland from the interior, and the clearances of goods for the interior, in four months, to the 1st instant of this year, as compared with last:

Amount of property cleared and arrived at the port of Cleveland, for four months of this year and last.

Arrived.	Clearances.
June, 1840,	$9,877,563
July,	$11,267,818
Aug.,	$9,331,660

July,	$11,267,818
Aug.,	$9,331,660
Sept.,	$8,742,606

"The arrivals at Cleveland indicate the exports of Ohio, and the clearances the imports. The former, it will be seen, have more than doubled in each month, and yet the exports have not increased. This amount of produce has been raised and brought to market in the face of the severe contractions of the banks. Prices have, indeed, been low, but the sales have been clear of speculation, and have, as is evident in the gradual fall of the price of specie, as well as above table, brought the state out of debt, notwithstanding that during the last month the imports have increased. In the month of June, the amount cleared at Cleveland was little more than one-fourth the amount cleared in the same month last year.

Business has, however, been gradually accommodating itself to the contracted state of the currency, and the imports have increased, until in the month of September they exceeded those of last year. If the exports have been made at low prices, the imports have been made at corresponding rates. The value of the produce of Ohio has held the same proportion to the merchandise purchased; the substantial farmers have enjoyed the same rate of exchange, and have had to pay their debts to the storekeepers and merchants, who, in their turns, have been able to settle their bank debts at home and abroad."

Banks. From the same source we copy the following statement of the condition of all the banks in Ohio, with two or three exceptions:

Liabilities.
Capital,	$9,191,263 53
Due to banks,	151,897 21
Circulation,	$8,697,006 17

Specie,	1,229,236 12
Other liabilities,	2,795,094 00
	$16,426,422 83

In consequence of no return from the Clinton bank of Columbus, the Commercial Bank of Cincinnati, the Bank of Sandusky, and the error of $1,000 in the apparent surplus in the return of the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank of Steubenville, we can make no comparison with the last returns. By the above statement, the immediate liabilities appear to be 6,200,000 dollars against the immediate means of $2,800,000, or less than two and a half per cent.

ILLINOIS.

The Van Buren official ticket is elected; by what majority it is impossible from the contradictory returns to make out—they vary from $25 to $300. We wait for the official statement.

The legislature. Governor Carlin has published a proclamation, convening the legislature of Illinois on the 23d of November ultimo, "to receive, and consider of, any communication that may be made to them," touching the interests of the state. The State bank of Illinois. The Savanna Journal says: "Col. Maier has returned from New York, and we believe it is now understood that the State bank is ready to resume specie payments. It is understood that the Bank of Illinois and the Cairo bank are ready to resume. They will wait, we presume, the action of the banks in other states."

The prairies. The Morning Courier, a new daily paper recently established at Springfield, Illinois, has an interesting paragraph respecting the hide of emigration through that state to the still farther west. It says:

"According to our own observation, (for we have travelled much during the past season), the tide is setting on the various lines of travel towards the 'land of promise.' The prairies have, the whole season, been literally blocked up with 'movers'—wagons, and their representations, people coming and exchanging horses from the east to the west in 1840, to add another state to the national constellation, had they all located in a single territory. Missouri, Iowa, Illinois and Wisconsin, have received a large portion of the 'new comers.' Ohio, but a few years since the war, is now the starting point for the far west. The upper Mississippi is no longer the utmost verge of that unrelieved and interminable territory—residents beyond talk of a still farther west, and but a few years are now swelling waves will break on the Rocky Mountains, and the quiet valleys of the Columbia will teem with a people whose progenitors dwelt in rugged New England, and looked upon the Alleghanies as the impassable boundary of the western world.

Whig majority, 1,903

The above are all the counties in the state. Only two of them are estimated, but it is probable some of the others are not exact. They are near enough, however, for all practical purposes.

The election of 26 whigs and 11 V. B. men to the assembly is ascertained. It is stated, also, that there will be a whig majority in the senate.

MISSOURI.

The legislature met on the 18th Nov. Colonel Sterling Price was elected speaker of the house. The votes for officers stood V. B. Van Buren to 38 whig. In senate, Mr. Watson (V. B.) was elected secretary, vote 17 to 16 whig. Colonel Benton was present at the organization.

The first Episcopal convention for the state of Missouri was duly organized, and began its sitting in St. Louis on the 17th ult. bishop Kemper, presiding, rev. P. F. Parker, secretary.

Rev. P. R. Minard delivered the sermon at the opening of the convention, from the text: "Obey them that have the rule over you."

The great Mullanphy estate. The last St. Louis Argus says:—Yesterday the court of chancery decided that the trusts set forth in the will of the late John Mullanphy, &c. are null and void.

This decision, if sustained by the supreme court, will effect more property than any other ever rendered by a judge in the western country.

The opinion of judge Lawrence is represented to us as one displaying extraordinary learning and most profound research.

The value of the vast estate of Mullanphy is estimated at several millions of dollars. As so much property is involved, and the principles of law governing the case novel, we have no doubt the chancery decree will be published.

Governor's message.

Gentlemen of the council, and house of representatives: I conceive it to be my first duty, on our present meeting, to direct your attention to the presidential favors which our common country has experienced in the degree of health dispensed towards its citizens, and the unusual abundance with which the soil has rewarded the labor bestowed upon it. The unparalleled improvements in our territory present an interesting index to the general happiness of the people, which should excite within us the warmest feelings of the most profound gratitude towards the author of those favors and the gracious dispenser of all good.

Boundary line. The excitement produced by the intrusions upon the rights of the citizens of Iowa, by the authorities of Missouri, near the boundary line, has subsided. The prosecution commenced under the laws of the territory against a sheriff of Missouri, has been discontinued, and no further attempts have been made by the authorities of that state to exercise the jurisdiction north of Sullivan's line. The committee of congress, in the house of representatives, at the last session, after an elaborate examination of the subject, were of opinion, that the legitimate boundary line, as defined in the original act of congress and in the constitution of the state of Missouri, would begin at the centre of the Des Moines rapids in the Mississippi river, and run from thence on a parallel of latitude due west, which would be several miles south of the line contended for by the authorities of this territory.

The committee, at the same time (this opinion was expressed, recommending that the line commonly known as the old Indian boundary, or Sullivan's line; and reported to the house of representatives in congress a bill to establish that as the permanent boundary line between the state of Missouri and the territory of Iowa. This report appeared to be founded in equity. This line had been generally conceded as the boundary between Missouri and this territory. It had divided the survey on general districts and the land districts of the U. States lands. The citizens who purchased land south of this line did so with the impression that they were purchasing in the state of Missouri, and those who purchased north of it, with the belief that they were purchasing in the territory of Iowa. The purchasers of these lands were engaged in their purchases by their localities. Some preferred being in Missouri and others in the territory. Were this line now altered, it would be attended with the inconvenience of rendering the line on both sides of it. We therefore trust that the bill, as reported, will be passed by congress at the ensuing session, and that the line thus designated may be finally established as the boundary between the state of Missouri and the territory of Iowa. A strictly legal line might embrace within this territory a small portion of the inhabitants south of this line, yet we have never had a desire to embrace within the limits of this territory any tract of country that had been purchased by individuals at the land office in Missouri and settled upon by them as being within that state—and I trust that the same liberal feelings will be reciprocated by the inhabitants of Missouri towards our citizens.

Indian affairs. At the special session of the legislative assembly, a memorial was passed, memorializing the president of the United States to cause the annuities due the Sac and Fox Indians to be paid in the hands of families, or in such person as a majority of the nation might require. The memorial was immediately transmitted to Washington, but previous to its arrival an order had issued from the Indian department, dated 18th of August, 1840, directing the agent for the present year to pay to the chiefs as heretofore. On the 28th of September the Indians were assembled at the agency for payment. They arrayed themselves into two parties. One party wanted the money distributed on principles of justice and equity among the different bands and to the heads of families. The other party contended for its payment to a few of the chiefs, to be distributed by them alone. I was present on the occasion, and addressed both parties. I advised them to consider the difference among themselves—read and explained to them the treaties, as well as the intercourse law of the United States, and the regulations of the Indian department. I also explained to them the order of the Indian department of the 19th of August, and informed them that, according to my understanding of the order, the money must be paid to the same chiefs and braves that received it last year. I had the names of the chiefs and braves read to them, and asked them to meet in friendly council by themselves without the interference of any white men, and to decide among themselves as to the receipt and distribution of the money—and told them that when they had agreed among themselves the money would be paid them. The council adjourned in the evening, and the chiefs and braves who received the money last year were expected to have met in friendly council next morning to arrange their difficulties and receive their money. But some arrangements appear to have been made at the agency during the night, unknown to me, that frustrated the council to be held on the morning of the 29th, and Keokuk through the agent, had advised me to meet the chiefs and braves on the money, which he did that morning. The removal of the money from the Indian country caused great excitement and dissatisfaction among the Indians. When maj. Pitcher left the agency he informed me that he intended to be in the Indian country, that some mischievous individuals have been impressing upon the minds of the Indians the belief that the annuity will not be paid until spring. This was calculated to disunite them with the government, to difficulties more than they could, and endanger the peace of our borders. I therefore, with a view to check these evils, issued a preliminary order to the agent on the 18th of October, directing him to deliver to the chiefs and braves apart for the payment of the annuity for 1840, and to pay it to the same chiefs and braves whose names were found to the receipt roll of last year. This I conceived to be in strict accordance with the order of the department, and to be in accordance with the number about 30, and are distributed about equally among the different parties; and should the money be paid to them in accordance with my order to the agent, and they be left to dispose of it among themselves, without the interference of any white men, I have little doubt but that it will be distributed among the different bands justly, and be paid, as far as it will go, towards the liquidation of their just debts. But should the payment, from any consideration, be much longer delayed, there is danger that the excitement produced by its postponement will burst beyond the bonds of restraint and the Indians commence fighting among themselves and thereby endanger the peace of our frontier. I have conceived it to be my duty to present the foregoing facts for the information of the legislative assembly. It is certainly our duty to look to these things, to be watchful of their operation and of the movements of the Indians, and to take any necessary steps to surprise and subvert any means under our control to sustain peace and harmony among our Indian neighbors as well as between them and our citizens, we should be prepared to make every effort to prevent any further enlargement of the peace of our frontier. I have in report to the Indian department, given a detailed account of the situation of the Indians with a full explanation of my views as to the cause and probable issue of the matter, and would respectfully suggest that now exists among them. The situation of this nation, in connexion with the Winnebagoes who have recently been removed to the tract of country within this territory, known as the neutral ground, and the Sauks, Menomonees, Kickapoos, and partly on the Sac and Fox country, should admonish us to be on our guard and to depend upon ourselves for defence in case hostilities should be commenced by them. In consideration of this state of affairs, I would respectfully suggest to the legislative assembly the expediency of authorizing by law the organization of a number of mounted volunteer riflemen, any one company at least in each regiment of militia in this territory, with authority to the commandant of each brigade to increase the number to a battalion within his brigade, and to provide for calling them into service in case of Indian depredations or threatened invasion. This precautionary measure can do no harm and may ultimately secure our frontier from an Indian war.

Depot of arms. The secretary of war informed me some time since, that the department had determined to establish a depot of public arms and munitions of war at Rock Island, to be supplied to the citizens of the territory under proper regulations, should the same be wanted to enabled them to defend themselves against Indian hostilities, but I have not yet heard that any have been deposited at that place.

Form of government. The votes given at the late general election for and against a state convention, were elected by a large majority. The sentiments of the people of the territory thus indicated will necessarily require all further legislation on the subject at the present session. The people have, by their votes, expressed their preference for a territorial government for the time being. It will therefore become my duty to adopt a regular financial system for the territory, by which the territory will be enabled to control funds sufficient to meet the necessary expenses incidental to territorial affairs. I would, therefore, recommend to the consideration of the legislative assembly a revision of the financial laws so as to provide a revenue sufficient in amount to meet the actual wants of the government, distributing the burden and the benefits among every class of the community upon principles of exact justice to all. The duties of the territory will respect to the views of the subject, to which I solicit your respectful attention.

Finances. On an estimate forwarded to the treasury department of the United States by the executive of the territory, estimating the expenses for the year 1840, there were appropriated for the pay and mileage of members of the present legislative assembly, for the pay of officers, for printing, furniture, stationery, fuel and all other incidental expenses, $27,050. This sum is deemed sufficient to meet all necessary expenses. I would therefore recommend to the consideration of the legislative assembly the propriety of confining the expenditures authorized by them, within the appropriation.

Dues. The secretary of the territory informs me that there are upwards of six thousand dollars due to individuals for furniture, stationery and services rendered to the legislative assembly at the two first sessions, and for which no funds have been provided for payment. This is a heavy debt to the treasury department with my estimate for the expenses of the year 1841, and solicited an appropriation to meet it.

This method of contracting debts with individuals beyond the means of payment, is practicing a deception upon the public creditors, and ought, in my opinion, to be carefully avoided.

Appropriation bill. By reference to the appropriation bills, it appears that there were allowed to the clerks and officers of the territory in each year at the two first sessions the following sums, to wit: first session, to the clerks and officers of the council, $2,800, and to the clerks and officers of the house of representatives, $3,300; second session, to the clerks and officers of the council, $2,525, and to the clerks and officers of the house of representatives, $2,925. These aggregate sums were embraced in the appropriation bills, but there is no law in existence in the territory that defines the duty to whom this money is to be paid, and compensation allowed to any such officers. Until such a law shall be passed, establishing the number of officers and fixing their compensation, it will be impossible for the executives to comply with the annual requisitions of the executive and treasury department in furnishing him a correct estimate of the sum necessary to defray the current annual expenses of the legislative assembly of the territory. The states generally define by law the number of clerks and officers employed in each branch of the legislative assembly. By the laws of Ohio, the number of clerks and officers to each branch, and the compensation of each, are specially defined. According to the laws of that state, the compensation of the clerks and officers of both houses of the legislative assembly, for a session of seventy-five days, would amount to $1,200. In this territory, at the first session, it amounted to $6,150, and at the second to $6,450. These statements are submitted to the consideration of the legislative assembly, with a request that a law may be passed to provide for organizing the legislative assembly, defining the number of officers to be employed, together with the compensation allowed to each.

In recommending this measure, I disclaim any desire on the part of the executive to prescribe to the legislature the number or character of officers to be employed in their respective branches, or the compensation to be allowed to such officers. The legislature is the proper judge in these things; and it is but fair to presume that it will employ none but such as are necessary to the convenient dispatch of business, and that a compensation adequate to the services of such officers will be allowed them respectively.

Conclusion. I am not aware that any important general subject will be presented for legislative action. Your predecessors have passed laws embracing all general subjects. Their recent enactments would seem to require their continuance in force, excepting in cases where they may have been found defective. Frequent changes of general laws are always attended with inconvenience to the people, and should be altered only with great caution. Should any subject require the attention of the legislative assembly be communicated to the executive during your session, it shall be promptly laid before you; and you may rest assured of the co-operation of the executive in all measures that are calculated to secure the prosperity of our country and to advance the physical, intellectual and moral condition of its inhabitants.

That all your efforts may harmonize in promoting the public good, in the sincere desire of gentlemen, your very obedient servant.

FLORIDA.

The Union bank of Florida. By a table published in the last Florida, the immediate liabilities of the bank were $683,800. Assets $127,400. By the same table, we learn that on the first April last, the liabilities were $1,236,800. Assets only $85,430. Now this is unfair. The only accounted assets are collected and not a note given by individuals is considered good, according to this table—not even the advances made to the different public works are accounted at a dollar. These liabilities and assets are set down as immediate. It is true, but we are to suppose that every debtor to the bank is not only insolvent, but absolutely does not possess sufficient property wherewith to pay a per centage on his debts. We would not be understood to favor any of the banks, we condemn them in all their misconduct, but it is wrong rather too far, to attempt to persuade us that Florida currency is only worth six cents on the dollar.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

We find in a late number of the Madisonian over the signature of "Curiosity," the following very interesting compilation of facts concerning valuations and sales of the public domain:

At the present session of the public has been called to the consideration of the various schemes, executive and legislative, which each session of congress has produced, either for the disposition of the public lands, or for alterations in the manner of their disposal.

One of the favorite measures of a certain class of politicians has been to graduate the prices according to the periods in which such lands have been in market, although each one graduates the scale by which the object is to be accomplished in such manner as suits his own views and opinions. In support of this scheme, one of the principal arguments is, that, unless some such plan is adopted, the lands will never be sold at the present minimum of $1 25 per acre, and the designations usually given to such lands are "waste," "refuse," &c. by those who have little or no sight of the fact, that, as a country is settled, tracts that in the first instance were refused as comparatively valueless, in most cases necessarily become of more value than those having the same natural advantages were in the first settlement of the country; as also, that the opening of new lines of communication by roads and canals is continually bringing the more secluded parts of the country, and all practical purposes, nearer the market, and hence raising a value to the soil not possessed without them.

While thinking upon the subject some time ago, my attention was called to a preparatory measure taken by a distinguished senator, many years since, in case this project for effecting by ascending to the estimated value of the unoccupied lands; and, having obtained a copy of the replies to that resolution, I was induced to procure copies of the statements of sales since that period, and to make estimates to see how far the prices were raised, and to see the nature of those estimates has so far surprised me, that it is thought they might furnish you with some new views of the subject, and I therefore offer them for your consideration, with a remark that I have been content to make estimate only upon the basis upon which to make accurate calculations can only be found upon the files of the land office, and I hope that measures will be taken, by those having the power, to obtain accurate and precise statements. The preparatory measure alluded to was a resolution passed by the senate on the 25th. April, 1828, by which the president was "requested to cause the registers and receivers of the respective land offices in the different states and territories to be directed to make a report to the commissioner of the general land office, (in time to be by him laid before the senate at the commencement of the next stated session of congress, upon the quantity and quality of the land remaining unsold in their respective districts on the 30th day of June, 1828, after having been offered at the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, so as to show how many acres remain so unsold; what proportion thereof (as nearly as can be estimated) consists of first rate land; what proportion consists of land unsold after the 30th of June, 1828, to the average value of the whole, per acre; with such remarks upon the character of said unsold lands, and the length of time which they may have been in market under the laws of the United States, or subject to be given away, or otherwise disposed of by foreign sovereigns, before they came under the dominion of the United States, as may be necessary to give the senate a just conception of their present actual value."

The answer to this resolution were communicated to the senate by the land office on the 9th December, 1828, and I shall now proceed to give the substance of some of those replies, (it would extend this communication too much to give all of them, with a brief commentary, stating the actual sales of the unsold lands, to the 30th September, 1837, not having the data before me to continue the calculations to a later period; merely mentioning that I have been compelled to take one half of the entire sales of 1828 as the amount sold during the year 1827, and the other half as an official statement for that period could be found.

In Ohio. The Zenithville officers reported 647,955 acres as unsold, at one first rate, and all as having been in market since 1804.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, about 636,700 acres of this land had been sold at $1 25 per acre.

The Steubenville officers reported 181,835 as unsold, having been in market since 1800; none first rate, and the average value $1 per acre, or in all $131,835.

Facts. To 30th September, 1837, 127,000 acres sold, produced at least $159,375.

The Woodstock officers reported 162,643 acres unsold, which had been in market for twenty years; none was first rate, and 40,660 acres unfit for cultivation; the average value 90 cents per acre, or all to be $146,379.

Facts. The sales to 30th September, 1837, amounted to 166,107 acres, producing about 207,634 dollars. All the land reported as unfit for cultivation was thus sold in 9 years at the same rate as is paid for the choice lands in western districts.

The Delaware and Bucks (Tiffin, &c.) officers reported 1,641,914 as unsold, having been, on the average, in market for 7 years, and classed 205,239 as worth $1 12 1/2 cents per acre—410,478 acres at 75 cents—615,718 acres at 60 cents, and 410,479 acres at 12 1/2 cents per acre, or, in "general average," 50 cents per a re, or $820,957 for all.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 1,250,972 had been sold at the minimum, producing about $1,563,715, or $747,758 more than the estimated value of all the unsold lands included in the same September, and there were 390,932 acres then remaining unsold. These sales, it will be perceived, not only embrace all the lands included in the 1st, 2d, and 3d classes, but even some that were valued but 12 1/2 cents per acre.

[No new lands have, it is believed, been exposed to sale in either of the three districts first named since 1828, nor have their boundaries been altered. In the last some unimportant former Indian reservations may have been opened, but if so, some therein have been much more than counterbalanced by the reservation from sale of all the lands within five miles on each side of the Maumee river for canal purposes. In addition to the sales, it should be observed that more than a million of acres have been granted to the state, (for roads, canals, &c.) which have been located since 1828, and so far as these selections have been made in those districts, they should also be considered as so much sold; and as in making the selection, the value of the acres that the word lands were not taken, it is apparent that the actual sales of the inferior qualities are much greater than would appear by reference to the sales alone.]

In Indiana. The Vincennes officers reported 3,406,445 acres as unsold, 1,826,750 acres of which were offered in 1807—1,363,654 in Sept. 1816—and 216,040 in June, 1821—estimating 851,611 as first rate, 851,611 as second quality, and 1,708,223 as third quality.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 1,952,000 acres had been sold, but all reported as first and second rates, and about 250,000 of the third rate.

The Crawfordville officers reported 1,952,260 acres as unsold, and one-half or upwards of 970,000 acres of that amount as being unfit—all having been in market between 5 years and 10 years.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 1,952,300 acres had been sold.

The Indianapolis officers reported 1,542,102 as unsold, of which 736,540 were worth $1 per acre, 420 as third rate at 75 cents, 385,420 fourth rate at 50 cents, and 308,120 acres as unfit, and of no value. Had been in market from 1820, '21 and '22. Total value of all the lands, $1,351,575.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 1,565,700 acres, or all of the first four classes, and part of the refuse class, had been sold, producing $1,957,125, and leaving near 290,000 acres then unsold.

The Fort Wayne officers reported 4,546,000 acres as unsold, 300,000 of which were first rate, and very little totally unfit for cultivation.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 2,326,000 acres had been sold.

The Jeffersonville officers reported 1,490,926 acres as unsold, nearly all of it having been offered for sale in 1807 and 1808, estimating 7,446 at $1 25 per acre, 148,092 at 75 cents, 521,322 at 50 cents, and 745,466 at 25 cents per acre. The total value being $689,478.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 866,247 acres had been sold at the minimum, about 1,007,810 dollars, thus making the sales exceed the estimated value of all the unsold lands, by about $560,300, although 640,000 acres remained unsold, and showing that not only all in the 1st, 2d and 3d classes, but about 60,000 acres of the 4th, or 25 cent class, had been disposed of at $1 25 per acre.

[No change, it is believed, has taken place in either the Vincennes, Jeffersonville or Indianapolis districts since 1828, nor have any new lands been brought into market in either of them. A part of the Crawfordville district has been taken away, and a small quantity of lands may have been brought into market in that and the Fort Wayne district since 1828. Out of the Crawfordville and Fort Wayne districts, and from lands subsequently ceded, the LaPorte district has been erected, in which, from late in 1833, in 1834 and 1835, 1,149,700 acres have been sold, but how much of this quantity was estimated in the unsold portions of the old districts is not known. It should also be observed that by far the greater portion of the lands granted the state for roads and canals about 500,000 acres, has also been taken out of the unsold lands in those districts since 1828.]

IN INDIANA. The Edwardsville officers reported 2,857,857 as unsold, having been in market since the years 1810 and 1825. Of this quantity 118,469 acres, as first rate, were valued at $1 25 per acre; 684,083, as second rate, at $1; 537,037, at third rate, at 50 cents; and 1,185,228 as unfit, and worth only 10 cents per acre, making the total value $1,541,639, and the average 45 cents per acre.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, the sales amounted to 1,462,870 acres, for about $1,830,000, about $490,000 more than the estimated value of the unsold lands, and yet leaving 1,325,000 to be disposed of.

The Paletta officers reported 1,496,000 as being unsold, and as having been in market for 6 or 8 years.—Of this quantity 598,400 acres were good soil, 699,200 acres thin soil, and 198,400 as being unfit for cultivation, and the average value being 30 cents per acre, or $745,800 in all.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 686,838 acres had been sold for about $819,960, or $106,000 more than the estimated value of the whole unsold lands, and still leaving 1,812,000 acres to be sold.

The Springfield officers reported 1,947,224 acres as unsold, of which 212,620 acres were good, and worth $1 25 per acre, and 1,234,704 unfit, and worth but 12 1/2 cents per acre, and the total value to be $282,613.

Facts. Up to the 30th September, 1837, 1,607,461 acres were sold, producing $2,063,000, or $1,010,000 more, than they estimated all the lands to be worth, and yet leaving $15,000 to be sold, and showing that about 1,390,000 acres of the land, which they estimated as worth only 12 1/2 cents per acre, had been sold at $1 25.

IN MISSISSIPPI. The St. Louis officers state the unsold lands to be 2,129,426 acres, and that "they may be characterized as the remnants and refuse of nearly 40 years' picking and culling under the Spanish government, and few of the value of the lands of the United States;" that "there is not one quarter section of first rate land" in the district, and that 1,661,670 acres were unfit for cultivation; that 15 cents per acre would be a fair average, making the total value of all the unsold lands $233,000.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 568,000 acres had been sold for $711,000, or $245,000 more than they estimated all the unsold lands to be worth, and leaving 1,660,900 for future disposition.

The Franklin officers reported 2,709,000 unsold, in market for from 5 to 10 years, and that after selling 150,000 at $1 25 per acre, they thought the residue could not be disposed of except at a greatly reduced price.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 948,900 acres had been sold, at the rate of $1 25, or nearly 900,000 acres more than they thought could be sold except at a greatly reduced price.

The Jackson officers reported 4,420,025 acres as unsold, estimating 88,600 acres as being worth $1 25 per acre, 4,331,425 at 50 cents, and 100,000 at 25 cents, making the total value about $653,000.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 350,100 acres had been sold, or all the good lands, and 241,800 acres of which were estimated at 12 1/2 cents, producing within $237,000 of the entire value of all the lands, while there remained 4,100,000 to be disposed of.

IN LOUISIANA. The Orleans officers reported 1,206,517 acres as unsold, valued at $1,917,700, being a general average of 26 3/4 cents per acre.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 917,100 acres were sold, producing $1,146,000, or about 100,000 acres more than the estimated value of all the unsold lands, and yet leaving 472,000 to be disposed of.

The St. Helena officers made no report as to the quantity of the unsold lands, but estimated their unsold lands to be at the rate of 50 cents per acre.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, they sold 274,800 acres at the rate of $1 25.

IN MISSISSIPPI. The Choctaw (Mount Salus and Jackson) officers estimated that 3,230,778 acres were unsold—very little first rate, 2,280,778 of middling quality high land, of which one-half was too broken or too poor to sell at $1 25, and 1,000,000 acres as unsaleable. Average value of the whole 25 cents per acre.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 2,872,400 acres had been sold at the rate of $1 25, thus not only including all they reported of a middling quality, and of which they said the one-half would never be sold, but also the 2,280,778 acres of which they considered as unsaleable. Taking the lowest estimate, 50 cents per acre, the total value by their calculation would be about $970,000, while in truth the portion sold has produced $3,490,000, and the unsold lands are worth $3,000,000 at the same rate.

IN ALABAMA. The Huntsville officers reported 3,222,984 acres unsold, having mostly been in market for ten years—thus there were very little if any first rate lands, and that the greater portion was mediocre and unfit for cultivation.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 592,400 acres had been sold and 400,000 granted to the state.

The Cuba officers reported 2,416,162 acres as unsold.

Facts. To the sales to the 30th September, 1837, amounted to 2,332,260 acres.

The Tuscaloosa officers reported 3,149,206 acres as unsold, most of it having been in market for 7 years—that none of it was first quality, and that they believed "that there is not exceeding ten thousand acres fit for cultivation"—the average value being 5 cents per acre, or all at $157,465.

Facts. To the 30th September 1,665,780 acres had been sold, producing $1,332,000, and leaving 2,084,000 acres unsold.

The Sparta officers reported 5,502,735 as unsold, being in market from 1823 to 1827, 697,371 acres estimated to be worth $1 25 per acre, and 1,815,364 as unfit, the general average being 40 cents per acre.

Facts. To the 30th September, 1837, 351,300 acres had been sold.

[To check it is thought, has been made in the year 1838, in the old officers of a portion have been taken from the Cahaba district and another from the Tuscaloosa district, and a small portion added to the last district. The Demopolis district has been ceded to the old officers, and the lands of the Tuscaloosa and St. Stephen's districts have been taken from the Choctaw session of 1833. In this new district 1,154,000 were sold from 1830 to 30th September, 1837, but what proportion of this amount was unsold in the old officers on the 30th June, 1838, it is impossible to estimate.]

These comparisons of predictions with results will not only show the reliance which is to be placed upon estimates, even by those best qualified to make them, but also the value of the color of the soil, but will also show that the fact of lands having been in market for many years is no evidence that they will not be sought for with avidity as the country becomes settled.

While upon this subject, I trust that you will agree with me in the hope that some correspondent who possesses the means of doing so will inform us what are the minimum prices fixed by the different states upon the lands granted them by congress for canals, roads, colleges, &c., for I am under the impression that these minimums have varied from $3 to $17 per acre, thus showing that although many of those states yearly memorialize congress for a reduction of the price of the public lands, yet when those lands become their property the minimum is increased instead of being lessened.

If these estimates should call the attention of any person qualified to go on with the investigation to a consideration of the subject, or on the means of procuring a more correct and proper working of the present land system, I shall be more than repaid for the trouble I have been to in making them.

Yours, CURIOSITY.

BURIAL OF THE REMAINS OF GENERAL HUGH MERCER.

From the U. States Gazette, 26th Nov.

The spirit of patriotism that is exhibited in the generous sacrifice of fortune and life for the commonwealth, so eminently deserves the applause of the generous and the good, that we are not astonished when the sacrifice is consummated, that the tears of a people should bedew the tomb of a patriot, and the pious history be instructed to write the eulogy of a record of an generous devotion. The spirit of a man to nation's independence, if permitted to revisit the glimpses of this earth, and note the proceedings of those who benefit by his successful sacrifice, must be grateful to find, that not only are his name and deeds held in grateful remembrance, but that the quiet of peace allows a generous people whom his death benefitted, to think how they may express their appreciation of the great objects of his devotion, and how display by the world their enthusiasm for equal rights and national independence, by all approving honors to the name and character of those from whom they derive the blessing.

Yesterday presented to the world the sublime spectacle of a whole section of our commonwealth going to do honor to a noble and a martyr in our country's cause, by conveying the remains of general HUGH MERCER from the grave at Christ church, with imposing ceremonies, to a resting place at Nashville, Tenn., in a most regrettable sacrifice at once of his exceeding worth, and the admiration of his excellency by the present generation. The voice of the preacher was heard—the eloquence of the eulogist was listened to with delight. The doors of the church were open, the windows were under the direction of colonel John K. Murphy. The whole line of troops were marshalled on Walnut street, their left resting on Sixth street. The streets through which the escort passed on their way to the grave were literally filled with people; and around Washington square was gathered an immense mass.

The muffle drums were beating funeral marches to the grave.

THE SPECTACLES.

Shortly after 9 A. M. the remains of general Mercer were removed from the church, and placed in a horse drawn by four black horses, the coffin palled with a craped American flag with cords and tassels. The First City troop (which had served at Princeton in the engagement in which General M. was killed) having been detailed as a guard of honor, formed around the hearse, and the carriage containing the committee and cortege, proceeded towards the First Presbyterian church, at Washington square. In the meantime, the Saint Andrew's society, and Scots' Thistle society, and the members of the Independent Church, from thence proceeded to the church. Within Washington square was placed two brass field pieces, which were fired every minute during the progress of the procession. They were manned by the First City troop, and were under the direction of colonel John K. Murphy. The whole line of troops were marshalled on Walnut street, their left resting on Sixth street.

The streets through which the escort passed on their way to the grave were literally filled with people; and around Washington square was gathered an immense mass.

The arrival of the remains at the church was hailed by the firing of one of the guns to the square; and almost immediately there was some done away by a detachment of the First City troop, and placed on a raised staging immediately in front of the speaker's stand.

By this time the galleries of the church were crowded with the beauty and fashion of our city, they being seated in the galleries for the purpose of the arrival of the coffin, the doors were thrown open to admit visitors with tickets, and the body of the church was soon completely filled.

CHRONICLE.

APALACHICOLA. Here we came November 14th, wild ducks, (the geese go to St. Joseph, and ascribe for stock), turkeys, venison and the finest fish in the world, all on the table at once. The bright days, frosty mornings, moonlight nights, and an unclouded sky, impart cheerfulness, strength and pleasure. No mosquitoes, no fleas nor any of the plagues of less happy climes. In a few days we shall have vessels from the Havana, laden with the fruits of the tropics; we already have the choicest products of the north, all contributing to the general comfort, luxury and convenience. Truly this is the Canaan of the Gentiles, for we have no Jews amongst us. Accompanying all these advantages, we have the music of some dozen high pressure steam engines, making the very poetry of sound. Who would not live in our city? [Apalachicola done.]

"ATHERIAL OLEINE" is the name given in England to a new material for burning in Argand and other lamps—superior to, and one third cheaper than sperm oil. Query? Is it our omelette?

BOUNDARY QUESTION. A work, illustrated by eight maps, entitled: "The right of the United States of America to the maritime boundary claimed by them," by Albert Gallatin, "is to be issued in a few days."

BUKKER HILL MONUMENT FAIR. The total receipts of the late fair at Boston, were $32,836 95—total expenses, $2,801 45; net proceeds, 30,035 dollars and 53 cents.

A CAMACHEE CHIEF, recently died, at the advanced age of 118 years. On the week previous to his death, he was out on a hunting expedition with some of his tribe, and caught two wild horses with a noose.

THE CANALS of both New York and Pennsylvania were still navigated at our latest advice.

THE "COME OUTERS," says the Boston Courier, are a sect recently sprung up upon Cape Cod. Their leading or sectarian views are said to be: 1. Opposition to a regular ministry. Every one should be his own priest. 2. Opposition to regularly organized churches. Every one at church by himself. 3. A disregard of the Sabbath; all days are alike. Their object seems to be to preach against preaching, to organize against church organizations and to hold meetings on the Lord's day to put down the Christian Sabbath.

At Savannah, sales of the week 1,879 bales at 8½c.

At New Orleans, the receipts of the last week were heavy, the demand active, and prices ½ ct. advance on former rates.

Liverpool classification. Louisiana and Mississippi ordinary 71½; middling 81; middling fair 8½; fair 91; good fair 10½; good fine 11½.

CORN. Price at New York 54½d.

COUNTERFEITS of the "New York Safety Fund" $5—made by obliterating the "Millington bank" and substituting "New York," are abroad.

Five dollar Georgia bank are circulating in Cincinnati. They hardly can be called imitations.

DEATHS during the last week, in Baltimore 44; of which 18 were under the year of age, 14 were from colored and 1 slave.

EXCHANGE. New York on England 108½; on France 51 17; Philadelphia 123; Baltimore 121; Richmond 8; Charleston 13; Augusta 34; Savannah 34; New Orleans 2; St. Louis, Louisville and Cincinnati 54½; Nashville 8; Michigan 9; Wisconsin 124.

FLOUR. The American Almanac states that the largest amount of flour in value exported from the United States in one year, was exported in 1817: being 1,479,195 bbls.—worth $17,291,824. The largest amount in number of bbls. exported in one year, was in 1831, being 1,806,329, and worth $10,243,019. The highest price of flour per barrel on the seaboard since the year 1790, was in the year 1796, when it was sold for $1 65. The low rate in 1826, when it sold for $1 65.

At Baltimore prices continue at 84 57½c; 92 24; intermedium of the week 17,196 bbls. and 1,515 half bbls. At Richmond 84 57½. At Savannah 84 25. At Louisville 54 60. At Rio de Janeiro, Oct. 8th, 1839; exchange 32½d.

FIRE. At Louisville, on the night of the 24th Nov. property to the amount of $70,000 was destroyed. Messrs. Stewart, and Hewitt, Allison &

Co. between 5th and 6th streets were the principal sufferers.

The bagging factory of Messrs. Ater and Boswell at Lexington, Ky. took fire on the 24th ult. and was entirely consumed.

The iron of Sylvanus Holbrook, ex of Northbridge, Mass. used for the manufacture of cotton and wool, formerly the property of the Northbridge manufacturing company, was burnt on the 13th ult. loss estimated at $20,000.

THE FISHERIES. The Yarmouth (Cape Cod) Register says the fishing business has been bad all the past season. The catch of mackerel has fallen off immensely. The cod fishing business is in a better condition, but this has fallen off also.

GEN. W. H. HARRISON reached Frankfort, Ky. on the 24th, and left for Lexington on the 25th, on private business. He is in excellent health and was received at the various stages of his tour with every demonstration of respect.

Gen. Harrison was born on the 9th of February, 1774. He will therefore be 67 years of age in February next.

THE LAKE. Depth of water. The Buffalo Advertiser says, "Lake Huron is about 800 feet deep, and the depth of Canadigua and Seneca lakes has never been satisfactorily ascertained." The early settlers, many of them, on their borders believed they were unfathomable. The Seneca lakes also fills a chain of fearful depth. "One of the most recent instances of deer falling into water is a river, laid down on the map as the Saguenai, that discharges into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, some 200 miles below Quebec. It is rather a sluggish stream, but with an average depth of nearly 800 feet, becomes so slow through an immense forest produced by some swift convulsion of nature."

JAMAICA. The Northampton Courier says: "A large company of gentlemen started from this place on Monday morning for Jamaica, West India islands. Most of them are mechanics who are employed by the governor of this island to erect necessary buildings for the purpose of making silk, which he intends to make a staple commodity."

MARRIAGE IN PROHIBITED DEGREES. At the last general convention, a committee, consisting of H. U. Onderdoek, Moore and Brownell, was appointed to report at the next general convention, a circular soliciting the repeal of certain laws of consanguinity and affinity. In this report, which will be one of much importance, the case of marrying a deceased wife's sister will be of necessity prominent. We allude to the subject at present in the allusion to the fact that the pamphlet has been published in England advocating the repeal of the law in that country which prohibits marriage within the degree of affinity just mentioned. A circular soliciting the repeal has unhappily received many signatures from among the clergy, and the measure is said to receive the countenance and active co-operation of the archbishop of Dublin, and the bishop of Landaff. [Churchman.]

"MERCEDES," a commerce of the days of Columbus by Cooper, is in press.

MICHIGAN, contains, according to the census, 212,000 inhabitants.

PACKET SHIPS AND STEAM SHIPS. The shortest passage made in 1839, from New York to Liverpool, by a packet ship, was 17 days; the shortest passage of a packet ship, during the same year, from Liverpool to New York, was 22 days. The shortest passage made by a steam ship, from New York to Liverpool, during 1839, was in 13½ days; the shortest passage made by a steam ship, from Liverpool to New York, during the same year, was in 16 days. [Sun.]

A PATENT RIGHT, it is said, has been sold for Scotland alone, for $25,000, by Mr. Burden, of the Troy iron works, for compressing and giving form to the ball iron, as it comes glowing from the furnace.

SAVANNAH, GEORGIA. The population of the city is 11,214 persons, being an increase of 3,438 over 1830. 299 persons are engaged in commercial pursuits, 701 in manufactures and trades, and 121 in learned professions. The exports for the year 1839, of cotton, rice, lumber, &c. amounted to $12,000,000. The commercial capital invested in this city is computed to be between $3 and $4,000,000.

STOCKS. At New York U. S. bank 65; of Philadelphia, U. S. bank 67½; Illinois bank 75; Arkansas bonds 81.

The Philadelphia board of brokers have adopted a rule to charge a commission of one quarter of one per cent. on the par value of all stocks, loans, &c. without regard to the market price. No commission to be less than 64 cents per share on any stock, the par of which is less than twenty-five dollars.

[Philadelphia Inquirer.]

THE SILK BUSINESS. There is no subject aside from politics, which is creating more interest among every class of people at the present time, than that of the culture of silk, for the purpose of making it one of the staple commodities of this country. Almost every person is awake to the subject; and very many, from the little experience and information they have been able to get in the trial of making silk have come to the conclusion, "that the day is not far distant when more than enough of silk will be made in this country to supply her own markets, and of as good quality as that imported." We have seen a number of samples of sewing silk, of late, made by persons in this vicinity, which fully equals the Italian silk, both in strength and durability. Letters have been sent us from different parts of the country, for information upon this subject, as to the result of the experience of those in this place, who had been engaged for some time past, in feeding worms and making silk; and we intend, after every political campaign is over, to give this subject, among others, little attention, and receive such information from our friends as they may be willing to give to the public, in aiding the advancement of the silk culture. [Northampton Courier.]

STEAMERS. The British Queen left New York on the 1st inst. with fifty passengers, $420,000 in specie, and a full freight of merchandise, and a very large amount of bills in payment of dividends on stocks, &c.

STEAMBOATS. The ill-fated Persian has reached St. Louis. The Bulletin says: "We learn from the officers that twenty-five of the unfortunate sufferers have already died, and that there are two more must die soon. There are nine others scalded who will probably recover."

The Express, owing to some derangement, exploded her boilers on the 15th ult. about fifteen miles below St. Stephens, Alabama. Five or six persons were instantly killed, and a number badly injured, among the latter were the captain, McGuns, Anderson, Smith, and Weaver, steward. A large quantity of the cargo, consisting of iron, to which one of the boilers was blown—the other was blown overboard.

The W. W. Fry, a new iron steamboat from Louisville, intended for the Alabama waters, has been heretofore, for the benefit of the passengers publish a card, commending her highly.

The Flying Dutchman, with a heavy cargo, bound for Louisville, struck a snag at Deadman's Island, 30 miles below Natchez, and sunk in seven minutes, a total loss.

The Elbe, bound for St. Louis, was sunk at Buford's Landing, 150 miles below the mouth of the Ohio, a total loss.

The Bunker Hill is aground high and dry at Wilson's bar, mouth of Red river; and the Massachusetts at Salt river, her main stib broken.

TEMPERANCE. During the year ending 30th September last, 8,832,718 gallons of spirituous liquors, and 6,473,210 gallons of wine were imported into the United States, being 278,430 gallons more of spirits than has been imported in any one year for the last six years. Friends of the temperance reform, wake up!

TEMPERANCE IN RUSSIA. A letter received from Mr. Baird at the office of the American Temperance Union, states, that he had a very pleasing interview with the emperor of Russia, at his palace at Paskovitz, Yzen, and that the emperor, a distinguished Russian nobleman in Constantinople was so convinced by reading the history in German, of the evils of drinking ardent spirits, that he agreed to pay the government the sum which the retailers had undertaken to pay for the same, in order to have no brandy sold on his extensive estates; a feat worthy of the best times of temperance in any country.

THE THEATRE. Holliday street, Baltimore, was sold at auction on the 21st inst. B. I. Cohen, esq. was the purchaser for the price $20,000. The machinery and fixtures $1,000.

WHEAT. At New York $1 00; at Baltimore 80 ¢ for hom inferior to prime red. Sales of Pennsylvania at 94 ¢ for red, 99 ¢ for white. At Alexandria 15 ¢ to 20 ¢ bushels red sold at from 55 ¢, 89 ¢, according to quality. White $1 05.

BY REMITTANCE BY MAIL. "A postmaster may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter, if written by himself."—Amos Kendall.

Some of our subscribers may not be aware that they may save the postage on subscription money, by requesting the postmaster where they reside to frank their letters containing such money, he being able to satisfy himself before a letter is mailed, that it contains nothing but what refers to the subscription. NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

THE INDEX AND TITLE PAGE of the VIII. vol. new series, or fifty-eighth vol. of the entire work, was forwarded to the subscribers by the last mail. The delay in receiving it, the editor hopes, will be compensated in this patron by the enlarged and comprehensive method he has adopted, of placing in the index the entire contents of the volume, and that in the simplest form for reference, and which, though immensely more laborious to the compiler, renders the work beyond comparison more convenient and useful to the reader. The index now occupies four, two pages—formerly it was comprised in four to six pages. The value of a REGISTER depends greatly upon the index. Nothing is more vexatious than to look for an article which we know is somewhere in a work, and are unable to find it.

To have had in the course of the fourteen months elapsed since the present proprietor took charge of the Register, five indexes to compile for it, in order to supply prior omissions and keep up with the current volumes, has been an amount of labor which no one could estimate of by merely measuring the pages they occupy in type. To have had this to perform under the exceedingly embarrassing circumstances of the work itself, with the deferred means of nearly three months to bring up, and all the arrangements incident thereto in the accounts and financial concerns of the establishment, and that too, at a time so unpropitious for any enterprise requiring money as a means for its accomplishment, has been a task of no ordinary labor and anxiety. In the midst of these difficulties, indefatigable perseverance alone could accomplish what has been done. His course has been onward through them all, cheered no less by the evidence of what has been accomplished, than by the hopes of what is in prospect. The work it often more brought up in complete, and its series of the history of the times since the commencement of the publication in 1811, is uninterrupted. The kind indulgence of those patrons of the work who have practically sustained it through its days of adversity, is a proof of the estimation in which it is held, and the increasing patronage which he has received is the more grateful to the editor, when he considers the circumstances under which it has been extended.

It is as a NATIONAL REGISTER—a record of passing events, a faithful transcript of the times, and depository of valuable documents and statistics, that the publication is designed, and as such has acquired a character of available estimate in foreign countries as well as throughout the United States. Possessing nearly all the advantages of a daily newspaper, directed in a great measure by their errors, and entirely without their heavy columns of advertisements in which so few take an interest, and those few only for the day, the REGISTER rises from oblivion and preserves in a convenient form for reference, all the most important and authoritative articles of the newspapers contained, and which, but for such a depository, would often, in a short time, be required for in vain. Whatever is material, belonging to the history of the times, is recorded in the pages of the Register in a form to be available for future use, and the editor is confident of the utility of the day as to furnish a fair and impartial development of the principles avowed, or attributed to, every party, as it rises or falls, at the same time avoiding carefully all participation in the bitter animosities which are so often engendered by party strife. Discarding the high literary and fictitious which are so abundant elsewhere, the Register is proposed as a MATTER OF FACT RECORD, where impartial truth may be found in reference to men and measures. More astute interesting to the student of history, and the statesman, than the closely printed pages, issued every week, than in the columns of almost any daily newspaper for the same time, and with this decided advantage, that it is furnished in a form suitable for preservation and convenient for reference, and that too, at considerably less than half the cost of a daily paper, if postage be included in the calculation. After service it purport as a journal of the day, it is retained and becomes one of the most valuable of books in the library of its patron, to the pages of which he may in after-time recur for the establishment of facts in which none of us can be without an interest. A publication having such an object and such advantages ought to commend itself to generous support. Experience has suggested that the work is susceptible of material improvement, which the editor is ambitious of effecting, so soon as he can command the requisita means. For which however he has to depend entirely upon the punctuality of his patrons.

EXTRA SESSION OF CONGRESS. A Cincinnati paper suggests, that the probability of an extra session should admonish such of the states as have not yet elected representatives, to make provisions for such a contingency. So far as Maryland is concerned, the law directs the governor, in such case to issue his proclamation for an election at a period prior to the usual time. It is probable that the other states have observed the like precaution.

It is not surprising that the article is, to express surprise and regret at having seen any advertisement intimating. Congress has but this moment assembled and organized for the purpose of legislating, not only for the period between this and the first of March, when their term expires, but until the constitutional period for the re-assembling of congress. The confederate of all parties would protest against adopting the idea that such new president is of course to have an extra session of congress convened upon his inauguration. The necessity of this instance, it strikes us, may arise from inexcusable neglect in the present congress to perform the duties which lie before them. An extra session is advised mainly under the impression that there may not be adequate means provided for the discharge of the duties of the session. The present congress devolves the duty to see to that, and it is not fair to presume that they will so far fail to the performance of their obligations. On the contrary we have a right to expect that the duty will be performed. The very suggestion that it may be postponed, because an extra session is contemplated, strikes us to be exceedingly impolitic as well as improper.

The constitution has wisely provided that the executive term shall commence, not with the commencement, but with the conclusion of the congressional session. Few men, perhaps no man, especially if he has never served in the executive cabinet, could at once feel himself entirely at home in assuming the highly responsible duties required of a chief magistrate of this union. Time is required even to apprise him of the views and relations of the respective members of the cabinet which he assumes from various sections of the union to aid him in council. Much is to be learned of the various ramifications of the departments, in their practical details—as well as of general state policy, before he feels entirely qualified to "advise" the legislative department of the government. The machine by which twenty millions of freemen can be well governed, is necessarily complex, and requires some proficiency and an educated mind to manage it well.

In cases of emergency, or of a failure in the present congress to leave the country with ample provision for the period of recess, an extra session would be indispensable, but it is surely unwise, not to say illiberal, to predicate upon such supposition. The new executive, in the regular department of the time which the constitution affords, to familiarize himself with their stations and prepare with due deliberation, any proposition for a material change of national policy.

FROM TEXAS AND MEXICO.

Infamous treachery. The New Orleans Bulletin of the 30th ult. brings us Tampico dates to the 17th, and Vera Cruz to the 4th, showing a most atrocious specimen of treachery.

The circumstances are briefly these: On the defeat of the federal army at Morelos in March last, Canales, Molano and Cardenas, escaped to Texas, where they were hospitably treated by the people. After failing to engage the Texas government in their plans in Mexico, they persuaded a number of the youth of Texas to join them in an invasion of the country, holding out the hope of an easy march to the city of Mexico, then in a state of revolt. On arriving at Rio Grande, it was ascertained that the revolution in Mexico, had pervaded a failure. This produced a secret opposition among the federal chiefs, to buy peace with the dominant faction at home by an act of perfidy to their foreign allies. They were consequently decayed into the interior as far as Victoria, and delivered over to general Monreal. Here, on the 25th, the Texans were abandoned to the enemy, five times their number. They were slaughtered with arms in their hands, fighting heroically to the last. One hundred and fifty of them were thus butchered.

At Matamoros, the inhabitants celebrated this great victory with bells and cannon!

The correspondence between general Arista and these bloodhounds, leading to the catastrophe is published in the Bulletin.

LAST. Refusal of the Xenophones. Since our publication of yesterday, in which the accounts from our correspondent at Matamoros left more than 100 young Texans at Saltillo, about to be sacrificed at the shrine of cowardice—we have received a communication from Texas by the New York, Mr. Ed. Dwyer, of San Antonio, who has communicated to us some new and heart cheering facts. Mr. D. was only six days from San Antonio to Houston, and on the journey put up at a house where Col. Jordan (the commander of the 114 Texans whom the Mexicans had planned to murder) had just before stopped for refreshment, Mr. Dwyer learned, and has no doubt of the correctness of the information, that when the Texans became convinced of the intentions and treachery of the Mexicans, they retired by themselves to a walled enclosure in the vicinity, determined to face the worst. At this time the citizens of the place, considering the contest at an end, opened their houses and shops and gave the soldiers whatever they wished to eat or drink.

The consequence was, that the bulk of them got badly drunk; and in this situation they were ordered by their commander to attack the outlaws, (as the Texans were termed). The battle commenced about 2 P. M. The Texans, who were well protected from the fire of the assailants—and were moreover well armed, and abundantly supplied with ammunition. The result was, that the ignorant and intoxicated towards who assailed them, incapable of inflicting injury, were slaughtered on all hands. At this juncture, the besieged sallied forth and captured three pieces of artillery, which they turned upon their enemies, and mowed them down like grass. More than four hundred of the treacherous loves were left lifeless on the ground on that night, by this small branch of the Anglo-Saxon race.

The Texans, having cleared the field, supplied themselves with apparel (of which they were much in want) and other spoils of victory, and commenced their march homeward, and pursued their way without molestation—having lost only four companions killed in the fight, and one who died from disease.

THE ANNUAL TREASURY REPORT.

The annual report of the secretary of the treasury, yesterday laid before congress, states the receipts and expenditures for 1840 as follows:

Receipts.

The receipts and means for 1840, exclusive of trusts and the post office, have been as follows: The available balance on the 1st of January, 1840, is computed to have been $2,246,749 00

During the three first quarters of the present year, the net receipts from customs were 10,689,884 73

During the same period from public lands 2,630,217 25

Miscellaneous 77,660 98

Estimated receipts fourth quarter from all other sources 3,800,000 00

These make the aggregate ordinary receipts for the year $17,197,763 01

Add the estimated receipts of principal and interest in 1840, out of what was due from former deposits 850,000 00

Add also the estimated receipts from fourth bond of the United States bank 2,500,000 00

Add for the issue of treasury notes, instead of others redeemed 5,440,000 00

Aggregate from these additional sources $8,750,000 00

Which make the total means in 1840, as ascertained and estimated $25,234,512 01

Expenditures.

The expenditures for 1840, exclusive of trusts and the post office, have been as follows: For first three quarters, civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous 4,118,218 61

Same, military 8,750,774 52

Same, naval 4,620,316 35

Which, together with the (though higher by other departments) for all expenses for fourth quarter 5,000,000 00

Aggregate of current expenses, whole year $22,489,349 51

Add for funded debt and interest for cities of District of Columbia, ascertained and estimated 100,000 00

Redemption of treasury notes, including principal and interest, for three first quarters 3,629,306 61

Estimate of notes that will be redeemed in fourth quarter 425,000 00

Making the aggregate of expenditures or payments $26,643,656 12

Leaving an available balance in the treasury on Dec. 31, 1840, computed at 1,590,855 89

$28,234,512 01

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES FOR 1841.

Receipts.

In hastily running our eye over the report, we gather that the receipts under existing laws are estimated to be probably as follows:

From customs, $19,000,000

From lands, 3,500,000

Miscellaneous, 80,000

Expected balance in the treasury, Jan. 1, 1840, 1,850,835

Due from banks expected to be made available, about 220,000

A power will exist under the act of 31st March, 1840, to issue treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars; this will furnish additional means equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, about 342,618

Expenditures.

Ordinary purposes, if congress make no reduction in the appropriations requested by the different departments, estimated at $19,250,000

This would leave, at the close of the year, a balance estimated at 5,473,473

But certain payments must also be made on request of the funded and unfunded debt, unless congress authorise contracts to be formed for extending the time of their payment; thus there will be required on account of the funded debt 149,200

Redemption of treasury notes, if all the others be issued, which can be under the present law, as then the amount of the year 1841 will probably not exceed 4,500,000

Estimated balance in the treasury at the close of the year 1841, after all payments whatsoever $824,273

This is all the information which, in the highest glance we could give the report of the secretary, we were able to extract for the information of our readers. The report will be issued at large at an early day. [National Intelligencer.]

REVENUE CUTTERS ON WINTER SERVICE. The following is a copy of an order recently issued in respect to the employment of the revenue cutters at Boston, Mass. Similar orders have been issued to the officer designated to command during the cruise, in the cases of the Madison, at Wilmington, Delaware; the Yearger, at Norfolk; the Van Buren, at Baltimore; and the Jackson, at New York, varying only as to the cruising ground, places where they are to obtain winter supplies, and to what port they are to return at the close of the cruise.

It is hoped the efforts of these vessels will prove efficient in preserving many lives and much property, in the winter inclemencies, on our northern coast: [Globe.]

Treasury department, Nov. 30th, 1840.

Sir: As the season approaches which so much suffering and distress experienced by vessels bound to ports of the United States, from long voyages, may be alleviated by the agency of the revenue cutters, while cruising on the coast, in discharge of the duty assigned by law, I have thought it advisable to designate the revenue cutter Hamilton especially for that service, and to assign you to the command of her. Accordingly, you are directed to ship a sufficient crew, and to put the vessel in a condition for effective service.

To enable you to afford the required assistance to vessels and crews in all cases of distress, it will be proper that you should have an extra number of hands for the cruise, and that you should carry provisions, fuel, water and other necessary supplies. In such quantities as can be conveniently stowed, and as, in your opinion, the necessities of the occasion may demand.

Thus prepared, you are directed to cruise on the coast as far north as Portland, and to call at Portland month occasionally, at least once in every month, keeping as close to the main land as may be consistent with the safety of the vessel, and not going into port oftener than you may be required to do so from stress of weather or want of supplies. On all such occasions you will immediately report to the department the cause of such return to port. When supplies are required during the winter, you will of course obtain them at Boston.

While cruising you will speak all vessels approaching the coast which you may fall in with, and afford to those requiring aid or relief such assistance as may be adapted to their condition and necessities, and as it may be in your power to render.

And that any supplies thus furnished may be duly accounted for, you will charge them at the cost value, and take the bills of the masters of the vessels to which they may be delivered, or their owners or consignees, for the amount.

After the severity of the weather shall have passed, you will return to Boston and deliver the bills thus taken to the collector for collection, who will be instructed how to dispose of the proceeds.

You will immediately report to the collector at Boston what supplies are needed before you commence your cruise, he having been instructed to provide them on your making such report to him. I am, respectfully, your obedient servant, Levi Woodbury, sec of the treasury.

Captain Joseph Sturgis, commanding the revenue cutter Hamilton, Boston, Massachusetts.

THE NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY. The St. Johns (N. B.) Courier states that the British commissioners appointed to run the boundary line between the American possessions of Great Britain and the United States, have finished their labors for the present season, having completed the survey of the due north line from the river St. John to the Beaver stream, on the Moitis. From thence the commissioners proceeded up the St. Lawrence to the river Otter, with the intention of passing up that river and examining the highlands at its sources. They started the last week in October for that purpose, but heavy and continued snow storms forced them to relinquish their operations. From the river Otter the commissioners proceeded to Quebec; from thence, lieutenant Broughton, R. E., one of the commissioners, went to New York, on his way to England. Mr. Featherstonhaugh, the younger, remains at Quebec for the present, making up the returns and completing the plans.

The boundary. Mr. Lilly, one of the gentlemen attached to professor R. W. Nick's party of boundary commissioners arrived here in the western stage on Thursday, from New York on his route to head quarters, whither the government has dispatched information relative to the river St. John, which the American commissioners require in making out their forthcoming report. Mr. L. informs that in his late survey, he explored nearly the whole extent of country between this place and the St. Lawrence, which he represents as a most desolate and barren region. Nothing but bogs, lakes and marshes, with some broken and irregular ridges of highlands, covered with a stunted growth of moss clad trees, under the eye of the surveyor, St. John some fifteen or twenty miles. The different parties after exploring the sources of nearly all the streams and the rivers in that section, rendezvoused at Tremacouta the 21st ult. from whence they proceeded to Quebec and N. York. The parties that went up the Kennebec and the Kennebec, understood, have also returned, thus completing the whole American survey, with the exception of running the meridian by lunar observations, (which would be caused by the weather) and the great question at issue, at the present time, is whether the line goes under the direction of major Graham, who is encamped on Park Hill, about 7 miles to the S. W. of Woodstock, and which cannot be completed under two years if extended to the St. Lawrence, as it probably will be. [Woodstock Times.

RESUMPTION IN PHILADELPHIA. It is generally known that a negotiation has for some time been in progress, between the banks of Boston and certain banks of Philadelphia, having for its object the complete and entire resumption of specie payments by the banks of that city. This object is desirable in every point of view, a determining whether a sound or a depreciated currency shall prevail not only in Philadelphia, but throughout the country south and west of that city, seems likely to be determined through the negotiation now existing between the rival cities of New York and Philadelphia. As much misapprehension exists in relation to this matter, some facts and remarks connected with it may be interesting to the public, and enable them to correct some of the erroneous views which exist in certain quarters.

It is well known that the embarrassment of the United States bank was the cause of the general suspension which took place in Philadelphia in October 1839. The fact of that city thought proper to unite their fortunes with that of the United States. They all stopped payment in compliance to their favorite idol, whose credit they thought it necessary to do—by which, in their opinion, could do. By degrees they withdrew their own notes from circulation, and left the United States bank to supply the entire circulating medium of the city. They did more, they joined in a representation, to the legislature of Pennsylvania, which had the effect of procuring the passage of a law suspending the existing penalties applicable to delinquent banks, until the 15th January, 1841. In all this, we think Philadelphia was acting in a manner unworthy of herself—she inflicted an injury to the amount of millions on New England, by refusing to fulfil her contracts except in a currency greatly depreciated. She has let go by the person who favored her suspension during the long stagnation of business, when capital was lying idle in New York and Boston, and freely offered to her on her own terms.

At length she has, in some measure, come to her senses. The Bank of the United States has so far improved its condition, that an intelligent committee of its directors, after a laborious investigation into the state of its affairs, have certified to its ability to commence and sustain specie payments, or to borrow the 15th January next, provided the debt of five millions due to the other banks of Philadelphia shall be extended from 9 to 15 months.

To this proposal the banks of Philadelphia have assented, provided they can obtain a similar credit or extension for one-half the sum, being about the balances due from the banks of Philadelphia to New York and New England. For this amount of two and a half millions of dollars, the principal banks of Philadelphia (except the United States bank) propose to give their own negotiable notes, payable in New York, at the like terms of 9 to 15 months, with interest at the rate of nine per cent. This proposition was the result of a visit to Boston, made by a committee of the Philadelphia banks. It is doing that Boston has for the last six months been urging Philadelphia to do, and to effect which, New York has constantly offered her co-operation. The proposition has been favorably received in Boston and its vicinity, certain of her banks, with those in the neighborhood of some mercantile houses connected with manufacturing establishments, have made up the sum of one million and a half of dollars, and New York has been invited to furnish the remaining million. This has been done by the Boston committee, and the Philadelphia banks, who stated as a reason for this mode of application, a wish to complete the whole transaction through one party, and did not conceal that they felt a reluctance to apply to New York, under an apprehension that they might altogether.

The application they made met a favorable reception from certain influential individuals, who viewed it as a matter of great public utility, which should not be defeated by a mere question of form, but the banks generally, the great banking interest, considered the mode of application through Boston highly objectionable, as implying a state of feeling in New York which did not exist, but stated generally that if Philadelphia had asked for the loan of a million of dollars or a much greater sum to enable them to resume, it would have been granted without the slightest difficulty. Under these circumstances, one of the New York banks gave a formal invitation to the Philadelphia committee to come on to New York and negotiate directly with the New York banks, with strong assurances of success in the course of doing so. The Boston committee joined their recommendations to this course, and stated in a mode in which the object could probably be effected.

But by this time the Philadelphia committee had caught the infection of diplomatic etiquette and had become as difficult and timorous in matters of form as the banks of New York. It would be beneath their dignity to treat with New York directly, after having indicated a different course, and after having put themselves in the hands of the Boston committee—and thus this important object is in a fair way to fail altogether.

It would be absurd however to suppose that this point of etiquette is the real difficulty—where there is a will it is easy to find a way. New York cannot be insensible to the immense importance to her trade of her restoration of the currency throughout the whole United States, which she has so long immediately follow upon a resumption in Philadelphia. But New York is unwilling to be instrumental in assisting the United States bank to resume, under the belief that by withholding her aid that she would be compelled to assume a state of liquidation, under the law passed at the instance of the legislature of Pennsylvania requiring the resumption of specie payments on the 15th January next. Supposing this result would follow, it may be asked, would it be better to let the banks go to push matters to this extremity. Supposing the law to be permitted to settle and wind up its own affairs, there can be no doubt that much more can be saved from the wreck for the stockholders than if it be forced into a legal liquidation under the law. It is true that on the supposition that the banks were to be considered a moral agent, its misdeeds have been such as would fully justify the highest degree of penal retribution. But if cannot be viewed in this light. It is admitted that Mr. Biddle has been sole manager of the bank and sole author of its misdeeds, and public opinion is visiting upon him the only penalty in the power of the community.

It is true the directors may justly be charged with sins of omission, and it is impossible to approve the course of the actual state of affairs, but to resist the suspension. But the losses caused by a liquidation would fall on the stockholders, who in a moral point of view must be considered entirely innocent.

It is also a question whether it is good policy unnecessarily to inflict the severe blow upon all American credit and all American institutions in Europe which would result from putting this institution into a state of acknowledged bankruptcy. But that is not the question. However much it may be wished the Bank of the United States will not go into liquidation. It cannot be forced into it without the co-operation of the Philadelphia banks, and that co-operation they will not give. The banks of Philadelphia cannot continue in suspension after the 15th January, without the forfeiture of its charter, under the late law of Pennsylvania; but they are not the mistake. The bank will throw itself upon its charter, and obstacles be sustained on this constitutional ground that a subsequent law cannot enlarge the penalties imposed to the charter. The other banks of Philadelphia will probably bring themselves within the terms of that law, making the note of the United States bank the only currency of the city.

The practicability of this course is so fully relied on in Philadelphia, that it fully accounts for the indifference of their committee to the completion of the arrangement, and doubtless be sustained on the point of etiquette which alone stands in the way.

The Philadelphians are a peculiar people in the matter of currency. They have a strange fondness for inconvertible paper—and it is not improbable that the banks of Philadelphia are laboring under the imaginary evils which they apprehend. It is probable that they should actually venture upon a specie representing currency. Thus the real question for New York and Boston to decide is whether the present system shall be continued as is, or whether they shall put their balances upon interest, and the best security, payable in a sound medium, and thus establish at once a sound currency throughout the entire country.

No one doubts that the security of the Philadelphia banks is the most undoubted character, and as the notes bear an interest of six per cent, it would seem that the transaction involves neither risk nor sacrifice. At the same time it accomplishes a national object of immense importance.

To Boston and New York, it is a restoration of their commerce to the old channel, which has been choked up and obstructed during the past year. To Philadelphia and Baltimore it is also a restoration of credit, and a relief from all the causes of a depreciated and fluctuating currency.

There are those amongst us who apprehend that it would cripple the banks of Philadelphia and occasion a pressure in the money market. We believe there is no ground for these apprehensions. The bringing into available use so much southern paper now dead and useless, will add greatly to our resources. The vaults of the banks of Philadelphia and Baltimore are abundantly supplied with specie. Their resumption will occasion no drain upon ours. On the contrary, the arrangement will open the now closed vaults of these two cities to the ordinary calls for specie, which has now to be met by New York and Boston exclusively. We believe that the apprehensions of an immediate pressure on the money market as growing out of this arrangement, or from other causes in either of those cities, are wholly unfounded.

It is true, that a considerable quantity of specie has been deposited in the banks of Europe, but it has consisted almost entirely of Mexican dollars, in consequence of a late rise in the price of silver as compared with gold. These shipments have not diminished the stock of the New York banks to a dangerous extent, and it is unnecessary or check their operations at all. In the current time, the rate of exchange has fallen so low as to put an end to all question about the shipping of gold to Europe. A large cotton crop is going to market, whilst our own crops have been unusually good, and we are enabled to apprehend on the score of an unfavorable balance of trade.

Others apprehend that this measure will only be patching up a rotten concern, and that the United States bank will be unable to continue specie payments after commencing them. But in this matter, we may surely trust the sagacity of the Philadelphia banks, who have not agreed to this arrangement until they were permitted to examine the books of the bank, and were entirely satisfied on this point. And amongst the banks were men who had been as distrustful of its condition as any in the community. It is true that Philadelphia can and ought to resume without this loan—but she will not do so. And on a consideration of the results, there should be no hesitation in granting it. [Boston Advertiser.

The New York Express, of Friday, 21. M. says—The local banks in Philadelphia, not being members of the United States bank, have made a direct application to the banks of this city for a loan of a million of dollars. The application was accorded to stone by all the banks that had met this morning to take the matter into consideration. Nearly the whole was taken, and the balance would be by the banks that were to consider the matter.

"A committee from Philadelphia and Boston were here to negotiate the loan, which was for nine and eighteen months, to be represented by Philadelphia post notes. The sum of two and a half millions had previously been taken by the capitalists of Boston, and this million is in addition. It is represented that this sum will be abundant supply to enable all the banks in Philadelphia to resume. The question of resumption may, therefore, be considered as settled."

The Philadelphia Inquirer of Saturday says: "The intelligence from New York was agreed to the resumption movement is favorable. It is now believed that the banks of that city will yield to the proposition that has been before them for some time, and thus the loan of $2,500,000 will be obtained. The prospect, therefore, at the close of the week, may be said to be decidedly favorable."

NAVY SPEAKER FUND. In the house on Thursday the speaker communicated the following message from the president of the United States:

To the hon. R. M. T. SPEAKER.
Speaker of the house of representatives:
SIR: I herewith transmit a letter from the secretary of the navy pension fund, to which the attention of congress is invited, and recommend an immediate appropriation of $151,352.39, and that there will be payment of pensions becoming due on and after 1st January, 1841.

M. VAN BUREN.
The letter of the secretary transmitted to the above message states that the amount of money on hand to pay pensions is $19,647 and that there will be required in addition, for the year 1841, $151,352.39, of which $51,470.73 will be wanted on the 1st of January next. That the nominal value of stocks owned by the fund is $155,739; that the stocks have greatly depreciated, and that the best of them is to be sold on the 15th of this month to reimburse money borrowed from the Bank of America and for payment of pensions to become due 1st of January.

UNITED STATES versus WM. PRICE. In the U. S. District court, Saturday, Judge Thompson presiding, the case of the United States vs. Wm. Price, came on in order upon the calendar. It was an action of debt, in which the plaintiffs sought to recover $50,000. Mr. Price appeared in person, moved a postponement of the trial, and read a long affidavit in support of the motion. The affidavit embraced a correspondence between Messrs. Price and his attorney John A. Morrill, and Mr. Buller, the district attorney, and set forth that as Mr. Price had been unable to obtain of Mr. Buller a bill of particulars of the above debt, it was necessary to the defence that time should be allowed him to procure the items from the department himself. Mr. Buller opposed the motion, but the court ordered the case go off for the term.

NATURALIZATION CASE. In the circuit court yesterday, before Judge Hale, a question was brought up for discussion which interested a good many people in this quarter, and involves some nice points of legal construction. The point touched is the extent of the rights of citizenship conferred by the treaties of cession with reference to Louisiana came into the possession of the United States. All the "rights, privileges and immunities" of citizenship were stipulated by treaty to be given to the "inhabitants" of the country ceded—and the fact of being in the country at the time of the change of flag, has been taken in general as sufficient to entitle a man to American citizenship. But occasionally—sometimes at elections when votes were counted up closely, a distinction has been drawn which is plausible and has now been made the subject of judicial examination. This distinction confines the privileges granted by treaty to those who were subjects of the edifying power at the time of treating—and so excludes a large number of those who were transient residents or inhabitants of the territory, and not subjects to the sovereign. For example, an Irishman residing in Florida, but not a subject of Spain, would not by the treaty with the United States, by which Florida was ceded, acquire the rights of an American citizen. His claims towards the new government, as he did towards the old—an alien who must be naturalized, by the law of the place—the lex loci, to become a citizen. In this position are many persons who have for many years been enjoying the undisputed rights of citizenship in this state.

THE ARMY.

Maj. gen. Macomb, we learn, was visited on the 23d ult, with a slight shock of apoplexy. This is the second attack of that nature the commander-in-chief has experienced.

A report reached us a short time since, that gen. Altkin had experienced an attack of paralysis, but letters from the general himself, dated Jefferson barclay, contradicts the statement. He is performing duty and capable of taking the field.

Maj. gen. Gaines and his family arrived at Cincinnati from St. Louis, a few days since. Before leaving, the general delivered a lecture to the Mechanics institute of St. Louis, upon the national defence, a subject which he seems to have much at heart.

After the lecture, the general's lady, Mrs. Gaines, addressed the audience for some time "upon the horrors of war." Her remarks drew forth immense applause—they were taken down by a short hand writer, and have been published.

The general and his lady reached Baltimore during the present week.

Little Rock, (Arkansas), Nov. 11.

The troops. Companies A, C, G and I, of the 3d United States Infantry, arrived here on Friday last, and immediately embarked for New Orleans on board the steamer Corvete and two keels. These troops presented an unusually clean and soldierly appearance, when the long march from Fort Towson is considered; they also appeared in excellent health and spirits. The only event of an untoward nature which occurred on the march was the murder of a man named Osborn, by a comrade; both parties to the company I. It is worthy of remark that not a single case of desertion took place on the route from Fort Towson to this city. The number comprising these four companies is three hundred and fifty-two, rank and file. The officers accompanying the battalion are: Maj. H. W. Clegg, J. B. Clark and L. N. Norris, lieuts. J. M. Smith, S. D. Dobbin and G. R. Field, A. C. S. & A. Q. M. and Dr. Griffin, ass. sur. U. S. A.

But we cannot express any satisfaction at the withdrawal from our frontier of a force which was never deemed more than sufficient to hold the Indians on our border in check for a short time, or until the militia of our state could be marched to the assistance of our regular troops. The present outbreak among the numerous tribes placed on our immediate border, but, should such an unfortunate event take place, we think our state will be found miserably deficient in that protection which ought to be afforded her by the great government.

Headquarters Army of Florida, Fort King, Nov. 24, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th inst. I support the army is now, and will remain in pursuit of the enemy. Every inducement is, however, held out to them to treat. The bands of Halick Tustouggee and Tiger-tail are pursued by a detachment of the 2d infantry. The 7th is now in the field. The dragoons, of which six companies are on the upper St John's, are actively employed at that station. The 8th regiment leaves this morning for Tampa, scouring the country on the route, against the Waboo and other hiding places on the Withlacoochee. The 6th regiment is in the country between the Hillsborough and Withlacoochee. The 1st regiment is scouring along the gulf shore, below Tampa, with boats, accompanied by a steamer and lighters.

I have deemed these movements necessary, as the entire bands of the enemy have confined themselves to the swamps and along that coast, from whence they make predatory excursions; and it is there and there alone that they can be most annoying to our troops.

To the north of Fort King, they make occasional incursions, but to bring them to a sense of what they ought to do, their families and strongholds must be broken up.

The delegation are at utter astonishment at the manner in which Halick Tustouggee and his party led them, as they had given no aid and the party repeated assurances of their devotion to emigrate. This want of faith has not deterred me from using exertions to communicate with the Seminole, and I have dispatched three of the delegation, with their consent, to hold intercourse with their relations and friends.

I will continue every exertion to fulfil the requirements of the government, by treaty or otherwise. I shall leave this place in a few hours for Tampa, where I shall be most anxious to see the Seminole, direct accordingly. I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. K. ARMISTEAD,

Brig. gen. com. army of Florida.
The hon. the secretary of war.

The British ship of war, St. George, of 120 guns, which was lately launched at Plymouth, cost, in building, £33,521, which, according to a Plymouth paper, with £30,000 for equipment, a little exceeds the old estimate of £1,000 a gun.

STATES OF THE UNION.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

United States senator. The hon. Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury, was on the 2d inst. elected a senator in congress from this state, for six years from the 4th of March, 1841, in place of hon. Henry Hubbard, whose term of service will then expire. In the election, Woodbury received 145 votes, and James Wilson 73. The vote was ten to fifteen against him. In the senate, the election of the house was contested 12 to 7. A letter to the editor of the Boston Atlas, dated Concord, N. H. Dec. 2d, says: "Mr. Woodbury received the nomination in caucus last evening at the seventh ballot, on the first of which he received 33 to 49 for Mr. Hubbard."

VERMONT.

Roman ocre—discovery of the mine. The recent discovery of an ocre mine in Vermont, promises to be of great importance, in every point of view. The article is superior to any thing of the kind now known to be in existence. The best ocre now in use is obtained from Rochelle, France; but the Vermont ocre must eventually supersede this article of traffic. The Vermont ocre forms a surface of marble smoothness, which is entirely impervious to water, and is of course extremely durable. When saturated with oil, instead of shrinking and drying away, it swells and increases in size. It occurs in a part of the Green Mountains. It was discovered on a small stream of water, the superincumbent mass of earth or decayed vegetable matter having been washed away by the action of the stream. The attraction of the water, by which it was attracted by the color of the ocre, and the absence of that scum or crust on the surface of the water, which uniformly accompanies oxide of iron. The ocre is found in a rich layer over the surface of the ground, then follows a stratum of mica state, and then another layer of earth. The mine is worked now at the rate of twelve barrels per day. A barrel weighs three hundred pounds, and the price ranges from nine to ten cents per pound.

NEW YORK.

The electoral college. This body assembled in the senate chamber on Tuesday afternoon, the 1st inst. At a clock, the hour prescribed by law, the hon. John C. Spencer, secretary of state, pursuant to custom, called the college to order. The electors chosen by the people of New York were then read over, and every one of the forty-two electors present to be at his post. On motion of general PETER B. FOSTER, seconded by SAMUEL OGDEN, of Delaware, general JAMES BURNES was chosen president of the college. On taking the chair, gen. Burnes briefly and impressively addressed the audience, referring to the revolutionary struggle, in which he had borne a part, to the jubilee which in 1783 proclaimed the victory won and American Independence achieved, and to this second year of jubilee in 1810, which had revived his hopes, till now well-nigh extinct, that the blood-bought liberties and precious institutions of our country would be perpetuated forever.

On motion of Mr. Ogden, ELISHA JENKINS, of Columbia, was chosen secretary to the electoral college.

The hon. GIDEON LEE then rose and said that he held in his hand a resolution to which he anticipated the unanimous assent of the electoral college. For the last six thousand years sudden changes in the existing institutions or chief rulers of the various nations of the earth had always been attended by bloodshed, by violence, or by war. It had pleased the Almighty so to order things in this country, that a complete change in the executive officers of the government had been brought about without infringement of the public peace or injury to the rights of individuals. He desired to acknowledge what he believed to be the interposition of Divine Providence in the affairs of the American people, and with this view he submitted a resolution, inviting a clergyman to attend and open the proceedings of the college to-morrow with an appropriate prayer.

The resolution of Mr. Lee was unanimously adopted, and Messrs. Gideon Lee, Phineas L. Tracy and A. Schellenger Jervis appointed a committee to carry it into execution. The college then adjourned to meet again this morning at 10 o'clock, when they will proceed to vote for president and vice president.

The senate chamber yesterday was crowded to excess, and all seemed struck by the venerable aspect of the body to which the people of New York have entrusted so high and solemn a duty.

Although a large proportion of the electors are aged men, there was, as already remarked, a single vacancy in the college. The fire of patriotism successfully resist the chilling fogs of age.

The electors chosen by the people of the state of New York, re-assembled at the capitol on Wednesday morning the 11th inst. to cast their votes for persons to fill the high and important offices of president and vice president of the United States. At 10 o'clock the electoral college was called to order by their venerable president, the hon. James Burt. The hon. Dr. Campbell, in a complimentary invitation extended to him by the electors, opened the proceedings by a most solemn, eloquent and impressive address to the Throne of Grace, thanking Almighty God for the signal benefits bestowed upon this nation, imploring His favor and protection for coming years, and invoking His richest blessings upon those to whom the administration of our national affairs was about to be committed.

The minutes of the meeting on Tuesday having been read, on motion of Mr. Gideon Lee, the college proceeded to vote, by ballot, for a person to fill the office of president of the United States. The roll of the electors was read by the secretary, and as the name of each elector was called he dropped his vote into the ballot box handed to him by a messenger. When all had voted, the president appointed Mr. Lawrence, of New York, and Mr. Lee, of Seneca, to sort and count the ballots. After a brief interval the tellers announced that forty-two votes had been cast, and that they were all for WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON, of the state of Ohio.

A peal of applause burst forth from the numerous audience as the result was announced.

The college, on the motion of Mr. Lee, next proceeded to vote, by ballot, for a vice president of the United States. The votes having been all given in, the tellers, appointed by the president, after counting the ballots, announced that forty-two votes had been cast, and that they were all for JOHN TYLER, of the state of Virginia.

Another round of applause succeeded the second report of the tellers.

Certificates of the persons voted for as president and vice president of the United States, and of the number of votes given to each, respectively, were then signed by the electors in succession, to be transmitted to the seat of government.

Harrison W. Romney, of the county of Upster, was unanimously elected by the college as messenger to carry the votes to congress; and Albert Crane, one of the electors, as the messenger to deposit a list of the votes with the judge of the northern district. Resolutions of thanks to the president of the college, to the tellers, the secretary of state, and to the rev. Dr. Campbell, were unanimously passed—and then the convention, after a few short stirring remarks from the aged president, adjourned.

Names of the electors of president and vice president of the United States, for the state of New York, for the year 1810, with their ages.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Business of Pittsburg. Our business season, now nearly closed, has been one of unusual fluctuation in facilities for transportation of merchandise by river and canal; prices of our local manufactures and articles of the various products of our soil, and also in our money operations and exchanges, and in taking a retrospect of our spring and fall business, and reflecting upon the probable future, there is much to stimulate and encourage our merchants, mechanics and farmers.

For the last twelve months we have been well tried in the financial crucible, but have come out brighter and purer, and the effect, we trust will be to raise our standard of punctuality higher and higher.

Our city now occupies a most enviable position in a commercial point of view—on the one hand we have the great line of canals and rail roads connecting us equally with Philadelphia and Baltimore, and on the other hand, by our cross-cut canal intersecting the grand Ohio canal at Akron, we have easy and cheap access to Cleveland, Detroit, Buffalo and adjoining lakes and country; and by our rivers we have intercourse with every important or important point in the mighty west.

At the present time all communication by our canals is suspended, and will, of course, continue so during the winter, yet we shall have ample means of transportation by land, between our city and Philadelphia and Baltimore—to the former by wagon lines connected with the rail road at Chambersburg, and to the latter by wagon entire; and we take this opportunity of assuring our friends abroad that sufficient means of conveyance may be had, and are now in operation for the transportation of merchandise to, or products and staples of the south and west to the eastern cities.

At present, merchandise of various kinds is coming from Baltimore to our city at one dollar per 100 pounds, and from Philadelphia by rail road, &c. in like proportion, and it is hoped the different transportation lines will continue to offer inducement by low rates of carriage so far, at least, as they can do it with safety to themselves.

VIRGINIA.

U. S. senator. The resolution from the house of delegates to elect a U. S. senator next Monday, was taken up in the senate yesterday, and after great deal of debate, was lost by a divo vote. Before the final question was taken there was a motion to amend by substituting a more distant day, which was carried by a divo. (Richmond, 21c.)

Message of the Governor, 1st Dec. 1840.

Fellow citizens of the senate and house of delegates:

In assembling again as the representatives of the people of Virginia, it is proper that our hearts should acknowledge with humble gratitude, the blessings which have been conferred to our commonwealth by the Supreme Ruler of events. The instructions of experience are designed to teach nations the necessity of a firm reliance on Him in whose hands are all human destinies; and no people have ever been more abundantly blessed than that of our sires. While many portions of the earth, and some parts of our own country, have felt the ravages of war and pestilence, the year is about to close with us as it commenced, in peace and security. Our fields have yielded their accustomed harvest to the industry of the husbandman; the skill of the mechanic and the enterprise of the merchant, have enlarged the sphere of their usefulness and their reward, and every citizen has reposed in confidence under the solid sure protection of our laws! If we have sometimes had occasion to lament the imperfections of the best and the wisest of human institutions, a comparison of our condition with that of the most favored of our race, will not fail to inspire us with confidence to gratify our national pride. Though we have recently witnessed a period of extraordinary excitement, I am not aware of any instance in which the laws have failed to protect the injured, or to punish the offending. It cannot be otherwise, so long as our moral rights and obligations are sanctioned by an enlightened popular will, and sustained by those simple, yet stern virtues, which are the indispensable elements of free government.

Resources. Though agriculture is the predominant interest of our state, it possesses almost unequalled advantages in its climate, its geographical position, its capacious bays and rivers, its mineral productions, and its supplies of water power, for commerce and manufactures. The success which, under the disadvantages of a fluctuating population, and an imperfect system of landholding, has attended every department of industry, leaves no doubt that when at last shall have sailed still farther in the development of our natural resources, our commonwealth will have thus realized the vivid conception of national wealth and grandeur which animated its early settlers. Our energies are recovering rapidly from the effects of those large contributions in population, wealth and enterprise, which we have made to the new states, and while our own citizens now find it better to remain and improve their native soil, European emigrants and citizens of other states are seeking homes in our fertile western territories or filling up the places of those who have left us, too often under the delusive hope of improving their condition. The indications of agricultural improvement are decided and cheering, particularly in many of our counties below tide water; and the astonishing increase in population and wealth, which is exhibited by our whole trans-Alleghany country, assures us, that though we have given more than one western empire to the union, yet like the Roman father, we are not impoverished by our generosity. But, at such moments, to us as beholders, the application of agricultural societies, and the well-directed efforts of our agricultural journals, are improving the old system of cultivation, and adding active and powerful stimulants to the energies of our production.

Trade. It is to be regretted that the means of acquiring accurate statistical information with regard to the comprehensive interests of our state, are not more satisfactory. Such information would at all times be of great value to the legislature, and of great importance to other departments of the government. Our commerce seeks such diversified channels along the whole line of the Chesapeake, through our own ports, those of the District of Columbia and the state of Maryland, and the waters of the Ohio and the west, that it is difficult to form any correct estimate of its total value. Though the regulation of its external interests has been confided to the federal government, it is nevertheless our duty to watch over those domestic resources which supply the foreign market, and to see that they receive a just protection. I would, therefore, call your attention to the oppressive and unexampled burdens to which one of our principal staples has been long subjected, and I submit whether it is not expedient for us, through our representation in congress, to enforce the just claims of our tobacco planters, to a reduction of the enormous duties imposed on tobacco, by most European governments. In some instances, duties are exacted on one thousand pounds of the bagged, while luxuries from the countries imposing them, are admitted into the United States duty free, and no article of commerce is subjected to any like the same tax. It is difficult to conceive, by an article which ranks second in the exports of the United States, and which enters so largely into the consumption of civilized and savage man, should have been selected as the subject of such a system of taxation, or why the injurious effects of this duty have not been urged in a more emphatic manner than these just and reasonable claims of foreign commerce. It has been stated by those who were well acquainted with the subject, that the different European governments, interested (and many of them deeply) in the tobacco trade, derive an annual revenue, by means of impost on American tobacco, larger than the whole current revenue of the United States. The beneficial consequences of a reduction of these duties, would soon be felt by an increased demand, and better prices for this valuable product of our soil.

The great perfection attained by our millers in the manufacture of flour, has given to our brands the highest reputation in our own country and in foreign markets. The manufacture of cheap cotton cloths, of iron, paper, salt, glass, &c. in our state has been rapidly extended, and already reached a point, which it may be considered as having attained a successful competition with the best articles manufactured elsewhere. The cities of Richmond and Petersburg, Lynchburg and several other cities, are employing very large amounts of capital in manufactures, and are displaying an energy which will soon entitle Virginia to a high rank among the manufacturing states.

Our imports, like those of all the states, have been affected by the frequent fluctuations of foreign commerce within the last few years, but they indicate a progressive improvement, which encourages the belief, that at no distant period, our foreign trade will move in more direct and natural channels than those in which habit, rather than necessity, has so long confined it. The amount of our exports exhibits a striking contrast with our importations, and shows beyond doubt that we possess abundant means for deriving those advantages which this branch of commerce which are now enjoyed chiefly by others. The application of steam to marine navigation, while it brings distant nations in closer contact with each other, will probably render useless many of those complicated agencies through which the products of one region have sought a market in another, and as the result of a better acquaintance between different countries will establish a less artificial and more direct system of foreign credit. The monopoly of the carrying trade, and of established commercial deposits, as well as the restraints which governments impose on trade, will be brought more under the salutary influence of free competition, by this system of improvement on the great highway of nations. Experience, however, has shown that commerce, like the tides of the ocean, is regulated by its own laws, and that neither the wisdom nor the power of intercessory governments is limited. While we may look with confidence to the sure results of time, it is not within the compass of state legislation, suddenly to change the established order of things with regard to the foreign sale of the staple of the state. The exports of Richmond for the year 1839, amounted to $3,577,325, while the amount of foreign imports was only $361,254. The imports and exports of our whole state for some years past, will probably bear towards each other nearly the same relation. While a well regulated system of domestic credit will doubtless greatly facilitate a better and more equal foreign trade, it is necessary also to command that credit abroad, to which our exports entitle us, and I am happy to learn that our merchants are pursuing every means to extend their acquaintance, and establish a more direct intercourse with foreign countries. The time is probably not distant, when through the agencies of steam, regular lines of packets will be established from the ports of the Chesapeake to the westward. One of the inconveniences springing from our indirect foreign trade, is the dependence of our banking institutions on the northern cities. The merchant from Virginia collects his debts in the notes of remote cities, and is obliged to resort to payment for these goods he has bought there and sold here, and thus they accumulate to such an amount as to render our banks generally debilitated, and to make it inexpedient, if not impossible, for them either to continue, or to resume specie payments, without the co-operation of the banks of the importing cities. It is probable also that a larger amount of banking capital is necessary to carry on this circuitous trade, than would suffice to accommodate a more direct foreign trade, while it is certain that we are now subjected to the inconveniences and expenses of the two modes, without enjoying to their full extent the advantages of either.

Banks. The suspension of specie payments by our banks, which occurred prior to the meeting of the senate, has been a source of great anxiety. It is hoped that a speedy and steady resumption will be made, and it is proper that the legislative authority should take steps to facilitate and ensure so desirable and necessary a result. The quarterly reports from these institutions, which have been regularly made since the act of March, 1837, have been regularly made by most of them. The Merchants' and Mechanics' bank, not having accepted the provisions of the act of March, 1837, providing general regulations for the banks of the commonwealth, is not required to make these reports. A statement of the condition of that institution, however, was received in July last, and will be found with the other reports accompanying this communication.

Having received intelligence of a serious defalcation and embezzlement in the Bank of Virginia, in the month of April last, I deemed it my duty under the act of March, 1837, to appoint three commissioners to inspect and report the condition of that institution. Their report, together with the instructions under which they acted, and the correspondence between this department and the president of the Bank of Virginia, are herewith submitted. Criminal prosecutions have been commenced against some of the parties implicated in this transaction. The report of the commissioners, which is a most interesting one to the stockholders of this bank, are the only sources of information as to its condition, to which I have had access. These indicate a very considerable loss to the institution, the effects of which have been serious and extensive, as well as to the individuals. The whole subject is one which will demand your careful consideration. The dividends arising from the stock of this bank, have heretofore constituted an important item in the fiscal resources of the bank, and it is suggested that it might be expedient to provide for their regular continuance, if the condition of the bank shall warrant it, rather than to suspend them until the original capital is restored. This will tend to mitigate the inconveniences which will result from the suspension of dividends, and may be accomplished by adapting the present capital stock to the present resources of the bank. There is no other alternative but to suspend the dividends until the actual losses of the institution have been repaired, in which case it will be necessary to resort to the sale of considerable deficiency in the public receipts from other sources.

The occurrence of so large a defalcation in any bank, without immediate detection, implies great negligence in its management, and furnishes another proof of the necessity for some additional safeguards to protect the immense interests of society in these institutions. It may be impossible to prevent crime under any system, but it is not very difficult to detect offenders of the class upon whom the vigilance of the general laws of the land, and of the particular laws of banking companies.

The condition of our banks generally, for some years past, has excited much and anxious inquiry as to the analogy between the system of the United States and the system of credit. This system has been exposed to the dangers of its own peculiar structure, and to those which are incident to our plan of government. The conflicting agencies of seven-and-twenty governments, each of which has a legislative and exercised the power of legislation over this subject, continues to present difficulties which exist no where beyond the limits of the United States. The number of local interests to be accommodated, besides the political interests which have been connected with this subject, do not permit the government of any state to close its eyes upon the surrounding cases, which must, to some extent, interfere with, and not control its own policy. Our experience has often suggested the necessity of the removal of the inconveniences which we have felt, did not result necessarily from the peculiar forms of our government, and whether they were not compensated by the evils which we enjoy, as well as the dangers which have been avoided by a liberal and jealous concession of power from the states to the federal government. While the power to regulate the currency, if discreetly used by the federal government, might be a great inconvenience, the framers of our federal compact have been aware that it was one which might be abused for very different purposes. As the power of government must necessarily be confined to frail and fallible men, it is but to guard against too much, and under governments of prescribed, constitutional limits, it is not safe to exercise any power which is not clearly granted or necessarily implied. While we can only influence the other states, as they may influence us, by force, except as they may influence us by their voice constitutionally expressed as one of its constituents, it is impossible for us to foresee what will be the action of either in reference to a subject on which, as much as any other, the whole country is so deeply interested. The federal government, in its fiscal relations with the states, must either employ its own means or those of the states, for the collection and disbursement of its revenues; whether it relies on a national bank, an independent treasury, or on the issue of notes, or of government credit in some other form, or on the state banks, to furnish the medium of collection, and as general or special depositories of its revenue, this revenue must be left to a greater or less extent by any system which it may choose to adopt. The state, therefore, has duties as well as interests, resulting from its intimate association with the other states, and with the federal government, which should not be disregarded in its deliberations on this subject. If we had absolute jurisdiction of this whole subject, or if we were called to legislate on it as an original question, our views and our duties might be very different. But it is proper for us to regard the condition of the country as it really is, and not as our imaginations might depict it. When banks were first introduced, they were intended to be, what they ought now to be, the means of circulating a paper always convertible into specie at the pleasure of the holder. The expectation, however, of legislation, or to mismanagement of the banks, or to both causes, has demonstrated the necessity for a reform of abuses which have been so extensively felt by society.

I would suggest that there is a necessity for more direct and efficient responsibility in the agents or officers to whom the business of banks is confided. This present rate of bank profits on fair business transactions, renders it quite inadvisable for the directors to be made personally liable, without destroying the system; but the responsibility of directors to a greater extent than now exists, even if it should require a premium or salary to induce the acceptance of the office, would be a great advantage. It has prevented only a small portion of the losses which so frequently occur. The commissioners appointed to investigate the affairs of the Bank of Virginia, have expressed an opinion as to the liability of the directors under the act of 1837, as it is properly a question for judicial construction, should arise, I forbear to express any opinion with regard to it.

While it would be unjust and injurious to the corporations and individuals, unnecessarily to expose private credit, publicly to the examination of the bank business, is calculated to render these institutions more safe and useful. The quarterly reports, now required of our banks, have had the effect, I doubt not, of increasing their caution and vigilance. Though the discretionary power is vested in the executive to appoint a special commission to examine any of the banks, it is a power which was apparently intended for emergencies, and will occasionally, for its exercise cannot well be known until the danger has occurred. It is therefore not remedial. A permanent board of competent commissioners, organized so that a portion of the members would be elected annually, and examined at regular intervals, would probably answer better.

The efficacy of forfeitures and other penalties now imposed to prevent suspension of specie payments, may well be questioned, since they are invoked only in the case of a suspension of specie payments, without inflicting severe punishments on the community for the delinquencies of the banks. I think it is better to subject banks to the payment of an adequate rate of interest on their notes during periods of suspension, as they would be thereby stimulated to resumption, and induced to prevent suspensions by keeping their issues within moderate bounds.

The large amount of stock held by the state in our banks, is not represented at all at meetings of the funds, and only in the hands of directors by a minority. If the state directors die or resign, their places are filled by the remaining directors, so that it may occur that the stock of the state will be wholly unrepresented at meetings of the stockholders and the directors.

While it is reasonable to suppose that those who own the stock of banking companies, and who are to gain or lose by their good or bad management, must best understand and administer to the interests of their constituents, and while it is true that a legislature would constitute, perhaps, the worst of all directors, except an executive, for those purposes, it is equally true, that without general regulations and wholesome restrictions, corporations like state banks, are apt to produce mischievous results to themselves and to society.

FINANCES. The finances of the commonwealth, I will, no doubt, command your early and most deliberate attention. While our public debt is by no means considerable, compared with our resources, and while ample provision has been promptly made to meet all demands on the treasury, it is due to the interests and honor of the state, that our financial resources should be placed on a permanent basis, one which will preserve our faith and credit beyond the reach of suspicion, and accommodate itself with the utmost attainable facility to the means of our citizens. The necessity under which the state has been placed, of raising its revenues from direct taxes, while it cherishes economy and responsibility, and excites a vigilance which is not felt as to our much larger indirect contributions to the federal treasury, has not had the effect of lessening the pressure of the taxes, but, on the contrary, is insensible to any just demand on their public spirit. It is the characteristic of a commonwealth, that whatever is wanted for the public service, is freely given, as the benefits and the burdens are shared by all. The anticipation of the revenue by means of loans, except in cases of great emergency, or where the objects to which the state may lend its credit, will certainly be adequate to reimburse the debt, in stamping and levying a species of taxation, on the industry of the intelligent and patriotic part of the people. If not timely checked, it will end in the establishment of a public debt, to discharge the interest of which, the ordinary revenue will not more than suffice. We are therefore to be reached to the point. Our debt entirely within our means, and compared with that of many other states, it is really inconsiderable. But the present is deemed a favorable period for a thorough examination into our liabilities and resources, and an adjustment of the accounts which will hereafter place our available means more under our control.

The details of our fiscal system have become very complex, not on account of the numerous subjects of taxation, for there are fewer taxes in most other governments, nor on account of rates of revenue assessed for state purposes; for these are lower, it is believed than any state whose jurisdiction and civil list approximate to our own, but in consequence of the multiplied avenues proposed to the various corporations which form parts of it. The two great funds of education and improvement, each of which consists chiefly of stocks of the state and of other corporations, the amount of stock owned by the commonwealth proper in the banks, the state stock held by the banks, and the relations of debtor and creditor, which exist between these several corporations, and between each of them and the state, however convenient they may be found in practice, are so complicated, that the annual report is very intricate. The aggregate public debt of the state is about $6,720,915.

The commonwealth holds stock and funds in banks and other companies to the amount of	2,543,395 83
The fund for the amount of	1,468,116 60
The treasury for internal improvement to the amount of	7,987,583 82
The sinking fund to the amount of	61,547 15

Making an aggregate of $12,066,187 80 held by the commonwealth and corporations which it has created, and one which it has borrowed. From the amount of these stocks, viz: 7,987,583 82 dollars, held by the fund for internal improvement, and the amount of them, viz: $2,714,275 41, which are now productive, it will be seen that a large portion of the stocks held by the state and the state institutions, are not now available, as a means of revenue. Of the aggregate of $12,066,187 80, the sum of $6,887,790 74, is either now productive, or may soon become so, and of that portion of the public funds which is now totally unproductive, there is a large amount held in works of internal improvements not yet complete, much of which, it is hoped, will ere long become productive. The aggregate of debt, viz: $6,720,915 82, and the aggregate of funds, viz: $5,285,187 80, both include the sum of $1,247,862 91, of state certificates held by institutions under the control of the state, or in fact by the state itself. Deducting this amount, the debt of the state is reduced to $5,473,052 91. In estimating the public debt, it is proper to regard the amount of subscriptions authorized, but not yet applied for, on account of some contemplated improvements, viz: $2,707,520.

It will be seen, therefore, that we have a considerable portion of our debt is redeemable, and many years before it is entirely so. There is, therefore, ample time, and in my estimation, abundant reason, for the establishment of an adequate sinking fund, which will render the redemption of our debt gradual and easy; and in the mean time, the stocks owned by the state and not now productive, shall become so, their proceeds can be applied to augment this fund, or to such other purposes as the interests of the commonwealth may require.

The actual deficit in the revenue of the last fiscal year, exceeded the estimate of the last general assembly, and made it necessary for the executive, under the act of March, 18, 1840, to surmise the treasury to be exhausted. The Bank of the Bank of Virginia, the Farmers' and the Exchange Bank, the sum of $175,700, prior to the 1st of October, and $250,000 since that period. If the policy of the state generally is questionable, then can we do so much to increase the revenue of the state, the ordinary expenses of government. The necessity for imposing the tax is only postponed, and its burden is finally increased by the accumulation of interest. This policy of loans in time of peace, commencing at a low rate, and increasing gradually, connected with the operations of our treasury, that it is difficult even now to put an end to it at once, unless an advantageous disposition can be made of some of the stocks held by the state. As very little of the revenue which may accrue will be recanted into the treasury before the 1st of October next, and a large portion of the revenue now in the treasury, will be required to pay the banks on the 18th of the present month, it will be necessary to provide some temporary means of supplying the deficiency. The value of all stocks is of so peculiar and delicate a nature, that a peremptory sale of any large amount, must always affect the price and cause a sacrifice. A discretionary authority of sale, from the Bank of Virginia, in case of a sale, cannot be effected on advantageous terms, in probably the only means by which our stocks can be used to answer the immediate demands of the treasury.

The banks, which have promptly paid the commonwealth during the past year, were required by an act of the last session, to furnish means of paying the interest on the public debt, in specie or its equivalent, when demanded by the public creditors. So far as the public debt is concerned, they were subjected to a loss of the difference between specie and current notes, and as it was incurred for the accommodation of the state, I submit whether it is not proper to relieve them from it.

The public works at Petersburg, the property of the state, is represented as being entirely unproductive, and a charge on the treasury. I suggest, therefore, whether it be not expedient to authorize its sale. It is slightly situated, and may command its price.

I recommend to your consideration the bill prepared with great care by our experienced first auditor, and submitted to the general assembly at its last session, on the subject of our revenue laws.

In 1838, the executive loaned a large part of the federal surplus, to the Richmond and Petersburg rail road company, reserving the right to adopt cering the benefits of the system has increased, the expenses of their education have greatly diminished. The district schools which have succeeded so well elsewhere, and are so admirably adapted to a dense population, require large contributions in aid of the appropriations from the state. Where one dollar is expended on this plan from the funds of the state, it has been found necessary to raise several dollars from private sources and local taxation. It nevertheless furnishes an example worthy of our attentive consideration, and perhaps the best means of securing its ultimate adoption will be the extension of our present plan, until the necessity of education is more generally felt, and private efforts shall co-operate with the public means to establish schools in every neighborhood which will be accessible to all. Our university and colleges continue to maintain their high reputation for learning, and to dispense the blessings of scientific education, not only to our own youth, but to those of many other states.

The university and the great interests of education, however, have sustained a very serious and melancholy loss in the deaths of professors Bonycastle and Davis. The latter gentleman has met an untimely and tragical end, which has deprived his state of a most useful and valued citizen, and society a generous and liberal friend. His scientific arrangements are about to be made up by the efforts of the visitors for conducting the regular exercises in the classes left vacant by these sad dispensations.

The number of our academies for the instruction of both sexes is increasing, and the standard of education has improved with the supply of competent teachers.

The institution for the education of the deaf and dumb and blind, at Staunton, has admitted a number of pupils during the past year, and I feel assured from my own observation that the instructors and officers spare no pains to fulfil the munificent designs of the state. The building has been commenced on a scale commensurate with the character of an institution liberally endowed for such purposes.

In submitting the report of the visitors to the Virginia military institute, and after a personal inspection, I feel it to be my duty to recommend this institution to your very favorable consideration.—Its officers and instructors seem to be peculiarly qualified for their stations. The school combines the method and discipline of the camp with the advantages of the lecture room. It is emphatically a state institution, where on very moderate terms, the benefits of scientific and practical military education are imparted to the youths of the commonwealth, and to a number of young men who are desirous of an expensive. I found the public arms at the arsenal in excellent order. The cadets from this institution will annually be enrolled in our militia, and will contribute essentially to improve the present defective organization and discipline of this most natural and safe defence of a free country. I commend to you the suggestions of our experienced librarian in his last annual report on the subject of a suitable library for this institution.

I recommend to your attention the defects in our militia system, noticed in the report of the adjutant general. The exact strength of our militia can never be ascertained under the imperfect returns which are now made. It is of the utmost importance that the duty of enrolling and reporting our entire force accurately, should be enjoined under adequate penalties, and that our rank and file should be distinctly arranged in corps according to the service for which they are destined. This is perhaps all that is attainable as to the improvement of our militia, at this time of peace, without incurring very serious expense and inconvenience, but I regard this as indispensable. In order to form the materials for a prompt and efficient force in time of war, it is necessary either to adopt a better plan for training our officers, or to organize our militia in corps into one or more distinct brigades, capable of taking the field on an emergency and serving as rallying points for the troops of the line.

The words voted by the general assembly to certain officers or their representatives have been at length completed, and suitable arrangements will be made for their presentation, when they are received. I have received the resignation of brigadier-general J. W. Pegram of the 15th brigade, occasioned by his removal from the line of his command.

The work at the armory and on the quarters of the officers of the public guard has been executed according to the design of the last general assembly. Many of the arms returned to the armory are in a condition to require repair, and have endeavored to require more frequent and rigid inspections of the arms distributed, but would recommend the subject as one which calls for your attention.

The examinations of various parts of the capital, the arrangements as to the hose, buckets, &c. have been attended to pursuant to directions of the last general assembly, and the particulars will be reported by the proper officers. I cannot forbear to call your attention to the condition of the capital, and to remind you of the necessity to which my predecessors have so often adverted, of providing means for the preservation of our most valuable records, and the transaction of indispensable public business.

A number of the journals of the general assembly, and some of its proceedings in the most interesting epochs of our history, have never been printed, and as the manuscript is exposed to accidents and decay, it deserves your consideration, whether it should not be printed with a convenient index.

The reports of the superintendent and board of directors of the penitentiary will inform you of the general condition of that institution and its accounts during the year.

The revision of the criminal code, provided for some years since, has not been completed, in consequence of the protracted indisposition of the distinguished gentleman to whom it has been confided. I have to announce to you the death of Richard E. Parker, esq. one of the judges of the court of appeals, long known and appreciated as a distinguished jurist and estimable man.

The police of our common jails is believed to be some times very defective under the present laws, as white persons and blacks, debtors, felons and lunatics, are occasionally confined in the same apartments. I recommend to your consideration the expediency of abolishing imprisonment for debt altogether. Civil executions are intended to subject the property, not the persons, of debtors to the payment of their debts. Imprisonment as a remedy is necessary to the creditor's rights, and as a punishment, it visits the misfortunes cast by the crime of its victims. Its constraints are ineffectual as to the fraudulent, and unnecessary as to the honest debtor. By rendering final process on judgments ineffectual, to reach lands and choses in action, justice may be done without retaining ignominy as one of its attributes.

I have received copies of resolutions, &c. of the legislature of New York on the subject of the public lands of the United States; of the legislature of Connecticut on the same subject, and others on the subject of the tariff; of the legislatures of the states of Maine and Indiana on the subject of the northeastern boundary of the United States; of the legislature of Kentucky on the subject of the public lands of that state. All of which are herewith communicated.

I have also received, and now communicate, copies of certain resolutions and other proceedings of the people of Georgetown, and of other citizens residing in the District of Columbia, complaining of the legislation of congress, and contemplating a retrocession of a portion of the territory of that District to the state of Maryland.

Presidential. I would invite your earnest attention to the defects of our laws regulating the election of electors of president and vice president of the United States. They are so obvious, and some doubt existing whether the act of March 16, 1832, was still in force, that I hesitated at one time whether it was not the duty of this department to convene the legislature. But as this act had been acquiesced in in 1836, I determined, after adopting all the precautions within the reach of the executive, in order to give a fair and unbiased expression to the popular will, to leave the execution of that act, to the legislative assembly, to the intelligence and justice of the people. While difficult to conceive in the execution of any law on this subject, and while mutual complaints of those conducting such an election, may be expected in times of high party excitement, no instance of intentional violation or neglect of the part of the constitution has come to the knowledge of this department. The imputed frauds on the elective franchise, now so frequent in every part of our country, admonish us that it is necessary to guard its exercise as we would cherish a treasure which government cannot rest. Its purity and independence are indispensable to the permanence of free institutions. Without these, parties degenerate into factions, and government itself into a mere form of despotism.

The late presidential election, after being conducted in a peaceful manner, and without excitement, has terminated, I trust, auspiciously for the general welfare of our country. The repose which follows these struggles, and the cheerful deference with which the will of the majority is acknowledged and acquiesced in, furnish the more precious materials to the friends of human liberty, and exhibit the majesty of the people in an aspect which abroad the few, who still claim the right in other countries to govern the many. A victory gained by the suffrages of a free people over countrymen who have differed from the majority about their common interests, is not an occasion of mere party triumph, but for the united efforts of all men and all parties who desire to reform what is wrong, and to perpetuate what is valuable in our government.

T. W. GILMER.

SOUTH CAROLINA. The state was given to Mr. Van Buren for president and L. W. Tazewell, for vice president.

U. S. senator. The hon. John C. Calhoun was unanimously elected by the legislature of this state to be senator of the United States for the next year for six years from the 4th day of March next, when his present term of service will expire.

GEORGIA.

United States senator. The legislature of Georgia, on the 4th instant, proceeded to the election of a senator of the United States for the year from the 4th of March next, when Mr. Lumpkin's term of service expires. On counting the ballots it was found that JOHN McPHERSON BEECHER had a majority of votes, and he was declared elected.

Banks. The Millidgeville Recorder of the 24th ult. says—The following notice on banks taken from the several bills relative to specie payments by the banks were referred, have reported a bill, requiring the banks to resume specie payment on all their liabilities, on the first day of February, 1841. On failure of any bank to comply with the provision is to cause judicial proceedings to be instituted for the forfeiture of its charter, and the assignment of its assets. The governor is authorized to employ counsel in aid of the solicitor general. The bills of such defaulting banks are not to be received for any public debt except those of the Central bank, and those only for taxes and debts.

Extract from the message of governor Bagby.
Domestic slavery. The disposition unhappily manifested in so many quarters, and in such a variety of shapes, to interfere with the question of domestic slavery in those states where it exists under the sanction of the constitution, and which to my mind, has so clearly assumed a political aspect, and to threaten the stability of the government, by putting in most imminent peril the safety of the southern people, renders it an impious duty to bring the subject to the notice of the legislature.

It will not be expected, in a communication of this kind, that I should enter upon a defence of slavery, either as to its condition of the natives, or as a question of abstract moral right. Although it is believed, notwithstanding the depraved and morbid sensibility manifested upon the subject, that the truth of the following propositions is clearly demonstrable—First: In regard to the slaveholding states of this union, enjoy the necessary use of, in greater abundance than the laboring poor, or those who have in labor for subsistence, in any country under the sun; and that they have fewer cares and anxieties than they admit. Second: That if they were emancipated, it would make their condition worse instead of better. Third: Slavery will always exist, as it always has existed in every age and country, under every form of government and modification of human society, in some form, and that that class are better adapted to the condition of servitude than any other. Fourth: Experience has already proven, that all attempts at colonization in the country whence they originally came, are futile and hopeless. Fifth: If the American slaves could be colonized, they could not be in a condition of the natives, instead of imparting the best of the fruits of civilization and civilization to them. Sixth: That slavery existed from the earliest generations after the deluge, if not with the express sanction of the Divine will, without any prohibition; and that the inspired founders of the republic, whose institutions are sanctioned by the Almighty himself. Seventh: There is not a country in Europe in which servitude does not exist, in a more oppressive and degrading form, than the system of slavery in the United States. If there were no other reason, what modern age of morality is entitled to the discovery, that slavery is a great moral evil, the weight of which is sinking the character of this country below the standard maintained by the Goths and Vandals! Was the great and valiant men who framed the constitution, and who were at least as humane and intelligent, as these abolition harpies, who are laboring to subvert an institution as old as society itself, and which, notwithstanding all their efforts, will be co-existent with it?

The framers of the constitution expressly recognized the existence of slavery, by including slaves in the ratio of representation; viewing them as they are, and as they must continue to be, while the principles of the constitution endure, in the mixed light of persons and property. If it be within the decesses of omnipotence, that the distinctions of rank and color are to vanish and be done away, and the servant is to be free from his master, it will only be when the institutions of human society shall give place to that state of things, in the ordering out of which human agency can have no control, and which can neither be accelerated nor postponed by human exertions. Slavery in some form will always exist. It is one of the incidents of society, a faculty only of good or evil, but it has existed from the foundation of the world, and exist it will till time shall be no more.

But while we insist upon our rights, we should never be invisible to our duties as masters. The relation of master and servant is one of vast importance both in a moral and political point of view—more important, perhaps, than any which now exists. The other social relations are viewed in the same light by all civilized nations, and it is easy to conceive of any cause likely to disturb them. With the relation of master and servant this unhappiness is not the case. Let us then, from an exalted sense of what is due to ourselves, and from a sacred regard to humanity and justice, so fulfil this relation as to put those, who are disposed officiously to interfere with our rights, to shame; and to prove ourselves worthy of the superior position in the scale of being, to which has pleased Divine Providence to place us. I feel that it is the duty of the most righteous course on our part will ensure our future tranquillity upon this subject—in fact, from present indications I am strongly inclined to think, that it will not. A fervent attachment to the union of the states, and an ardent desire that it might be perpetuated has rendered me averse to the agitation of any question that would be likely to weaken the bonds which unite us as one people. There is, however, a point in public as well as private affairs, beyond which we cannot pass to a virtuous. And when we see regularly organized societies for the avowed purpose of abolishing slavery, instilling considerable portions of our country, disseminating their pestilential doctrines in every direction—when we see American citizens, unmindful of all the obligations that ought to bind them to their country, confederating with foreigners for the purpose of disturbing rights secured to us by a compact in which the states of the union are parties—when we see the halls of congress flooded with petition after session with petitions asserting the right of congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, (no doubt with a view of extending the same principle to the states) and when we see the press between the states, and importuning them to exert it—when we see the question of abolition made a test for the highest offices in many of the states—when we see state legislatures, in their highest representative capacity, and in the face of constitutions, authorizing slavery as a political evil, and one that ought to be abolished—when we behold the legislature of one state enacting laws giving to runaway slaves the right of trial by jury to decide upon the question of property in said slave, and the trial to take place in a community where slavery is daily denounced as a curse, and slaveholders as monsters and tyrants; and the governor of another state refusing to surrender persons charged with stealing slaves when demanded by the proper authorities—when we see the two branches of the legislature of one of the oldest states in the union, pass a bill through both houses of the general assembly, legalizing marriage between negroes and white people, and the country only to be troubled with the measure by the veto of the governor—when we behold, in various quarters of the union, the professions of a pure and holy religion, and the preteached disciples of its divine and immaculate author, declaring that slavery is a sin, and that the proper excommunication nor excommunicate, and throwing their exertions into the stream that threatens to overwhelm us, by inciting our slaves to acts of rebellion, insurrection and murder; it is time to awake from the state of sanctified slumber in which we have hitherto remained.

Neither are the exertions making in other countries, calculated to allay our apprehensions upon this subject. Within the present year a convention, at which some American members of the assembly were present as members, was held in the metropolis of the British empire, the object of which was the abolition of negro slavery, throughout the world. And the proceedings of this foreign convention, aiming at a total blot out of the rights and safety of one section of the United States, has been heralded through the public mail under the official frank of the representatives of a portion of the people of the United States. Perhaps it is not so remarkable that religious fanatics and political zealots in England, shuddering at the recollection of the horrors of the African slave trade, which combined in its practice the dreadful crimes of kidnapping, piracy and murder, and in which the Dutch and English were the first, and beyond all comparison the greatest offenders, should be anxious to expiate their own sins by attempting to disturb the relations of master and slave in other countries; but it is greatly to be regretted that any portion of the people of this country should be so much under the influence of their ancient tyrannical masters as to have fallen into the same unhappy delusion.

It is possible, that southern statesmen, fired with just indignation at the repeated efforts of northern and eastern members of congress to interfere with rights secured to them by the constitution of the United States, may have been induced to receive petitions upon the subject of abolishing slavery. It may be possible that this subject is embraced within the comprehensive principle of the inalienable right of petition. If so, that right should be maintained inviolate. The petitions should be received, referred to a committee of abolitionists, who seem to set themselves up as the peculiar guardians of humanity and justice, with instructions to report their views, in order that we may be fully apprised of the extent of their designs. If, on the other hand, this subject does not fall within the scope of the right of petition, it ought to be made felony by a law of the United States to present them. For if the right to present such petitions be not an inalienable right, it is impossible to conceive of any act fraught with more dreadful consequences, or the perpetration of which would justify more more highly penal enactments to suppress. My own opinion is that the only way in which the question of slavery can be presented as a subject to be on a proposition to amend the constitution in this respect.

In view of the dangers impending over us, I respectfully suggest to the general assembly the inadvisability of proceeding to the consideration of this union, and to the world, the views we entertain upon this subject, and which we intend to insist upon in every emergency, and are resolved to maintain at every hazard. I also recommend the adoption of the most effectual measures for suppressing unlawful assemblages of negroes, and the circulation of incendiary publications and speeches among them, and a careful revision and improvement of the laws which relate to the rights of the colored people, in order that they may be able to stand upon the same footing with our own, to adopt the most effectual measures for our mutual happiness and safety. It is perfectly idle for us, no matter what may be the depth and the sincerity of our attachment to the constitution, to debate the propriety of forms of the constitution, while its substance is daily yielding to the rude tide of innovation and fanaticism, which is constantly lashing against it. And if contrary to all the pleasing anticipations of the past, that instrument shall fail to secure to us the great essential objects contemplated by its illustrious founders, it becomes our duty, not only as patriots, but as rational beings, acting under the powerful instinct of self-preservation, to provide new guards for our future security. I am deliberately convinced in my own mind that the period has arrived for the people of the south to act, and to act efficiently on this subject, or their weight and importance in the scale of national existence will be lost, and their safety forever forfeited. According to the reflection, that whatever contrariety of opinion may exist among southern men upon other subjects, they will be true to themselves, and to the compromises of the constitution, and feel and act in relation to it, as our own people.

Electing members of congress by general ticket.
With the view to concentrate more perfectly the political energies of the state as far as practicable, and of commencing the genuine state rights doctrine, I beg leave, respectfully to suggest the propriety of changing the mode of electing members of congress by districts, and of substituting instead thereof, the general ticket system. Every state entitled to a separate independent existence, is supposed to possess a sovereign will, constituted, according to the theory of our government, of the opinions and wishes of a majority of the people. This sovereign will, when ascertained according to the provisions of the constitution, becomes, after all, the great operative principle of representative democratic government. Hence in elections, whatever method is most likely to obtain an expression of that will, and to carry it out in practice, is most congenial to the true theory of our form of government. According to the principles of the constitution, the people of the state are represented in the popular branch of the legislature—the people of the states in their aggregate sovereign capacity—and if it be true, that the will of this aggregate sovereign constitutes the great cardinal and distinctive feature of representative government, it would seem to follow, inevitably, that whatever method was most likely to ascertain that sovereign will, and preserve it entire, is most conformable not only to the spirit of the constitution, but most conducive in the perpetuity of the sovereignty of the states. The general ticket system, is not only believed to be desirable upon principle, but to be perfectly equitable in practice. It gives to a majority of the whole people of the state, at all times, whatever may be their political opinions, the entire undivided weight of the whole representation in congress. It renders the district system, not only tends to engender an attachment to sectional or local interests, at the expense of the whole, and sometimes to nourish a factious spirit, but to weaken the force of the state representation; and, in some instances, to paralyze altogether in the national legislature. It may be said, however, that it is more convenient to elect by districts; and that persons so elected, are more likely to be informed particularly of the various and minute interests of the district, than if they were selected from the state at large, and elected by general ticket.

This argument naturally divides itself into two branches. Upon the first it may be remarked, that most arguments derived from the mere consideration of convenience, are of a very trifling nature, and require, as not unrequitedly involving a violation of, or departure from principle. The second member of the proposition is believed to be equally destitute of any solid foundation. In the first place, it may be safely assumed, that among the members of the general system, the most suitable and talented individuals, would not only be apt to be indicated by public opinion, but would be selected from the different sections of the state, and would have their claims and qualifications endorsed by a majority of the people of the whole state, instead of a majority of a particular district. And it will hardly be contended that any one is qualified for a seat in congress, whose knowledge is so limited as to be confined to the views, wishes or interests of a particular district. Under every aspect of the question, I am so well satisfied that the general ticket system is most consonant to our democratic representative system, that I recommend it to the most favorable consideration of the legislature. I am aware that the time, and the circumstances under which this recommendation is made, and when every proposition of a public nature, is scrutinized with proper, and sometimes with rigid severity, may subject the proposition itself to some misapprehensions, and the motives which prompt it, to misconception and misrepresentation. But I should consider myself peculiarly unfitted for public employment in these times, and utterly unqualified to command the confidence of the people, if I were to continue to write, if I could, for a moment, permit the hope of applause, or the fear of censure, to render me insensible to the sacred obligations of official duty.

It will not be expected, that I should notice all the topics which will meet your attention, during the deliberations of your present session, I console myself with the reflection, that whatever may be omitted will be supplied by your superior intelligence; and that the people will find in your patriotism and virtue, a sure corrective against any thing I may have recommended, incompatible with the public interest.

The highest vote for the respective tickets in each county, was taken in making up the above table.

It will be seen that the whigs have carried all the congressional districts by decided majorities. The greatest change in their favor has been in the first district. At the August election the Van Buren majority was 87; now Harrison has a majority of 1,075, showing a gain of 1,165.

*The vote of Hancock is averaged in the above table. In this county the Mormons reside, and for some cause or other they voted for three of the candidates of the Harrison electoral ticket, and two on the Van Buren ticket.

MISSISSIPPI.
Reigning. John Jenkins, esq. representative elect to the legislature of Mississippi, from Hinds county, publishes his resignation in the Jacksonian Mississippi. He addresses gov. McNutt, thus: "Dear sir: From the result of the election for president of the United States in this county, it appears that there has been a change in the opinion of a portion of the electors of this county since the election of last year, from the cause of democracy to that of the cause of the humbug party of hard core, log cabins, cotton skins, &c.; and not being willing to hold on to political office contrary to the wish of the majority of the people among whom I live, I take the earliest opportunity of tendering to you and my constituents the office I have received at their hands as a member of the legislature from this county, which I hope will be kindly received. With great respect, I remain the obedient servant of the democracy."

ARKANSAS.
The legislature of this state convened at Little Rock on the 24th. The senate organized by electing MARK LEACH president, and the house elected GEORGE HILL its speaker. On the 4th of Nov. was inaugurated.
U. S. senator. Wm. S. Fulton has been received to the senate of the United States from the state of Arkansas on Sunday preceding the 4th of March next, when his present term of service will have expired.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—24 SESSION.
Monday, December 8, 1840. This being the day fixed by the constitution for the re-assembling of congress, the members who had received the seat of government attended at this annual hour in their respective halls, but a severe snow storm which occurred the Saturday and Sunday preceding, had so obstructed the thoroughfares, that a sufficient number to form a quorum in either house had not been able to get on. The attending members were summoned for the day.

SENATE.
December 8. A sufficient number to form a quorum not yet being present, the members attending adjourned.
December 9. Mr. Mangum, senator elect from North Carolina, was qualified and took his seat. A quorum having answered to their names, on motion of Mr. Fulton, the secretary was directed to inform the house. A resolution was received from the house proposing a joint committee to wait upon the president and inform him of congress was prepared to receive any communication, which was responded to, and Messrs. Wright, of N. Y., and Huntington, of Con. were named on the part of the senate.
A joint resolution to elect chaplains, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Indiana, the 31st rule was so modified as to enable the chair to appoint the standing committee, with the exception of the chairman of the committee on commerce.
Mr. Wright reported that the deputation had performed the duty of apprising the president—and the message was soon after received through Mr. Abraham Van Buren, his private secretary. [For which see this day's proceedings of the house.]
On motion of Mr. Hubbard, 3,000 copies of the message, and 1,500 of the accompanying documents were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Merrick then rose, and announced the death of his late colleague, (the hon. Jos. S. Spencer), as follows:

Mr. President: Like all other human enjoyments, the gratification of meeting and interchanging our mutual congratulations again on this occasion is not unamixed with painful and melancholy reflection. To me in an especial manner are the circumstances under which I now live to address you affecting. Your vantage seat, sir, explains the cause. My most excellent and estimable colleague, the hon. John S. Spencer, who for the last several years filled that chair with honor to himself and advantage to his country, is no more. He closed his awful and valuable life in the latter part of the month of October last, at his residence in Worcester county, Maryland, surrounded by his amiable and interesting family, and at peace with God and man. He was it will be remembered, in languid health during great part of our last session, and was often detained from his place here by that cause, which finally obliged him to leave the seat of government, and retire to his own home some time before the adjournment. From the disease which then afflicted him he never perfectly recovered; though there was occasional relief from it by that cause, there was no effectual cure, and he has now left three of his dear and all his scenes forever. He has at different periods of his life filled many of the most important and honorable trusts in the gift of the people of his state, always possessing, always deserving their entire confidence. His course through life was much more the useful than brilliant order, possessed of a very large stock of sterling merit and virtue, there was about him nothing of ostentatious display. Ever content with the consciousness of doing his duty well and faithfully, he was careless of all other rewards.—None knew him who did not honor and esteem him; and all who knew him will join with me in saying that he has left no purer man behind him.

Mr. Merrick then submitted a resolution in testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased senator, which, having been unanimously adopted, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, Dec. 8. At 12 o'clock the speaker, the hon. Robert M. T. Hunter, took the chair. The clerk called over the names of the members and a quorum being in attendance, it was so announced by the chair.

Whereupon Mr. Taliaferro, of Virginia, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed on the part of this house, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the senate, to wait on the president of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two houses is assembled, and to inform him now ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

This resolution was read and agreed to, and Mr. Taliaferro and Mr. Cize Johnson, of Tennessee, were appointed the committee on the part of the house.

On motion of Mr. Taliaferro, the clerk was then directed to notify the senate that a quorum of the house had assembled, and was ready to proceed to business.

Mr. John Quincy Adams gave notice that it is his purpose to offer to-morrow a resolution that the standing rule of the house, No. 14, adopted on the 23th of January last, be rescinded.

The rule which Mr. Adams will propose to rescind is in the words following:

"No petition, memorial, resolution or other paper, praying the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, or any state or territory, or the slave trade between the states or territories of the United States, in which it now exists, shall be received by this house, or entertained by its members."

It being ascertained that the senate would not form a quorum to-day, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 9. On motion of Mr. Russell the hour of 12 was adopted for the present, to which the house should stand adjourned—and the clerk was directed to further the members, during the session with such newspapers as he might direct, not exceeding in expense the rate of three daily newspapers.

Some conversation ensued. Mr. Adams admitted that he would be satisfied with a silent vote upon his proposition. Whereupon Mr. Jentler withdrew his motion. It was renewed by Mr. Banks, of Virginia, and after a few remarks from Mr. Cize Johnson, Mr. Lewis Williams and Mr. Adams, the yeas and nays were taken and the resolution was laid upon the table, yeas 83, nays 28.

At half past one o'clock the president's private secretary, Abraham Van Buren, delivered the following

MESSAGE.

Fellow citizens of the senate and house of representatives:

Our devout gratitude is due to the Supreme Being for having graciously continued to us, beloved country, through a vicissitude of another year, the invaluable blessings of health, plenty and peace. Seldom has this favored land been so generally exempted from the ravages of disease, or the labor of the husbandman more amply rewarded, and never before has the relation with other countries been placed on a more favorable basis than that which they so happily occupy at this critical conjuncture in the affairs of the world. A rigid and persevering abstention from all interference with the domestic and political relations of other states, alike due to the genius and distinctive character of our government and to the principles by which it is directed; a faithful observance, in the management of our foreign relations, of the principle of speaking plainly, dealing justly, and requiring truth and justice in return, as the best conservators of the peace of nations; a strict impartiality in our manifestations of friendship, in the commercial privileges we concede, and the aid we require from others; these, accompanied by a disposition as prompt to maintain in every emergency, our own rights, as we are from principle averse to the invasion of those of others, have given to our country and government a standing in the great family of nations, of which we have just cause to be proud, and the advantages of which are experienced by our citizens throughout every portion of the earth to which their enterprising and adventurous spirit may carry them. Few, if any, remain insensible to the value of our friendship, or ignorant of the terms on which it can be acquired, and by which it can alone be preserved.

A series of questions of long standing, difficult in their adjustment, and important in their consequences, in which the rights of our citizens and the honor of the country were deeply involved, have, in the course of a few years, (the most of our inquiries of long standing, and the most of our immediate predecessors), been brought to a satisfactory conclusion; and the most important of those remaining are, I am happy to believe, in a fair way of being speedily and satisfactorily adjusted.

With all the powers of the world our relations are those of honorable peace. Since your adjournment, nothing serious has occurred to interrupt or threaten this desirable harmony. If clouds have lowered above the other hemisphere, they have not cast their portentous shadows upon our happy shores. Bound by no entangling alliances, yet linked by a common nature and interest with the other nations of mankind, our aspirations are for the promotion of peace, in the solid and civilized triumphs all men prize, and in the generous emulation. Yet it behooves us to be prepared for any event, and to be always ready to maintain those just and enlightened principles of conduct for which our country has so often and so bravely stood. In the shock of conflicting empires, it is only by assuming a resolute bearing, and clothing themselves with defensive armor, that neutral nations can maintain their independent rights.

The excitement which grew out of the territorial controversy between the United States and Great Britain having in a great measure subsided, it is hoped that a favorable period is approaching for its settlement. Both governments are now convinced of the dangers with which the question is fraught; and it must be their desire, as it is in their interest, that this perpetual cause of irritation should be removed as speedily as practicable. I am happy to say that the message you have just received, proposing a commission of exploration and survey provided Great Britain had been received, and that a counterproject, including also a survey of the certain and fixed adjustment of the limits in dispute, was then before the British government for its consideration. The answer of that government, accompanied by additional propositions of its own, was received, through its minister, on the 10th of your session. It was promptly considered; and as we were deemed correct in principle, and consistent with a due regard to the just rights of the United States and of the state of Maine, concurred in; and the reasons for the refusal to receive the residue, with the suggestion on our part, communicated by the secretary of state to Mr. Fox. That minister, not feeling himself sufficiently instructed upon some of the points raised in the discussion, left it to be his duty to refer the matter to his own government for its further decision. Having now been for some time under its advisement, a speedy answer may be confidently expected. From the character of the points still in difference, and the undoubted disposition to bring the matter to a speedy and final conclusion, I look with entire confidence to a prompt and satisfactory termination of the negotiation. Three commissioners were appointed for the purpose of the adjustment of congress, under the act of the last session, to make a general exploration and survey of the line which separates the states of Maine and New Hampshire from the British provinces; they have been actively employed until their progress was interrupted by the inclemency of the season, and will resume their labor as soon as practicable in the ensuing year.

It is understood that their respective examinations will throw new light upon the subject in controversy, and serve to remove any erroneous impressions which may have been made elsewhere prejudicial to the rights of the U. States. It was, among other reasons, with a view of preventing the embarrassments which, in our peculiar system of government, impede any adequate arrangement for settling the territorial rights of a state, that I thought it my duty, as you have been informed on a previous occasion, to propose to the British government, through its minister at Washington, that the inquiry might be taken to adjust the points of difference on the line of boundary from the entrance of Lake Superior to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods, by the arbitration of a friendly power, in conformity with the seventh article of the treaty of Ghent. No answer has yet been returned by the British government to this proposition.

With Austria, France, Prussia, Russia and the remaining powers of Europe, I am happy to inform you our relations continue to be of the most friendly character. With Belgium, a treaty of commerce and navigation, based upon liberal principles of reciprocity and equality, was concluded in March last, and, having been ratified by the Belgian government, will be duly laid before the senate. It is a subject of congratulation that it provides for the satisfactory adjustment of a long standing question of controversy; thus removing the mutual animosity which has existed between the two nations. A messenger has been despatched with the Hanoverian treaty to Berlin, where, according to stipulation, the ratifications are to be exchanged. I am happy to announce to you that, after many delays and difficulties, a treaty of commerce and navigation, between the United States and Portugal, was concluded and signed at Lisbon, on the 26th of August last, by the plenipotentiaries of the two governments. Its stipulations are founded upon those principles of mutual liberality and advantage which the United States have always sought to make the basis of their intercourse with foreign powers, and it is hoped they will tend to strengthen the commercial intercourse of the two countries.

Under the appropriation of the last session of congress, an agent has been sent to Germany, for the purpose of promoting the interests of our tobacco trade.

The commissioners appointed under the convention for the adjustment of claims of citizens of the United States upon Mexico having met and organized at Washington, in June of our last session, the possession of the government, relating to those claims, were communicated to the board. The claims not embraced by that convention are now the subject of negotiation between the two governments, through the medium of our minister at Mexico.

Nothing has occurred to disturb the harmony of our relations with the different governments of South America. I regret, however, to be obliged to inform you that the late republic of Colombia have not yet been satisfied by the separate governments into which it has been resolved.

The charge d'affaires of Brazil having expressed the intention of his government not to prolong the treaty of 1825, it will cease to be obligatory upon either party on the 12th day of December, 1841, when the extensive commercial intercourse between the United States and Brazil, of our country, will no longer be regulated by express stipulations.

It affords me pleasure to communicate to you that the government of Chili has entered into an agreement to indemnify the claimants in the case of the Macedonian, for a cargo of property seized in 1819; and to add that information has also been received which justifies the hope of an early adjustment of the remaining claims upon that government.

The commissioners appointed in pursuance of the treaty between the U. States and Texas for marking the boundary between them, have, according to the last report received from our commissioner, surveyed and established the whole extent of the boundary north along the western bank of the Rio Grande, from the mouth of the river to Mexico to the thirty-second degree of north latitude. The commission adjourned on the 16th of June last, to reassemble on the 1st of November, for the purpose of establishing accurately the intersection of the thirty-second degree of north latitude with the river of the Sabine, and the medium line thence to Red river. It is presumed that the work will be concluded in the present season.

The present sound condition of our finances, and the success with which our embarrassments in regard to them, at times apparently insurmountable, have been overcome, are matters upon which the people and government of the United States may well congratulate themselves. In an ordinary year, however, it may be regarded as an evidence of public prosperity, is seldom conducive to the permanent welfare of any people; and experience has demonstrated its incompatibility with the salutary policy of a prudent and judicious management of the United States. Our safe reliance for financial efficiency and independence has, on the contrary, been found to consist in ample resources unencumbered with debt; and in this respect, the federal government is singularly fortunate and truly enviable position.

When I entered upon the discharge of my official duties in March, 1837, the act for the distribution of the surplus revenues was in a course of rapid execution. Nearly twenty-eight millions of dollars of earliest in their development, and have been more important in their consequences, than any that have arisen under our complicated and difficult, yet admirable, system of government. I allude to a national debt, and a national bank. It was in these that the political contests by which the country has been agitated ever since the adoption of the constitution, in a great measure, originated, and there is too much reason to apprehend that the conflicting interests and opposing principles thus marshallled, will continue, as heretofore, to produce similar, if not aggravated, consequences.

Coming into office the declared enemy of both, I have earnestly endeavored to prevent a return to either.

The consideration that a large public debt affords an apology, and produces, in some degree, a necessity also, for resorting to a system and extent of taxation which is not only oppressive throughout, but likewise so apt to lead, in the end, to the commission of that most odious of all offenses against the principles of republican government—the prostitution of political power, conferred for the general benefit, to the aggrandizement of particular classes, and the gratification of individual cupidity—a alone sufficient, independently of the weighty objections which have already been urged, to render its creation and its maintenance a necessary and unapproachable absurd. If we add to this, its inevitable tendency to produce and foster extravagant expenditures of the public money, by which a necessity is created for new loans and new taxes on the people, and finally to refer to the examples of every government which has existed, for proof how seldom it is that the system, when once adopted and implanted in the policy of a country, has failed to expand itself, until public credit has been exhausted, and the people were no longer able to endure its increasing weight, it seems impossible to resist the conclusion, that no benefits resulting from its career, so extent of conquest, no accession of wealth to particular classes, nor any, nor all its abundant advantages, can compensate for its ultimate but certain results—a splendid government, and an impoverished people.

If a national bank was, as is undeniable, repudiated by the framers of the constitution as incompatible with the rights of the states and the liberties of the people; if, from the beginning, it has been regarded by large portions of our citizens as coming in direct collision with that great and vital amendment of the constitution, which has secured the powers not conferred by that instrument on the general government are reserved to the states and to the people; if it has been viewed by them as the first great step in the march of latitudinism construction, which, uncontrolled and unchecked, would be a transformation of a little value as an unwritten constitution, dependent as it would alone be, for its meaning, on the interested interpretation of a dominant party, and affording no security to the rights of the minority,—if such are the characteristics of this national ground could have been conceived for an occupying might but determined opposition to such an institution at the present day?

Could a different result have been expected, when the consequences which have flowed from its creation, and particularly from its struggles to perpetuate its existence, had confirmed in so striking a manner, the apprehensions of its earliest opponents; when it had been so clearly demonstrated that a concentrated money power, and a central seat of capital and combining such incalculable means of influence, may, in those peculiar conjunctures to which this government is unavoidably exposed, prove an overwhelming for the political power of the people themselves, when the true character of its policy to regulate, according to its will and its interests, and the interests of its favorites, the value and production of the labor and property of every man in this extended country, had been so fully and fearfully developed, when it was notorious that all classes of the great community had, by means of the power and influence it thus possessed, been infected to madness with a spirit of heedless speculation; when it had been seen that, secure in the support of the executive and judiciary, by which it was surrounded, it could violate its charter, and set the laws at defiance with impunity; and when, too, it had become most apparent that to believe that such an accumulation of powers can ever be given to any one individual, or being abused, was to invite in a fatal delusion?

To avoid the necessity of a permanent debt, and its inevitable consequences, I have advocated, and endeavored to carry into effect, the policy of confining the appropriation of money to the service to which objects only as are clearly within the constitutional authority of the federal government; of excluding from its expenses those imprudent and unauthorized grants of public money for works of internal improvement, which were so wisely arrested by the constitutional disposition of my predecessor, and which, if they had not been so checked, would have done this time, what they have done in the general government in embarrassments far greater than those which are now experienced by any of the states; of limiting all our expenditures to that simple, unostentatious, and economical administration of public affairs, which is alone consistent with the character of our institutions; of collecting annually from the customs, and the sales of public lands, a revenue fully adequate to defray all the expenses thus incurred, but under no pretence whatsoever, to require the people to contribute a greater sum than was actually necessary to the public service conducted upon the principles I have stated.

In lieu of a national bank, or a dependence upon banks of any description, for the management of our fiscal affairs, I have recommended the adoption of a system which is now in successful operation. That system affords every requisite facility for the transaction of the pecuniary concerns of the government; will, it is confidently anticipated, produce in other respects many of the benefits which have been hitherto to time expected from the creation of a national bank, but which have never been realized; avoid the manifold evils inseparable from such an institution; diminish, to a greater extent than could be accomplished by any other measure, the expense of the patronage of the federal government—a wise policy in all governments, but more especially so in one like ours, which works well only in proportion as it is not too largely for its support upon the public treasury. I have recommended, and I have, I am unweariedly endeavoring to carry out, a policy, which, I believe, will, in the end, forever, all dependence on corporate bodies, either in the raising, collecting, safekeeping, or disbursing the public revenues; and place the government equally above the temptations of favoring a dangerous and unconstitutional institution at home, or the necessity of adapting its policy to the views and interests of a still more formidable money-power abroad.

In the adoption and carrying out these principles, under circumstances the most arduous and discouraging, that the attempt has been made, thus far successfully, to demonstrate to the people of the United States that a national bank at all times, in all seasons, and in all circumstances, is a period when the honor and safety of the nation demand the temporary sacrifice of a policy, which should only be abandoned in such exigencies, are not merely unnecessary, but in direct and deadly conflict with the principles of our government, and to their own permanent welfare.

The progress made in the development of these positions, appears in the preceding sketch of the past history and present state of the financial condition of the government. I have, I am confident, stated fully and honestly the assertion, that all the purposes for which this government was instituted have been accomplished during four years of greater pecuniary embarrassment than were ever before experienced in the history of our country. I have stated fully and honestly the assertion, that all the purposes for which this government was instituted have been accomplished during four years of greater pecuniary embarrassment than were ever before experienced in the history of our country. I have stated fully and honestly the assertion, that all the purposes for which this government was instituted have been accomplished during four years of greater pecuniary embarrassment than were ever before experienced in the history of our country.

If this view of the proceedings of the government, for the period it embraces, be warranted by the facts as they are known to exist; if the army and navy have been sustained in the most efficient manner by law, and which congress deemed sufficient for the defence of the country and the protection of its rights and its honor; if its civil and judicial service has been equally sustained; if ample provision has been made for the administration of justice and the execution of the laws; if the claims upon public gratitude in behalf of the soldiers of the revolution have been promptly met, and faithfully discharged; if there have been no failures in defraying the very large and increasing expenses of the long continued and salutary policy of peacefully removing the Indians to regions of comparative safety and prosperity; if the public faith has at all times, and every where, been most scrupulously maintained; if there has been no ground for any extended and diversified claims on the treasury;—if all these great and permanent objects, with many others that might be stated, have, for a series of years, marked by peculiar obstacles and difficulties, been accomplished, and the government has remained a permanent debt, or the aid of a national bank, have we not a right to expect that a policy, the object of which has been to sustain the public service independently of either of these fruitless sources of discord, will receive the final sanction of a people whose unbiased and fairly elicited judgment upon public affairs is never ultimately wrong?

That there is in the present condition of the individuals, of uneducated and unenlightened nations, have recently existed in this as in other commercial nations, is undoubtedly true. To suppose it necessary now to trace these reverses to their source, and which has been a reflection on the intelligence of my fellow citizens. Whatever may have been the obscurity in which the subject was involved during the earlier stages of the revulsion, there cannot now be many by whom the whole question is not perceived.

Not desisting it within the constitutional powers of the general government to repair private losses sustained by reverses in business having no connexion with the public service, either by direct appropriations from the treasury, or by special legislation designed to secure exclusive privileges and immunities to individuals or classes in preference to, and at the expense of, the great majority necessarily debarred from any participation in them, no attempt to do so has been either made, recommended, or encouraged, by the present executive.

It is believed, however, that the great purpose for the attainment of which the federal government was instituted, have not been lost sight of. Instructed by the experience of the past, and by legislation designed to secure exclusive privileges and immunities to individuals or classes in preference to, and at the expense of, the great majority necessarily debarred from any participation in them, no attempt to do so has been either made, recommended, or encouraged, by the present executive. It is believed, however, that the great purpose for the attainment of which the federal government was instituted, have not been lost sight of. Instructed by the experience of the past, and by legislation designed to secure exclusive privileges and immunities to individuals or classes in preference to, and at the expense of, the great majority necessarily debarred from any participation in them, no attempt to do so has been either made, recommended, or encouraged, by the present executive.

I have been strengthened too, in the propriety of this course, by the conviction that all efforts to go by, by the influence of the great money power, and distrust, to excite jealousies, and to provoke resistance. Instead of adding strength to the federal government, even when successful, they must ever prove a source of incurable weakness, by alienating the people, and destroying the confidence and the voluntary attachment, in its estimation, far more essential to the efficiency of a government strong in the best of all possible strength; the confidence and attachment of all those who make up its constituent elements.

Thus believing, it has been my purpose to secure to the whole people, and to every member of the confederacy, by general, salutary, and equal laws alone, the benefit of their representation, justice, and which it was the end and aim of the constitution to establish, and the impartial influence of which is, in my judgment, indispensable to their preservation. I cannot bring myself to believe that the lasting happiness of the people, the prosperity of the country, or the permanency of their union, can be maintained by giving preference or priority to any class of citizens in the distribution of benefits or privileges, or by any other means, which would sacrifice one portion of the union at the expense of another. I can see in the interference of the federal government with the local legislation and reserved rights of the states a remedy for present, or a security against future danger.

The first, and assuredly not the least, important step towards relieving the country from the condition into which it had been plunged by excesses in trade, banking, and credits of all kinds, was to place the business transactions of the country upon a solid basis; giving and receiving in all cases value for value, and neither countenancing nor encouraging in others that delusive system of credits from which it has been found so difficult to escape.

That the financial affairs of the government are now, and have been during the whole period of these wide-spread difficulties, conducted with a strict adherence to the principle of the equality of the principle, and that by the assumption and maintenance of the stand thus taken on the very threshold of the approaching crisis, more than by any other cause or causes whatever, the community at large has been shielded from the incalculable evils of

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The packet ship Columbia, at New York, brings Liverpool dates to the 9th Nov. two days later than our previous advices. Nothing of importance had transpired in the interim except the speech of Louis Philippe, which was considered satisfactory in all quarters. The tone of the public journals is extremely mild and conciliatory, and evinces a disposition to make every honorable concession for the purpose of preserving the peace of Europe. The king proclaims his love of peace, and appoints the representatives of the French nation to assist him in the maintenance of a blessing so essential to the common interests of Europe, to its people, and to the progress of civilization.

The effect of the king's speech of the king of France was favorable to the money market—consols and securities advanced.

Flour was dull—large arrivals from America—corn market supply supplied and the trade dull at previous rates.

AFRICA.

Governor Buchanan writes from Monrovia under date of 21th October, that the colony of Liberia was in an unusually healthy state, and every thing was prosperous and flourishing.

NETHERLANDS.

The prince of Orange, who has recently been advanced to the throne, by the voluntary abdication of his father, the king of the Netherlands, is 49 years of age. He was distinguished at the battle of Waterloo. Among the list of foreign stockholders in the Bank of the United States, as given by a committee of congress, is the prince of Orange as a holder of one million of dollars. [Newspaper Herald.

BRAZIL.

The trade of Brazil. It is stated that the statistics of the kingdom of Brazil, in South America, show that one half of the foreign importations into that country is furnished by Great Britain, while the other portion from the United States is only about one twentieth. Surely our merchants will be on the qui vive in this matter. [Philad. Inq.

BUENOS AYRES.

The affairs of this country says the correspondent of the Journal of Commerce, were in a very critical state, on the 20th Sept. an engagement was daily expected between the armies of gen. Rosas and Lavalle. I rode out the other day to the army, in company with capt. Ogden, of the U. S. ship Decatur. We expected the army with gen. Rosas, and some of his principal officers. The men look as if they will fight hard, and gen. Rosas has one fourth more men than gen. Lavalle, but the troops of the latter are said to be veterans, and the former are about half new. The army is about ten leagues from Buenos Ayres. The new French admiral, Mackay, arrived at Montevideo on the 23d of that month, with two frigates and a portion of the troops, and, on the arrival of the other vessels, would go up to Buenos Ayres. Gen. Lavalle had retreated some sixty leagues from his position in the vicinity of Buenos Ayres, and was expecting an attack from Oribe and the Buenos Ayres generals, whose united forces amounted to 6,000 men; his to 4,000. The latter states that governor Rosas has been tannishing his resistance among the Unitarios, 80 of whom had been shot, and a large amount of property confiscated.

TEXAS.

Galveston dates to 3d December, confirms the accounts in our list of the treacherous conduct of the federalists.

Many of the American volunteers had come in, having escaped from the pursuit of the centralists. One detachment of them retreated from Victoria to the eastern side of the Rio Grande, a distance the centralists, and travelling on one occasion almost ninety miles in twenty-four hours. Accounts had reached Houston, stating the arrival of the detachment under colonel Jordan at Laredo. A detachment of Mexican centralists, two hundred strong had crossed the Rio Grande and ventured into the limits of Texas as far as Aubrey's Banche, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the smuggling of tobacco was carried on, and that pointed in the west. They retired without any mischief, stating that they had strict orders not to molest any but those who were fighting for the federalists.

Major Howard had arrived at Austin from San Antonio. He reports the section of country through which he led his troops, as generally fertile, well watered and timbered. The Indians had crossed the Rio Grande, on the west side of which they had committed many depredations. An English merchant is in Galveston making arrangements to carry on the trade with Liverpool in the shipping of cotton and importation of merchandise. The proceedings of congress, now in session, show nothing of special interest. The French minister, Mr. De Saligny had been introduced to congress, and was received in the most flattering manner. The emigration to Texas seems to be rather on the increase than otherwise. During the last twelve months, it is estimated that ten thousand slaves were introduced.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

DIPLOMACY. His excellency the minister of Portugal, to reside at Washington, the commander De Figueiredo de Momo, his lady, six children and eight attendants, arrived in Baltimore on the 11th inst. The wife, from Rio de Janeiro, where he had experienced a severe and dangerous illness. The voyage was beneficial to him, but it is now confirmed by a rheumatic affection.

PRELIMINARY EXERCISES.

The general result in each state having been inserted, as in our last, we shall omit the table of aggregates until it can be inserted complete. Some few counties are yet to be inserted from Tennessee, Missouri and Mississippi.

GIVE US RECIPROCITY IN TRADE OR A DISCRIMINATING DUTY. A series of resolutions has been introduced into the Georgia senate, instructing the senators and requesting the representatives of that state in congress—to use their best efforts to have a law passed at the ensuing session of congress, to tax all French wines, silks and brandies, in proportion to the one which they lay upon our tobacco in their ports.

A PROTECTIVE TARIFF. We recur to this subject again, more however, for the purpose of placing before our readers a few facts connected with it. We last week placed before our views of our own. The subject is one of controlling importance, and destined in a short time to be one of general interest throughout the country, as well as of extended discussion in the national legislature. We last week placed before our readers a table of the exports and imports for the last fifteen years, and aimed to show that the reduction of the tariff of 1823 was the signal for excessive importation, as well as the commencement of a heavy debt contracted in Europe by American merchants. The excess of imports over the exports of the country is estimated to be the amount of the foreign debt due to Europe. We shall endeavor to show for what this debt has been contracted, and point out the beneficial effect of a renewal of the tariff act of 1823 would ensure to American industry. The total amount of imports into the U. S. during the year 1839 was $157,619,560. Of this sum $72,047,719 was admitted free of duty. Now let us see for what this last sum was paid to European merchants, and as we have no means of ascertaining the amount in 1839, we will take the year 1837 when the la-ports were about equal to 1839, the following table exhibits the different articles and the nature of each imported into the country during the year 1836, when the excess of the exports over the imports amounted to sixty million:

Article.	Value.
Cotton manufactures,	$17,790,157
Woolens,	12,735,430
Wines,	4,332,034
Spirits,	1,917,281
Tees,	5,342,811
Salt,	724,527
Molasses,	4,977,312
Iron and steel,	12,892,648
Crockery,	2,709,167
Silks,	22,980,214
Coffee,	9,653,033
Sugar,	12,514,718
Spices,	1,928,639
Lead,	67,321
Linens,	8,271,213
Hemp,	815,558

It will be seen by the above that we paid in 1839 $22,980,212 for the single article of silks. In 1839 the imports for the same article amounted to $22,980,212 and yet this article, which comes from France principally, and where our exports are admitted only under the most severe restrictions, comes into our ports free of duty. Need we say a word as to the importance of saving, by imposition of an adequate tariff, this immense expenditure to the nation, now that it is established beyond all question that we are as capable of producing the article of silk ourselves as any other country. Added to this, silk is an article of luxury almost exclusively, and an imposition of duties upon it would fall upon those most capable of bearing them.

But again. It will be seen that the amount of woolen goods brought into the country in 1836 was $12,735,430. In 1839, under the operation of the compromise bill, reducing still lower the duties on woolen goods, this article exceeded $13,000,000. This is so much drawn from the earnings of the country. It is so much paid by the manufacturers of this country to those of Europe, and operates as an onerous and oppressive burden upon our manufacturing sections of the union. In 1836 the cotton manufactures imported into the country amounted to near eighteen millions, and probably much exceeded that sum in 1839. This, too, is a heavy tax paid by this country to Europe. We pay also six millions to France for wines and spirits, while our government derives no revenue from this source.

But to whom do we pay tribute? The following exhibits the different countries from which the imports proceed, and the amount for each during the year 1836:

Great Britain and dependencies,	$86,022,915
France,	37,036,235
Spain,	19,815,690
Netherlands,	8,861,514
Sweden,	1,299,603
Denmark,	1,874,340
Portugal,	672,760
China,	7,254,816
Hanse Towns,	4,994,280
Russia,	2,778,554
Mexico,	5,615,819
Columbia,	1,686,650
Brazil,	7,210,190

During the same year we exported to

Great Britain,	64,487,550
France,	21,441,200
Spain,	8,951,968
Sweden,	700,260
China,	1,194,264
Hanse Towns,	4,663,882
Russia,	911,013
Brazil,	3,094,936

And leaving us indebted to

Great Britain,	21,535,065
France,	16,585,085
Spain,	11,264,022
Sweden,	589,217
China,	6,180,532
Hanse Towns,	330,938

$87,832,670

Showing an aggregate indebtedness to the above seven European governments, about equal to the whole excess of imports over the exports for that year. Now how is it to be paid? Does it use operate as a tax upon American industry? Is it not so much taken from the earnings of the people of this country and paid to producing classes of the old world? After examining the above table, we ask every one if it be not time for us to endeavor to interpose its prospective pressure and check the increasing amount of taxes we are paying to the monarchies of Europe? For ourselves rather than go on in the career which has marked our history for the last six or seven years, we much prefer to return to that system which prospered from 1821 to 1831, when the country went on prosperously, and when we were contracting no debts in foreign countries. The U. S. ship of war Decatur will at Buenos Ayres on the 29th September, to sail for Rio about the middle of December.

STATES OF THE UNION.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Message of governor Page.

Fellow citizens of the senate, and house of representatives:

In pursuance of an appointment in June last we are again assembled, charged with the high functions, and charged with the responsible duties of legislators. The full consideration of much of the important business then before the legislature was necessarily postponed to this time, and will doubtless receive that attention its importance demands.

Independent treasury. Since our last sitting, that long agitated and most important bill, establishing an independent United States treasury, has received the sanction of the legislative authority of the union, and become the law of the land. The influence of this measure will be felt in all directions in checking the great fluctuations in the nominal prices and value of property, so ruinous to industrial enterprise, by preventing the vast expansions and consequent contractions in the amount of paper money and by infusing a greater amount of the less variable, and universally appreciated and acknowledged measure of value, specie, into our medium of circulation. Its tendency will be to prevent suspension of specie payments by the banks, by compelling them to adhere to the regular and legitimate course of the business of banking, and to restrain expectation that while the revenues of the general government shall be paid in part or wholly in specie, they will be held to the performance of their chartered stipulations with the public, and be called to redeem at least partially, their resources to their holders, with the gold or silver their bills are supposed to represent. To this no bank can offer any valid or reasonable objection, and no solvent and properly conducted bank need fear it.

The withdrawal of the national funds from the custody of the banks, which funds are collected from the whole mass of our citizens for national and not for individual purposes, will also by lessening the means of temptation thereto keep in check that wild and reckless spirit of adventurous speculation, which meets with success only at the expense of the industries and frugal, and which has heretofore covered with disaster and embarrassment the whole length and breadth of our land.— Industry and economy will take the place of idleness and prodigality. Order and regularity in business will come, instead of the hurried and speculation which brings ruin and desolation instead of wealth, in its train. Our importations will be graduated to the actual demands for our consumption; the foreign debts of our merchants will be cancelled; trade will resume its regular and healthful course, and as a nation, we shall soon regain, and let us hope continue, in the path of solid prosperity and real independence. Nor is this all: the funds of the general government, the money of the nation will be under its own control, solely kept for its own legitimate use, the prompt satisfaction of all claims upon the national treasury in pursuance with legal appropriations therefor.

The disasters that have happened to our national revenue under the system of bank deposits, can never occur under the independent treasury system. Under the former, we have seen very large amounts of the national revenues deposited in the banks, when all, or nearly all those institutions refused to pay a single dollar in specie to redeem their bills.— We have seen our government, as a choice and well-obliged to resort to the issue of treasury notes with which to meet its liabilities for the want of those funds thus rendered unavailable through the delinquency of the banks depositors. Fortunately for our country it was in time of peace this disaster befell her; had it happened when we were at war with any of the powerful nations of Europe, the extent of the calamities that might probably have befallen her, can hardly be estimated. The experience of the past is the best guide for the future, and it is to admonish us to be prepared for every probable or possible emergency.

The public lands. Among the various subjects which will claim your attention at this time is a new and important factor, the public lands. This is made it equitable and just to all portions of the state will require much labor and patient investigation. I doubt not the subject will receive the early and persevering attention which its importance, as well as its direct regard to economy of time, demands.

Banks. Allow me here to repeat the recommendation made to you in June last, touching "the expediency of making it the duty of the bank commissioners within certain limited times to examine into the affairs of the banks, without being called upon by the governor for that purpose." Although it may be believed the condition of the banks generally in this state precludes suspicion of maladministration or fraudulent designs upon the public, yet the disclosures of the past year show that a bank may keep up its reputation abroad, commending credit with the public for an extensive circulation of its bills, while an investigation of its affairs at home would at once have exposed to view a condition almost and unsafe; and I cannot but believe your examinations made from time to time, as suggested, would at least have prevented such betrayals of public confidence, and the consequent public loss and embarrassment.

Agreeably to a resolution of the house of representatives of the 19th of June last, one of the bank commissioners has made an examination of the condition of the Wolfborough bank. His report of the result of his investigation which has been made public through the medium of the newspapers, will hereafter be specially communicated; as will for the same purpose, the report of another commissioner which is expected. (Made in pursuance of a resolution of the house of representatives of the 19th of June last), concerning the affairs of the Concord bank.

State prison. The state prison is now managed openly on account of the state. Essential alterations and repairs in the workshops, have been made by the present warden, new branches of manufactures have been introduced, and the convicts are all steadily and industriously employed. The government will be enabled to present to the public a never better than at the present time. The results of the labor of the convicts in a pecuniary point of view, we have had scarcely time to ascertain; but your labor is directed to those objects which afford the best prospect of success. The claims for the labor of convicts under the present management have been promptly met and cancelled. The present condition of the financial affairs of the prison will be hereafter communicated to you, and I indulge the hope, that with careful and energetic management, the jailors of the state will be enabled to make necessary purchases, the institution may be enabled to sustain itself, without additional charge upon the treasury, and also preserve the capital invested in its operations.

Criminal law and penitentiary system. The great object of our criminal laws and penitentiary system is to deter men from the commission of offences, by inflicting on them punishment to all offenders; and to protect society from the depredations of the lawless. The present system of punishment by temporary imprisonment, contemplates, not only punishment for the offence, but reclamation of the offender and the system recommends itself strongly to our sense of justice, as well as to our feelings of humanity. It may be readily seen on locking into our prisons and examining their inmates, that a large portion of them are young men, who have grown up with little parental care, instruction or advice, having never been taught the habits of industry, but allowed to remain idle and ignorant, the natural consequences have followed, and they have gradually sunk in the scale of depravity until at last they have met "the sharp rebuke of inflexible law." In the confinement of the felony cell. There, under the influence of a stern and rigid discipline, the convict has a chance left of redeeming himself. Reflection will force itself home upon him, and reformation may follow. He may, if he will, acquire some honest art of earning a livelihood, and when the term of his imprisonment shall induce him to practice it. Applications for pardon of convicts are of very frequent occurrence, before the term of imprisonment is nearly expired; the practice is believed to be attended with pecuniary efforts to bribe the convict to desert his prison restless and uneasy, under the groundless hope of a remission of part of the penalty annexed to his offence, which he should be taught to expect only, if at all, near the close of his adjudged term of confinement, and then only, in consideration of well-earned example, and apparent determination to lead an amended life.

Judicial system. The operations of our judicial system are matters of profound interest to all classes and conditions of our people. To render the system as efficient as possible, and to secure, as far as possible, within the limits of the constitution, is the appropriate duty of the legislature. The delays and consequent expense, experienced by litigants in our courts of law, have become proverbial. Whether it is to be ascribed to defects in our laws, or in the mode of administering them, I will not assume the province of judging; but whatever the cause may be, the expensive delays attending our administration of justice, is a subject of general complaint, especially in the larger cities of the state. The complaint, if well founded, all will agree, should meet with prompt attention from those who have been chosen by the people and made legislative guardians of the common welfare. In any constitutional remedial measures which the wisdom of the legislature may devise, I shall most cordially co-operate. And I beg leave to suggest for your consideration, the propriety and expediency of dividing some of the more extensive counties in the state, into two or more districts for judicial purposes.

The project of establishing an institution for ameliorating the condition of the suffering insane in New Hampshire, is a subject of intense interest to very many of our people; the success of which every philanthropist will sincerely desire. The general principle of humanity, the unfortunate condition of the class of persons for whom relief is sought, more especially if the bills of pauperism be added to loss of reason, and it may be said, and perhaps truly, the honor of the state, press this subject upon our consideration with almost irresistible force.

If pauperism presents a claim to the charities of the people, which civilized and Christian communities always allow, the relief given being restricted only by the necessity for it, then, indeed, justice as well as a wise and prudent charity seem to urge the grant of a like measure of relief, if possible, in cases when to the strong claims of poverty, are added the fearfully interesting and still stronger claims of insanity. It is to be hoped that the trustees of the state hospital, if enabled in their report (to be made to the legislature at its present session, agreeably to an act passed in June last), to show such reasonable grounds of hope, for its ultimate success in the undertaking, as will command for it the cordial assent of the legislature.

Geological survey. The geological survey of the state under the direction of Dr. Jackson, the state geologist, assisted by Messrs. Williams, Whitney and Baker, has students, has been in progress during the past season. It would be a great advantage if it could be continued in some form, as it has been perfected in one season. It is believed, however, that a mass of interesting information has been collected, and many valuable discoveries of minerals made. A large number of specimens have been collected, and deposited in the state cabinet, and other specimens and assays are now undergoing the test of analysis and assay in the laboratory. Next season it is proposed to take up the survey of all the towns in regular and due order, complete the geological map, and to expect that the report for the year will be as timely as usual. I am informed by the geologist that he will be able to make his first annual report during the coming winter. Interesting and valuable results are expected from this survey; to insure these, it is requested that the survey should be carried out thoroughly and completely in accordance with the enlightened and liberal policy of the legislature with which the plan originated.

I doubt not it will be your desire to limit the expenses of the session, by its termination at as early a day as may be consistent with a due consideration of the important business now before the legislature; in the adoption of such measures as shall promote the best interests and prosperity of our constituents I shall most cheerfully co-operate.

MISCELLANEOUS ARTICLES.

THOUGHTS AFTER ELECTION. For young women. The heats of election time are over, and we think it might be well for us to look about us for something with which to occupy the minds of our restless population. During the long winter evenings our working men need something to take the place of the calculations, the arguments, the wages and the worry war about Van Buren and Harrison. We have had our pagents, our weasens fire, our salutes and our treats; it is time to sit down to the quiet enjoyments of the season.

And a blessed season it is after all. Spring, summer and autumn have each their appropriate delights; and these are mostly enjoyed under the blue heavens and in the balmy air; but winter, eleventh winter, is the time for in-door comfort, the quest of knowledge and the flow of affection. They may talk of it, but who does not know that the yearning tenderness of young hearts put forth their claspings tenderly most lustily between Thanksgiving day and the return of the blue bird? Now, when uly days begin to throw their dancing flames over the snug sitting room when the piping of the viol tells how close the house is; when Jack frost drives the rosy children to wait about the father's knee, or roll half asleep upon the rug; now is the time when the working man, who has not been of cattily gifts, a wife, and abundance of little olive oil, will, as his tale, learn fully what is meant by the happy syllable, home.

The rivals of our home are many and fearful.—Among the direst is the drinking place, whether known as porter house, grog shop or tavern. The man who spends his evenings in these stygian fumes, soon grovels and wallows away half his civilization. Where ought he to be, but by his own warm fireside, rewarding his wife for the solitary labors and vexations of the day, and receiving on his own part those clear but invaluable pleasures, which are as much above the delirium and rhabdomy of the bar room, as the light of day is above the glimmer of a dipped candle. I am no enemy to tavern keepers. They use good sense, their own friends are not strangers to the stranger and the traveler ought to be remembered and repaid, but they ought likewise to be freed from the horrible enormities which proceed from their phials of madness and death. The worst effects of ill conducted taverns are felt, not by the wandering man, for whose behoof the inn is instituted, but the throng of villagers and neighbors, who have, or who ought to have, homes of their own, who need no tavern, and who seek shelter from their love, from love of excitement, or from beastly appetite.

Go into any town, and abide for a few days at one of these mans of alcoholic temptation. Mark the men who from day to day enter the ever open doors. Some are there for hours, some at frequent intervals; some are maddened by the state of affairs either in the lazing upon the porch. You have before you the representatives of the indolence, the loquacity, the mischief, the mischief making, and the insolvency of the place. Is there one of them who drives a handsome business? Is there one of them who wears his own earnings on his back? Not one. Is there one of them who is reputed for philanthropy, public spirit, or successful talent, in any department? Not one. Is there one of them who enjoys the sobriety, the clear spirits and the ray line of health? Not one. That increasing plethora and sluggish growth is not the sign of strength. The cheek is flabby and the hand is soft. That redness of the eye and nose is not the color of genuine health. That snoring and final laugh is not the sign of a healthy mind. That radiance of the face before the tavern becomes a sludge.

Al! if that bar room could be adjured to testify, if those books, redolent of brandy and spiced with the marks of many a tumbler, could be put to the question, if, after every name, you could read the history of the drunkards who have dropped one by one, how would the hideous revelation save the very not for his swinish indulgence! The spell, however, is not broken, because the true Lethe is ever near. The first touch of consciousness is quelled by brandy and water. Hence it is, that the tavern brawler is often hopeless. He drinks till he feels himself half ruined; he is wretched; he drinks to drown his wretchedness; he does drown it, and his soul along with it. Oh hapless youth! before he gets to the break away, by a sudden, an agonizing effort or you will be the victim.

The brandy house and home are antagonistic powers—deadly foes, irreconcilable rivals. If you wish to exult in a man's house and break his own wife's heart, introduce him to his own house. You can give him pleasure of attraction at home, the drinking place will have none. Has he a virtuous, sensible, intemperate, comely, loving wife, and endeavoring father? No matter. His leisure hours are not for them, but for the loungers at the bar and pool. He will assign business, or the expectation of a review, or a visit to a customer, or any one of a thousand pretexts to take him and to keep him there. There he is, at noon and at night, and on the Sabbath. Until habit has steeped him, he sneaks thence. Given leader, he becomes a fixture of the establishment. Every drinking place has its retinue of attendants, known to every passer by. The tavern sign is not more familiar than the tavern signs. Homeless creatures! each of whom in some bright or humble sphere, might have been enjoying such innocent delight, around the domestic altar, as could make this world a type of paradise!

To young men, beginning life—especially to newly married men, the counsel is reasonable. Reverence the fireside. Admit no rival there. Let your chief joys be shared by her whose fate has forsaken all other trials and hopes for you, by those who must labor, hour or disgrace from your course of life. Sit in the bar room and purloins of intoxication. It is to thousands the avenue to infamy. Help to rid those industrious men who preside over public houses, and succumb to the need and necessity of leading some men into drunkenness and drunks into despair—help to rid them of this unpleasant part of their office.—They pocket their grief for these results. You cannot but believe so. Help them to wash their hands of the horrible sin.

[Newark Daily Advertiser.]

REPORT OF THE D'HAUTEVILLE CASE. We have received from Philadelphia a large volume of two hundred and ninety-five pages, octavo, containing a full report of the D'Hauteville case, in relation to which so much has been said and published during the last two or three years. Legal proceedings were commenced in this matter last summer, upon a writ of habeas corpus, before the judges of the court of general sessions for the county of Philadelphia. The hearing lasted several weeks, and the case was conducted with much ability by W. B. Reed, J. M. Scott, and J. R. Ingersoll, for the relator. Mr. D'Hauteville, and J. Caldwell and W. M. Meredith, equires, for the respondent, Madame D'Hauteville. The opinion of the court was delivered by judge Barton on the 14th inst. and was in favor of the respondent.

It appears, that in the year 1837, Mr. David Sears, a highly respectable and wealthy citizen of Boston, Mrs. Sears and several of their children, among whom was the respondent, made a visit to Europe. While in Paris, the latter became acquainted with the relator, Mr. D'Hauteville. The respondent, then Miss Ellen Sears, was a beautiful girl of about eighteen, possessing an intellect elegantly cultivated, and the most refined manners. D'Hauteville was a young gentleman of about twenty-five years of age, a native of the same land. He was the son of very respectable parents. His father had lived near Geneva. After a short acquaintance between the parties, Mr. D'Hauteville made proposals of marriage to Miss Sears, which were at first rejected. These proposals were, however, renewed, and after the arrangement of some preliminary touching pecuniary affairs, they were married.—The marriage took place at Montreux, in August, 1837. It seems that almost immediately after they were united, difficulties arose between them, and the time which the respondent spent in Europe, previous to leaving her husband to visit her father's family in Boston, was a season of great unhappiness. In the early part of 1838, Madame D'Hauteville, with the consent of her husband, came to this country on a temporary visit. Since her arrival here, however, owing, as she alleges, to some views expressed in letters from her husband written to her father and herself, she became fixed in a determination not to return. On the 27th of September, 1838, she made public notice of her marriage, was born in Boston. In the month of July, 1839, the relator came to this country, and has since been engaged in fruitless endeavors to regain his wife and child.

From the allegations of the respondent it is satisfactorily shown, that the marriage of Madame D'Hauteville was a sacrifice, the result of an unwillingness, on her part, to recede from an ill-considered engagement, into which in extreme youth, she had imprudently allowed herself to be drawn, and with which she afterwards complied, under the influence of a mistaken sense of duty. That she would not have thus complied, or been married to the relator at all, if she had not been assured that her father would not be opposed upon points which she deemed necessary to her happiness and welfare, and which she did not then consider her wishes as unreasonable. That from the moment of their marriage, Mr. D'Hauteville deemed himself absolved from all obligations of engagements, and that he had, in consequence of ill-treatment, many of them committed in total disregard of the feelings and interests which had formed the subjects of his engagements before marriage, and by a continued system of oppression, made his wife's situation insupportable, to such a degree that her life and her reason were threatened, and had in some measure sunk under the weight of her oppressions, until her soul fled from the scene of them because, under medical advice, indispensable. That she came from Europe, accordingly, under his assurance, and in the belief, that he would at least endeavor to open the way for an improvement in her condition.

That in this expectation she was disappointed, and that on the contrary, his letter of the 21st of July, 1838, presented as the only condition of her return, such terms, as would have insured, the refusal and continuance of her stay in a great degree than before, and in a degree which it would have been beyond her strength to have borne. That the impression thus produced upon her, in connection with the past, is one of incurable alienation, and results in the loss of any remaining affection for him, and in the conviction, that the incompatibility between them is irreconcilable, without the total extinguishment of feelings and sympathies which she has not the strength, and which it is not her duty to abandon. That her return to his society could not take place without a renewal of the state of health of mind and body, under which she had sunk when her return to the United States first became necessary, and that, in consequence of her feelings and of her power of future endurance, she could not perform to him the duties of a wife, and therefore cannot return to him.

These facts are clearly and cogently proved in the respondent's answer by the testimony of the parties and the testimony of the witnesses. Out of his own mouth Mr. D'Hauterville is proved to be a selfish, priggish, bigoted, tyrannical and cold-hearted young man, who has not been let loose from the apron strings of his mother, and who has not the heart or the soul to appreciate the excellencies of his young, beautiful and self-sacrificing wife. The fellow appears to have been disappointed in regard to the pecuniary arrangements of the marriage, for he told his wife that he had expected a more liberal sum, saying that he had been much sought after, and could have married the richest lady in Switzerland.

The dominant fault of his character appears to have been morbid jealousy, not the offspring of affection, but arising from a desire of exclusively appropriating every thing to self, and a consequent unwillingness to permit the most harmless and innocent association with others. The mother and sister of Mrs. D'Hauterville were the victims of this foolish jealousy. And here we take the opportunity to remark, that throughout the whole of this unhappy affair, Mrs. Sears, the mother of the respondent, appears not only wholly blameless, but evidently struggled, with all the means of moral and natural affection and the patience and forbearance of a Christian matron, to bear the differences between her son-in-law and daughter. Notwithstanding she was treated with insupportable rudeness both by Mr. D'Hauterville and his worthy mamma, Mrs. Sears appears to have borne every thing uncomplainingly for the sake of her child.

Among those, upon whom Mr. D'Hauterville looked with an eye of especial jealousy, were his wife's countrymen and countrywomen, the acquaintances of her early days, whom they frequently met during the winter and spring which followed her marriage, for whom and whose customs he seemed, on all occasions, to entertain a strong dislike, the result of prejudice and morbid jealousy, concealed before marriage. After the departure of her father from Europe, neither Mr. D'Hauterville nor any of his family who shared with him those prejudices, were at any pains to conceal them. He would not treat her countrymen and countrywomen, or her young friends whom they met, with common civility. On one occasion he received a letter from his wife's eldest sister, a married lady, from whom she had been separated longer than from any other member of her family, and who, in answer to his request, he had written about the time of their marriage. This letter was her sister's reply. It was the first intelligence received from her after her marriage. She eagerly asked to see, and earnestly desired to read it. He refused to let her look at it, or to state what it contained, giving no reason whatever, except that he desired to keep his letters to himself, and he begged she would never ask to see any letters from any of her family to him. She shed tears of disappointment and he sought him, in every manner that she could, to let her know what her sister said, to which he only replied by locking it up in his desk; she never saw this letter again.

Mr. D'Hauterville's ideas of the necessity of female subjection to the more powerful sex, are worthy of Blue Beard himself, and such as no one but a tyrant and a fool would attempt to enforce in this enlightened age, when woman has been elevated to the equality of a reasonable companion to man. One of the lady's first lessons took place about a fortnight after her marriage, and it was illustrative of the discipline to which she was subjected. Her mother and sister were about to drive in their carriage, and she proposed to accompany them. She mentioned her wish to her husband, who consulted her with one with his mother, and she said, she must remain at home. He told her that she had not asked him properly, in French, saying said, "Je veux aller," "I wish to go, or 'I will go.'" Instead of "Je desire d'aller," "I desire to go." What a pragmatic fool!

If he chanced to take the wrong seat at table, or to violate any of the numerous ceremonies prevailing at his father's house, she was reproved for it in a manner impressively offensive, and the body of a young man would look on appalling, and see his young foreign wife, who had sacrificed so much for him, treated with the rudeness of a menial. The scriptural studies of Mr. D'Hauterville likewise appear to have been somewhat extensive. He undertook to support his views in regard to marital authority by quotations from the Bible. Of the character of his lessons, the tendencies may be seen in certain verses, to which he called his wife's attention in a letter written in the month which followed her departure for America, some of which are as follows:

1 Corinthians, xii. 8, 9, 11.

3d. But I will have you know that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of every woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God.

8th. For the man is not of the woman, but the woman is of the man.

9th. Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man.

11th. Nevertheless, neither is the man without the woman, neither the woman without the man, is the Lord.

Ephesians, v. 21.

Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing.

1 Tim. ii. 11, 12, 13, 14.

11th. Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection.

12th. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence.

13th. For Adam was first formed, then Eve.

14th. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression.

1 Peter, iii. 5, 6.

5th. For after this manner in the old time, the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands.

6th. Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord; whose daughters ye are, as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement.

We have given but few specimens of D'Hauterville's unfeeling conduct, but can refer our readers to the voluminous history of the case in this report, with the assurance, that they can not fail to rise from the perusal with no very great respect for the qualities either of his head or his heart.

The letters of Mrs. D'Hauterville, written as most of them were at the age of seventeen, convey a most exalted idea of her character, her intellect, and her superior worth. Their simple and serene style presents a remarkable contrast to the cold, artificial, caustic letters of her husband.

We select the following letter from Mrs. D'Hauterville to her father, more for its brevity than its superiority to the other specimens of her correspondence:

Ellen S. D'Hauterville to her father, on his departure for America, written six weeks after her marriage.

"Hauterville, August 50.

"The time approaches, my dear father, when we must separate, and I cannot bear the thought that weeks and months must pass away before we may meet again; for I shall not be able to write you."

I see you have as I cannot but feel to the quick that heart-breaking feeling, that the cord is being severed which binds me to my home, that I am no longer, as it were, one of you, and that henceforth I shall not be there to participate in your joys and sorrows, as you have so sincerely done in mine.

My dear father, from my heart I thank you for your increasing kindness and sympathy in all that I have suffered. You have often soothed my regrets, and softened the bitterness of heart, which has sometimes stolen over me. Do not believe that in future, I shall allow myself to give way to any of those feelings which, were I assure you would disapprove. On the contrary, I shall find my happiness in being able to see that of General and of Mrs. D'Hauterville. God will not leave me unwarded. At times, I cannot prevent myself from looking back with sadness to the vacant seat which is left in my own delightful home, I have the consolation of knowing that I have not dined from the path which I knew to be right, and that I deserve your approbation and your blessings; this thought will sustain me through many dark moments. The recollection of the happiness which you have been the means of bestowing upon me, during the whole course of my life, which has never been staided with a single cloud, with I am sure, or at all, or for, give you great pleasure, and it is a thought which is of great comfort to me, that the intercourse between us has been so marked by constant love and affection. Tell my dearest Anna and Horrie my heart's desires to see them soon. I understand that we may not long be separated, but I cannot prevent my tears from falling fast when I think of them. Tell them dear father, how I have suffered, and they will pity my distress, and not think I have deceived them, which is a thought I cannot bear. Farewell—my prayers will follow you by sea and by land. Bless your child, dearest father, when you are far away, and sometimes recall the devotion of your attached daughter. (Signed) ELLEN S.

Our naming add to Mr. D'Hauterville, is to hurry back to his anxious mamma with all possible expedition, and never to stray out of the reach of her anxious arms until she gives him permission to put off his swaddling clothes.

REPORT ON THE FINANCES, FROM THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY ON THE STATE OF THE FINANCIAL TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 7, 1840.

The undersigned respectfully submits to congress the following report on the finances:

He has great pleasure in announcing that during the year ending on the 1st of January, 1840, the revenue reduced; and, though the revenue has not proved so large as usual, all the public engagements have been met with promptitude.

1. The receipts and means for 1840, exclusive of treasury notes, are as follows:

The available balance in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1840, is computed to have been $2,246,749 00

The data on which this conclusion is based, are connected with the actual receipts and expenditures in 1839, and with the unavailability of a portion of the public funds, may be seen in the statement annexed.

During the first three quarters of the present year, the net receipts in treasury notes were 10,689,824 75

During the same period, the net disbursements from lands were 2,659,217 25

Miscellaneous receipts for the same time 77,660 88

Estimated receipts for the fourth quarter from all these sources 3,300,000 00

These make the aggregate of ordinary receipts for the year $17,197,762 01

Add the estimated receipts of principal and interest on the 1st of Jan. 1840, of what was due from former deposit banks, but not available on the 1st of Jan. 1840 $850,000 00

Add also the estimated receipts from the fourth quarter from the United States bank 2,500,000 00

Do. from the issue of treasury notes, instead of others redeemed 5,440,000 00

Aggregate of these additional sources $8,790,000 00

This make the total means in 1840, as ascertained and estimated $28,234,312 01

It is proper to remark, that about $700,000 of the sums computed to be received within the year, from the banks above described, have not yet been received to the 1st of Jan. 1840, but, in conformity to expectation, there should be allowed to pay any part of them until next year, it will make a difference to that extent in the preceding results.

II. The expenditures for 1840, exclusive of trusts and the post office, have been as follows:

For the first three quarters, civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous	$1,118,218 64
For the same time, military	8,730,784 52
For the same time, naval	4,620,316 35
Estimated by this department (though higher by the others) for all expenses during the fourth quarter	5,000,000 00

These make the aggregate of current expenses, for the whole year

$22,489,349 51

Add for funded debt and interest for that of the cities of the District of Columbia, during the year, ascertained and estimated

100,000 00

Redemption of treasury notes, including principal and interest, as contained during the first three quarters

3,629,306 61

Estimate of notes that will be redeemed in the fourth quarter

425,000 00

This will make the aggregate of payments of or expenditures of all kinds

$26,618,653 12

Leaving an available balance of money in the treasury on the 31st Dec. 1840, computed to be

The funds on hand, considered not available for public purposes, at the commencement as well as at the present year, are described particularly in the statement annexed.

Previous to the close of the year, should congress pass any new appropriations which may be immediately expended, an additional charge to that extent will thus be imposed on 1840; and if amounting to any considerable sum, it might prudently be accompanied by some provision of new means sufficient for its payment.

III. The condition of the public debt next demands consideration.

An exhibit of the particulars of it, whether funded or unfunded, and of the payments made within the year on account of both, is annexed.

Probably none of the former kind of debt exists now in our country, except what has been incurred, or the evidence of it mislaid, as all ever claimed, whether incurred in the revolution, or since, has been promptly discharged. It is fortunate that no new debt of a permanent character has been recently created by the general government, and the undervalued, for reasons formerly explained, which need not be here repeated, has uniformly considered it sound policy never to incur one in time of peace. But it will be recollected that congress, by an act passed in May, 1836, engaged to pay the interest on the interest-bearing payment of a debt due from the cities of the District of Columbia to certain individuals abroad.

The principal amount of £ 1,500,000, and it was to be paid in yearly instalments of $60,000 each, beginning the 1st of January, 1841. But the interest was payable quarterly, and, during the last four years, has been regularly discharged by the treasury.

Within this past year, notice has been received from the agent of the creditors that payment of the first and subsequent instalments of the principal is desired to be made, when due, with punctuality. To insure a compliance with that wish, it will be necessary, besides meeting the interest quarterly, to advance $60,000 of the principal at the commencement of the ensuing year, and the residue must be paid, in like amounts, annually hereafter, till the whole is discharged.

The canal stocks, assigned to secure these payments, can, by the terms of the agreement, be sold to aid in reimbursing them. But, in the first instance, the money is to be taken from the treasury, under existing laws, which appropriate sufficient to discharge all outstanding debts; and a sale, if able to make the advance, will probably be at a great sacrifice. Congress may, therefore, in its wisdom, think further legislation on the subject expedient.

This is all the funded debt not due, and likewise all of it not paid, except as, before explained, the intolerable portion has never yet demanded.

In respect to the unfunded debt, such small sums as were created prior to 1837, and still remain unpaid, must, it is presumed, be in that condition some accident, which has prevented a request to be made for payment.

Nor has any of it, which was incurred since, fallen due, without being discharged whenever claimed.

The whole balance of the four emissions of treasury notes since October, 1837, which was outstanding on the 1st instant, amounted only to $4,433,822. This is but $1,675,498 more than that the close of 1839, notwithstanding the great decline in our revenue since, and the unexpectedly large expenditures of all appropriations connected with the Florida war, and the further adjustment of claims in behalf of the United States.

Had these events not happened, less even than that amount of notes would have been issued, and the treasury might, with ease, have redeemed within the year the amount that was outstanding.

It could have done the same, with most of them, had congress, at the last session, passed the declaratory act concerning the tariff, modified the system of drawbacks to correspond with existing laws, and adopted the propositions made for gradually increasing the price of the public lands, as well as forming new land districts.

It must be gratifying to learn, however, that though incommoded by the failure of those measures, and the unexpected circumstances before enumerated, the department has been enabled, by other means under its control, to redeem every note presented, and to pay, with punctuality, all debts that have fallen due.

The success of the general government has thus been preserved so rich, that, instead of sacrificing its securities at large discounts, as in this and foreign nations some have been compelled to do with public stocks, the treasury notes have continued at the close of the year, to be at a premium of 7 per cent, and subject even to the stoppage of that rate, sixty days' notice.

In fine, on a review of the whole subject, our situation respecting a public debt of any kind will be found a most improved one. Regardless of an indication—either of the good state of the national credit, or of the ample resources of the general government, or of the discreet legislation relative to its fiscal concerns, it will be difficult to discover many areas more prosperous in the respect, whether in the annals of this or any other country.

IV. The exports and imports within the year ending September 30, 1840, exhibit several striking peculiarities. While the foreign commerce of the country continues the chief basis of the revenue of the general government, and is indicative of the extent of our surplus produce, the statistical returns in relation to the subject must excite constant attention among statesmen and political economists, as they are so important to the nation.

The exports during the year are computed to have been $131,971,930. This amount is quite $10,512,351 more than in 1839, notwithstanding the reduced price of some of our great staples, and is larger than ever existed before in our history. Of the whole exports, only $17,809,333 were of foreign origin. This left those of domestic origin at $114,702,617, being $6,543,937 more than in any previous year.

During 1840 were about 104,805,891 dollars. This shows the great falling off from the previous year of $37,286,241. It furnishes, likewise, the principal explanation of the extraordinary diminution which has occurred in the revenue from customs; a diminution, however, which has been caused in part, by evasions of the laws, new judicial constructions left uncorrected, and the payment of too large sums for bounties and drawbacks, under an omission in the existing tariff to reduce them in the case of goods reduced in price.

The difference between our exports and imports has usually been in favor of the latter. Several years ago it ranged that way about seven millions of dollars annually; but of late, the average has been in our favor, and in 1839, the excess of imports having been, in 1836 even, $61,316,993, and in 1839, $11,063,716. But during 1840, the extraordinary occurrence of a reverse in this state of things has taken place. Such a circumstance as this, except the case of the imports, is believed to have happened previously only six times since the constitution was adopted; and then, never to an extent beyond $7,916,513. Now, however, with, under any inflation, and in some important articles with a great increase of price, the excess of imports is not only more than ever was known before, but quite fivefold greater, being computed to equal $26,766,039.

This excess having failed to produce the usual corresponding increase of imports, but, on the contrary, having been accompanied by a diminution never previously equalled in amount, except under the influence of the embargo in 1809, the whole matter furnishes another proof of the hazardous fluctuations of the commerce of our country, which congress has been requested so repeatedly to guard against by some permanent provision.

It is also a strong illustration of the probability of the conjecture expressed in the last annual report, that the country had become alarmingly in-debt abroad, in part on ordinary mercantile credit, but chiefly on stocks of corporations and states.

To meet what would soon be in demand alone, it was then supposed would require twelve or thirteen millions of the exports; and which, in that event, would of course furnish no returns in return. It is, therefore, most follow yearly, that the old stocks are redeemed, unless new ones can, for some time longer, be sold; and the difficulty too deferred, though merely at the expense of increasing the evils which ultimately attend them.

But it is a source of great satisfaction to witness the indications which the unprecedented amount of exports, during the last four years, has given of the continued prosperity of the country.

Notwithstanding some depression in particular branches of business, or in particular places, the general prosperity has been such as to create a large surplus of products, and to enable us to send abroad immense and increased values of them, however great the complaints have been as to low prices.

These official records are some of the most authentic tests of truth, amidst contradictory conjectures on topics like these. They show that we have been able to spare, in exports of domestic production during the last four years, more than $89,720,000 in value; which in our previous term of that length, since the adoption of the constitution, have they exceeded $339,417,622. Except in the last two series of four years, they have never gone beyond $239,576,201, and in the last series, only $197,187 to 1819. The whole tonnage of the country has also advanced within the four years past, more than 20,000 tons.

Seldom, indeed, if ever, has the navigating interest, one of our great exports of our sailing and increased commerce, been so prosperous as within the last twelve months.

It is true that a portion of the increase in exports may be attributable to some alteration in the habits of the community, not connected with additional wealth.

The disposition in families to rely less on their own resources, and obtain more by means of mercantile exchanges abroad as well as at home, has, without doubt, not, grown more rapidly of late years than formerly, and tended to augment both the imports and exports beyond what the real increase in the amount of products would indicate. Yet the great excess of exports during the last few years, and those of the last four years, are so far from these circumstances. Granting, however, that some of it has, the consequences to that extent, and in another view of the subject, are not so well calculated to excite gratification. The increased dependence which the change of habits, in selling and buying so much more of what is consumed, has occasioned between different countries and those engaged in different avocations, as well as the increased credit thus demanded through many new ramifications of our commerce, combined with other causes, most every pursuit to the evils attendant on fluctuations in prices, on bank expansions, and revolutions in commerce, have probably exercised an influence on the events of the last four years not inconsiderable nor salutary. Combined with other causes, it must certainly have tended to create a wide and unfavorable alteration in public manners; and may, in time, inflict an injury on the morals and character of the nation, which will more than counterbalance all the gain to the nation.

V. The estimates of the receipts and expenditures for 1841 next demanded attention.

The actual receipts and expenditures in that year can, of course, be so regulated by congress, through new legislation, as to be as near as possible to what may deem proper. But the undersigned can neither increase nor diminish them; though a duty is devolved on him, in respect to the subject, while at the head of the treasury, which he now proceeds to perform, of presenting some opinion concerning the amounts to which, under the existing laws, and the calls of the different departments, they are likely to attain.

He will further suggest any general changes which may appear to him expedient, as well as any new means deemed necessary to meet all the business, which, it is apprehended, may be imposed.

The estimates for the ordinary receipts and expenditures in the ensuing year differ some millions from what will be actually received and expended in the present one.

It is calculated, however, that the difference will be what is always most desirable—some increase of the receipts, and a further diminution of the expenditures.

The estimates for the latter, in the present year, were made less than those of 1839; and the results have corresponded. Indeed, it is a cause of much gratification that the expectations before mentioned, of materially reducing the public burdens, have been verified to so great an extent. Thus, the expenses of 1838 fell below those of 1837; while the expenses of 1839, notwithstanding the continuance of the Florida war, were nearly eight millions below those of 1838; and it is expected that the expenses of 1840 will be from two to three millions still lower, or quite ten millions less than those of 1838.

They would have been nearly twelve millions less, had not that war continued, and unusually large payments been made to Indians, under old appropriations.

It is believed that the ordinary expenses of 1841 ought to fall some millions below those in 1840; as the pensions have diminished by deaths, fewer Indians remain to be removed, several extensive public buildings have been mostly finished, and hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close.

More details concerning the estimates for the next year will be proper, and will illustrate the correctness of some of the preceding results.

It may be stated, from the best data in possession of this department, the receipts, under the existing laws, will probably be as follows:

From customs,	$19,000,000
From lands,	5,500,000
Miscellaneous,	50,000
Add the expected balance in the treasury, available on the 1st Jan. next,	1,580,855

The aggregate of ordinary means for the next year would then be

24,160,855

There will be nothing more, either of principal or interest, due from banks, which is likely to be made available, except about

220,000

A power will exist under the act of 21st March, 1840, to issue treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars.

This will furnish additional means equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, being about

Hence, there may be added, from these several sources, so much as to make the whole means for the next year

24,723,473

On the other hand, the expenditures for 1841 for ordinary purposes, if Congress make no new appropriations required by the different departments, are estimated at

19,250,000

This would leave a balance in the treasury, at the close of this year, equal to 5,473,473

But certain payments must also be made on account of the funded and unfunded debt, unless Congress enter into contracts to be forborne, extending the time of their payment. Thus there will be required—

On account of the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District

119,200

For the redemption of treasury notes, if all the others be issued, which can be under the present law, as then the amount returned within A. D. 1841 will probably not exceed

$19,250,000

Estimated balance in the treasury at the close of the next year, after all payments whatsoever

$824,273

Thus it will be seen that if the whole of these charges, both ordinary and extraordinary, should be required to be extinguished in 1841, the estimated means will be sufficient for that purpose, but may not, besides, leave so large a balance in the treasury as is convenient, and thus tends to obtruding any difficulty which might arise from that circumstance will soon be considered by itself.

For some further general view of the grounds of the estimate of the expenditures for 1841, it will be necessary to advert a few moments to the new and old appropriations from which those expenditures are to be made.

The new ones, proposed by the different departments for the service of 1841, amount to $16,621,320 28.

Viz: civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous,	$3,450,740 13
Military,	7,725,440 91
Naval,	5,445,139 21

Besides these, certain permanent appropriations under existing laws will become chargeable on the treasury during the next year, in sums as follows:

For ordinary purposes.

Military,	$584,000
Public debt, including interest and first instalment in the District of Columbia,	149,200
Redeeming treasury notes,	4,500,000

These would make the new charges, for ordinary purposes, under both new and permanent appropriations, amount to $17,455,520 28. But, including the public debt and the redemption of treasury notes, these charges would be $22,124,720 28.

It will be perceived, therefore, that the aggregate of actual expenditures during 1841 has been computed to be $17,764,480 higher than the estimated amount of new and permanent appropriations—This is not only not only because small overruns have doubtless occurred in the latter, and unavoidable omissions, as will be seen by the notes, but some new private bills, granting money, may be passed by Congress, and a greater proportion of the appropriations may be expended than the law (though reduced as much as three or four millions less than at the end of 1839) may be expended in 1841, than will be left unexpended of the new charges imposed. These last two items are usually computed to exceed the law. The departments calculate that $8,661,123 of the old appropriations will be required to complete the purposes originally contemplated by them.

They propose only to apply about $3,748,904 of them to the service of the ensuing year, without reappropriation; and the residue, amounting to $4,912,219, is expected will go to surplus fund. They estimate the whole of them at the close of the year to be $10,549,905.

VI. A few more explanations of other grounds for the estimate of receipts and expenditures for the next year may be useful.

It will be noticed that the estimates for both are founded principally on the existing laws. Should Congress, therefore, alter the tariff, so as to increase or reduce the duties, the expected amount of receipts must of course be varied in that proportion. So it must be if Congress make any essential change in respect to the public lands, and either passes a graduation bill, and creates new land districts which surveys are ready for large sales, as this would increase the immediate receipts, or, on the other hand, it should distribute the proceeds of the sales among the states, as Congress has done, the revenue applicable to the purposes of the general government, and render a resort to new taxation, an increased tariff, or a loan, indispensable, to the extent of the distribution.

On the contrary, the reductions in business which have been lessened somewhat, because the importation of certain articles paying a duty, will, in 1841, be partially postponed to 1842, in consequence of the great reduction in the tariff on them which will take place in the latter year under the existing laws.

So have they been on account of the greater proportional bounties and drawbacks which are now returned on several articles, and some beneficial operation anticipated from the independent treasury.

On the contrary, the reductions in business which have occurred since the middle of 1839, and which affected the revenue of some other countries as well as our own, and the protracted suspension of specie payments by many of the banks, which has continued over a large part of the United States since October of that year, will probably terminate soon, by the salutary reaction of great commercial principles; and that event must be accompanied by a considerable increase of imports and duties. The amount of the latter, therefore, has been estimated higher than that of the actual receipts to the present year, but not so high as they were in 1839 by about ten millions, nor so high as many anticipate they will be. But if the banks do not speedily resume, it is to be feared that the estimate will prove larger in fact than in theory, and thus tends to obtruding any difficulty which might arise from that circumstance will soon be considered by itself.

The revenue from lands must continue to be lower under the present laws than might otherwise be expected because that portion of the vast sales in 1835 and 1836 which were made to speculators, must for some years longer, come into the market in competition with the government, and the migration to Texas, as well as the continuance of the suspension of specie payments by the banks over much of the west and southwest, is likely to operate injuriously somewhat longer, though probably with a force much diminished.

In respect to the estimates for expenditures, it need only be observed here, that any considerable addition made by Congress to the new appropriations called for, would require a provision of further money to meet them, corresponding in amount; and any discussion in those appropriations would also redress, in a similar manner, the amount of means otherwise necessary.

VII. It is proper to advert next to the best mode of advising any inequality between the anticipated receipts and expenditures, either in 1841 or 1842.

It has already been shown that the whole amount of receipts in 1841 will probably be sufficient to discharge all ordinary expenditures, and those parts of the outstanding debt, funded or unfunded, which may have been provided for by Congress. A considerable balance in the treasury may require more than will probably be left after satisfying other purposes. The raising of any sum for that object in 1841, could, however, be obviated by authorising a contract with the Government, for a period not exceeding the period of payment for a portion of the temporary liabilities falling due in that year. Yet, in the opinion of the undersigned, the best mode of providing for this case would be, without either an extension of this kind, or a loan, or a further issue of treasury notes, or a change in the tariff; but merely by lessening the appropriations for the service of 1841 below the estimates, or passing such declaratory clauses as to the present tariff, and such acts as to the public lands, as have heretofore been urged on the consideration of Congress.

The arguments in favor of some further diminution in our expenditures, and the general items in which the reduction is considered most compatible with the public interests, were so fully exhibited in the last two reports as to render a repetition of them unnecessary.

It was then believed that the laws could be altered so as to admit of safely curtailing the appropriations at once, to such an extent, that the expenditures would not exceed, in the aggregate, the revenue or eighteen millions yearly. After more of the pensions terminate, and the removal of the Indians is completed, they could be beneficially contracted to even less than that amount. Such a reduction as is first adverted to, seems, therefore, proper to be adopted now, since it could be effected without the probability of injury to any useful national establishments, would promote public frugality, and supercede the necessity either of higher tariffs, direct taxes, or permanent debts.

If it should become the emergency measures before suggested, such as a declaratory act to enforce the present tariff, a suitable modification of the drawbacks and bounties; and the passage of bills graduating the price of public lands, as well as extending suitable districts for the sale of them, would be likely, if taking effect early, to yield a suitable supply in the course of the year.

It will be observed, however, that though, under either of these arrangements, though might be obtained within the whole of 1841 for the object contemplated, yet not a due or sufficient proportion in the first quarter; because by that time all the measures are not likely to go into full operation, nor much of the anticipated increase to happen in the actual receipts of duties under existing laws. Unusually heavy expenses will also fall on that quarter in the next year. In addition to a full portion of most of the current expenses, and the whole pension payments for the first half of the year, and one-fourth of a million, or more, for all the annual fishing bounties, there will be imposed on most of the charges for the whole year connected with the session of Congress and private bills, as well as large payments for taking the census, and for the first instalment of the debt of this District; several of them as fully as in 1840.

From these circumstances, and the considerations that all which is due from the banks may not be then paid, and that the balance in the treasury, under the policy adopted by Congress of late years, will of necessity be small, while the fluctuations and inequalities are very great between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year, to which we are constantly exposed from causes that have on former occasions been explained at length, it must be obvious that entire safety requires a contingency fund to be seasonably collected, or the executive to obtain at any time within 1841 such subsidiary means as may be needed for a few months, and as may be sufficient to enable the treasury punctually to discharge, during that year, all the liabilities which may be seasonably collected.

There is another contingency under the existing laws, as to duties, which requires attention, with a view to be properly prepared for it; though legislation concerning the subject is not necessary so early as in the other case, because the event on which it depends cannot really happen before 1842.

Thus the progressive reduction of the present tariff, which has been going on since 1833, will, after December, 1841, take effect to a much larger extent than heretofore. Nearly two millions and a half of dollars will then be deducted at once.

On the 1st of July afterwards, at least two millions and a half more of duties will be removed; making an aggregate, in six months, of quite five millions. If the imports there should not differ much from those in 1838, this would leave an income from them, not probably exceeding ten or eleven millions of dollars yearly. It will therefore be necessary to make corresponding reductions in the expenditures of 1842, or reasonably provide otherwise, in some prudent manner, to supply any wants likely to happen from this cause.

Should congress conclude that such reduction in the expenditures cannot properly be made, and that the imports for 1842 will not increase beyond those in 1838, the amount of the deficit would, in these events, probably differ but little from five millions. Such a deficiency would, under these circumstances, be likely to become permanent, and may be considered the first of that character which will occur under the tariff act of 1840.

The idea that such a deficiency in time of peace ought to be supplied by issue of treasury notes, or by a loan, has never been entertained by the undersigned. Nor can it be countenanced by any sound politician either in this country or in Europe. The inquiry then recurs, what other mode would be more eligible? When we possessed an extraordinary surplus, it was considered prudent by congress to make deposits with the states, with a view to be returned in emergency, and to invest a portion of it safely and productively, so as to be realized in such an event. It would therefore be consistent with that arrangement to recall, in 1842, such part of the surplus as may be then needed. But that course, however, appears to be very likely to be adopted, since the former power given to this department to recall these deposits has been taken away by congress.

Is another practicable mode would be to resort to direct taxes. But this is so unobjectionable to the general habits, and so incongruous to the opinions of most of our population, that its adoption is not to be anticipated. Some other permanent resource must then be looked for, and this choice will probably rest between the large reduction of the interest on, and the other accompanying measures before specified, and such extensive modification of the present tariff. Explanations have heretofore been given by the undersigned in favor of the former course; and it would probably prove more efficacious to meet the emergency, if the reduction be pushed vigorously, and especially if the imports after 1841 shall exceed those in 1838 which is regarded as probable.

But congress may not coincide with him in opinion on these points, and, for covering the contingency, may consider the adoption of some permanent change in the tariff as preferable, and as not so likely to excite the present session, to give full notice of its character, before going into operation, in order that different interests most affected by it shall have time to become gradually adjusted to its provisions.

In that event, it might be supposed that the undersigned had avoided due responsibility, and a timely discharge of duty, if he were not prepared to offer some views concerning the details, as well as general principles, which he deems applicable to such a change. He has therefore examined the subject, and is ready to present the result at this moment if either house of congress shall express a wish to that effect. But he refrains from submitting them without a special request, because some doubt exists, under circumstances which can be properly appreciated, as to the desirability of discussing a measure at this time, which the legislature may not consider it necessary to act on till a new congress assembles.

III. The mode of keeping the public money regularly established by law, has thus far answered the expectations of this department.

The numerous labors, perplexities and delays of putting a new system into operation, have been mostly overcome, and no losses whatever are known to have occurred under it.

Some of the provisions in the law are deemed objectionable in their details, and are respectfully recommended to congress for revision. But they are supposed to stand in the slightest degree any principle involved in the measure.

Thus, the ordinary clerks authorized are numerous enough, yet a principal one is needed at New York city, with such compensation as is usual at a place of so large and important business.

On full inquiry, it has been found also that no site could probably be purchased for the erection of an office at St. Louis, which would be more suitable than a lot now owned by the United States; and it may be, under a further examination which is in progress, that no new building could be erected on that site, which would prove more economical and convenient, than one which can be purchased at ready erected. A suitable change in the appropriation on that subject it therefore respectfully recommended.

A provision is needed likewise in case of vacancies from any cause whatever, in the offices of receivers general and treasurers. One has formerly been asked in relation to collectors of the customs, in case of renewals and expirations of the terms of office, to prevent an interregnum in the discharge of duties. This might properly be adopted as to them, and extended to receivers general and the treasurer of the United States, as well as of the mint and its branches, in all instances whatever of vacancy or temporary inability of the principal.—Paying the objection, however, to effect this object would be, to direct that the chief clerk of all these offices should, in such cases, and where no other legal provisions now exist, be authorized and required to discharge these duties, at the risk and under the responsibility of the principal or his securities, till the vacancy is filled, or the disability removed.

In consequence of some defects in the phraseology of the penal parts of the act, a new clause excluding the officers from discharge of their duties in character under the general government would be judicious. A further provision also, respecting the places of deposit, by disbursing officers, of money not in the treasury, but drawn out and put into their hands for making payments, appears necessary.

The keeping of such money is now regulated by the act of 3d of March, 1809; and if it is intended to bring it within the operation of the late law as to money in the treasury, it seems proper to do so by an amendment.

The section requiring disbursing officers to sell their drafts for specie alone, though certain proportions of paper are allowed to be received for all those drafts, appears not to be in symmetry with other provisions. The general view of the present system is believed to have been thus far salutary. The true standard of value has been rendered more familiar, confidence has been increased in its stability, prices have generally risen, business improved, and exchanges altered greatly to the better.

If something has been or may be lost in convenience, (which is not unlikely), by the increasing disuse of a paper currency for public payments, and the small profit to be gained by the circumstances before enumerated, it will be more than compensated by the use of specie, the more stable value imparted by the present system to property and labor, and the strong check established by it, not only against defraudations, but against bank expansions, excessive speculations and consequent fluctuations.

Even any inconvenience attending this change in the currency used, if found particularly embarrassing can be overcome hereafter, and the system still maintained, should congress feel disposed to adopt the measure which was suggested for that purpose by the undersigned in September, 1837.

Such a measure would often furnish every advantage of a circulating medium, easy of transportation, of the highest possible credit, and at the same time requiring an equal amount of specie to be employed, (though in deposit), and without subjecting any of the fiscal affairs of the government to that legal dependence on corporations for their management, which is so objectionable in many respects, as never to have been attempted in the management of any of its other affairs, civil or military.

The topics of the condition of the banks of the nation; the state of the currency; the proper places of deposit for the public money; and other matters immediately connected with these have engaged the considerable portion of the annual reports for this department for several years.

But the keeping of the money in the treasury being now regulated by law, and the kind of money to be received and paid out fixed by the legal provisions, it is not considered material at this time further to discuss these matters, than to submit the general remarks which will be found at the close of the preceding section.

IX. Some miscellaneous topics connected with the finances deserve a brief notice.

The various measures heretofore recommended to congress by the undersigned, and which have not yet been acted on, are again respectfully recalled to its attention.

Without recapitulating them, it will be found, on a reference to former reports, that many of the subjects possess much importance in a fiscal view, and yet have been almost wholly forgotten, and the conviction of the usefulness of early attention upon them.

It affords me pleasure to state that since the last session, the Neapolitan government, under its treaty of indemnity, has paid promptly another instalment, which it expected to have been enabled to remit in installments early, and distributed among the claimants.

The situation of the general land office and its operations within the year, will be submitted separately in a few days.

Six old land districts have been recently discontinued, under the act of June 12, 1840. It is believed that some others might economically and usefully be abolished by congress, though not coming within the provisions of that law. Such is the office at Gretnburg, Louisiana. One district in Indiana, including the capital of the state, is thought, from its peculiar position, require special legislation to exempt it from the operation of the late act.

This occasion is taken, also, to renew the recommendations, before presented by the department to congress and the appropriate committees, for the discontinuance of certain officers now employed in the collection of duties, whose further services, it has been believed, could be safely dispensed with, in consequence of the reduction of the business of late years at the different places where they are stationed. They include some collectors and naval officers, and several surveyors, amounting in all to eighteen, but whose offices cannot be abolished without loss.

All the subordinate custom house officers, which it is competent for this department, without such legislation, to dispense with, and whose situations in other respects similar, have already been discontinued, including the captain of the state, fifty officers, and, besides those, five vessels and boats, with nearly one hundred men, in the cutter service. In about forty other cases, the compensation of officers and light house keepers has been reduced.

X. In closing this last annual report of the undersigned, it may be expected that he would advert, for a moment, to the general character of some of our financial operations during the period of his connection with the treasury department.

Though employed in different executive offices nearly ten years, he has been connected with the treasury only from six to seven of them.

During this term there has occurred much to evince the great fiscal power, as well as proactivity of the union. Some reverses have, at times, overtaken the rashness displayed by parts of the community in certain branches of business, and have occasioned some adverse influences on the revenue dependent upon the state. But the period of prosperity, as a whole, have been almost unexampled in prosperous developments.

Thus, in respect to our receipts. Notwithstanding the unusual depression in imports on two occasions, so severely sustaining the revenue, notwithstanding any losses sustained by those crisis, by the government, through officers, banks or merchants; and notwithstanding the biennial reduction of the duties, which has by its operation constantly going on, as well as the remission of several millions to rail road corporations, and under new judicial constructions; yet our condition has been so flourishing, as to yield a revenue during that time sufficient, after all those deductions, to accomplish the following important results. It has enabled the treasury to meet the current expenditures of the government, as well as the extraordinary ones by Indian wars, treaties, and other costly measures, and without imposing any new taxes, or higher tariff, and without any new bonded debt, and yet extinguishing considerable remains of the old one, and paying the interest on that assumed for this District, to save the unprecedented surplus of more than one hundred millions of dollars, and deposit the same with the sinking fund, the sum left still needed by the general government.

The only permanent aid in effecting this, beyond the receipts from ordinary sources, has been the debt due from the U. States bank, of about eight millions, and the treasury notes now outstanding, equal to nearly four and a half millions. But during that period, a sum not far from the first amount has been applied to the discharge of the principal interest of the old bonded debt; so that, towards the payment of other expenses, only between four and five millions, beyond what was temporary, and what has already been refunded or adjusted, have been received from any extraneous source whatever.

It follows, therefore, that the current revenue, notwithstanding all reductions, has been adequate to defray both the ordinary and extraordinary demands, and, after taking from what is deposited in the sinking fund, sufficient to extinguish every kind of indebtedness created on an account with the government during the same period, to leave on hand the large balance of nearly twenty-four millions.

It is true that the available sum in the treasury at the commencement and the close of the period in question will probably prove different in amount; but if made equal, a surplus would still be left, which is likely to exceed seven or eighteen millions of dollars.

Besides this recorded evidence of the prosperity of the country and the fiscal ability of the general government in those years, it is gratifying, amidst many misapprehensions concerning the subject, to reflect on another circumstance connected with our financial operations, which has also become matter of history. It is that, though the aid of a United States bank as a fiscal agent during that period, and baffled by various unremedied imperfections in the laws connected with the finances, as well as embarrassed by two suspensions of specie payments by many of the banks—one still continuing; yet the treasury has been able to make its vast collections, transfers and payments, with promptitude, and in most cases with specie or its equivalent.

Some correct judgment can be formed of the extent and difficulty of these operations, when it is recollected that the whole sums which have thus been collected, without deducting fractions, added to those sums which have been paid over chiefly by another class of officers, have exceeded the extraordinary aggregate of $360,000,000, and been dispersed over a territory of nearly two million square miles in extent. It is, moreover, ascertained that the whole mass of Indian treaties only, by default, large and small, and in all kinds of offices, will probably not equal half of one per cent. on that amount; and however official delinquencies may, in some cases, have inevitably been aggravated by the unprincipled speculation of the times, and by great ravagings and failures among banks and individuals, those losses will not be one-fourth so large, in proportion to the amounts collected and paid, as in some previous terms, when the system under a United States bank was in full operation.

A few words may be proper as to the expenditures during the same period. Though they were of necessity augmented by some of the circumstances before mentioned, yet Indian treaties only, out of a large number, having already involved us in the expense of nearly twenty-three millions of dollars; yet the aggregate of all has been much reduced since the influence of those causes and the influence of an extraordinary speculation have subsided. The expenditures have fallen yearly since 1837, till they are now only twenty-two and a half millions independent of any debt and trusts, and are supposed to be in progress to a still lower amount.

Some understand that the rapid reduction of the expenditures has been effected by the great safeguard against a two speeded central government, which would constantly threaten to overshadow all state independence, and attract the ambition of most of the friends of state rights, by the labyrinth of froggery and principle into the dazzling vortex of higher patronage, honors and emoluments. While the assistants to excesses shall continue to lessen, nothing will be necessary to insure the further success of an economical policy; but perseverance in retrenchments, wherever they are practicable without injury to the public interests. The removal of Indians being mostly finished, and the chief causes of frontier wars extinguished, unless new objects of expenditure be selected, or a great enlargement given to some already existing, the whole amount must, of necessity, contract hereafter very rapidly. The same result will be further promoted by the deaths of pensioners, and by saving through the economy of the expenditure of many public works, as well as by persisting in a firm policy to avoid the wasteful expense of unnecessary foreign collisions, and to refrain from those lavish expenditures for certain domestic objects, over which the jurisdiction of the general government is often questionable, and which always open the widest door to extravagance, favoritism and corruption.

Use of the greatest evils to the public service, as well as to the security of private business, during a part of the above period, has consisted in the fluctuations to which both have been subjected.

With only a single year intervening, and without any material change in the tariff, or any whatever in the price of the public lands, we have seen the revenue from ordinary sources suddenly vary from nearly fifty millions annually to eighteen; and, on two occasions since, vibrant to the extraordinary extent of nearly eight and eleven millions.

The transactions of individuals upon which our revenue depends, must, of course, have undergone an unusual change at the same time.

The imports fell within two years, and the case first referred to, from twenty to ten millions, and in some years to one hundred and four hundred, and in the single year just passed, fell almost sixty millions. Such inflations and contractions must be destructive of all confidence in calculations for the future, while the causes of them shall continue to operate unremedied.

What were those causes?

They will be found to have been chiefly connected with the abuses of banking. On the occasion first referred to, they were the superabundance of a fictitious medium of circulation, with the attendant overtrading and speculations in 1836, and the consequent suspension of specie payments, as well as the disasters and scarcity of any medium till the latter part of A. D. 1835. Then another expansion commenced, extending into 1839, and accompanied by another increase in imports of foreign goods, which were again the cause of contractions by banks, suspensions and commercial reverses, which have suddenly reduced the imports of 1840 more than one-third, and in many places augmented seriously the embarrassments before existing from similar vacillations in the paper currency.

How far some imprudences abroad, at the same time, similar to these, though in a country enjoying any advantages which result from a national bank, have contributed to the present state of the intimate moneyed relations between us, need not now be discussed, though probably their influence was large and unfavorable.

The great principles of trade, however, likewise, in full operation here in 1816 and 1817, and were succeeded by many of the same deplorable consequences in 1819 and 1820. One followed the other as inevitably as the ebbs of the tide succeeds its flood.

The great principles of trade, however, likewise, in full operation here in 1816 and 1817, and were succeeded by many of the same deplorable consequences in 1819 and 1820. One followed the other as inevitably as the ebbs of the tide succeeds its flood.

All business otherwise becomes a mere game of hazard; speculation must enter into every affair of life; riches and poverty will be dependent on the most bubble prices will change oftener than the wind; regularity in receipts and expenditures be impossible; estimates for the future, whether in public or private matters, become mere conjectures; tariff require yearly alteration to meet the fluctuations of the market; and the country, which has been the constant excitement and depression of the hot and cold fits of a violent fever.

The first remedy sought in 1816 by the establishment of a national bank, was supposed, during a few years, to have been successful, and the next remedy, adopted in 1824 by a high tariff, did not prevent the low prices and bankruptcies of 1825, which covered the country with wrecks and ruin.

Unquestionably, the best relief on such occasions is to be found in removing the cause of the disease. So far as regards the general government, this was attempted in 1837, and since, by gradually withdrawing from the use of banks and their paper in its fiscal operations, so as neither to stimulate nor contract their issues by other influences than ordinary business; and by urging on those, who might find their employment sometimes useful, a closer regard in doing it, to the sane and sober influences of the universal laws of trade, as well as an inflexible adherence to the constitutional standard of value.

While the general government shall continue to pursue such a course, it will mitigate and check the fluctuations of the market, and which they should, under the limitations in the constitution, are able entirely to remove. At all events, it will faithfully perform a momentous duty, and exhibit a useful example for imitation.

It is a great peace and comparative exemption from public debt, as well as from serious difficulty in financial operations, it would hardly seem proper to attempt more by assumptions of doubtful power, and by forced constructions in favor of measures by which it might be adopted, than to endeavor to diminish existing evils, and not to produce others of a character still more dangerous. Much less can it be considered respectful either to state rights or the people, and certainly not competent, in the opinion of the undersigned, to exercise such powers by creating moneyed corporations among them, which many of their number have repeatedly denounced as unconstitutional, and the authority to establish which was originally refused rather than conferred to the general government by the people and the states that formed it. But some other powers expressly conferred can, without question, be exercised further than has yet been done by congress, and in such a manner as to produce very beneficial consequences upon the currency. Still, it is hoped they will never be pushed so as to trespass on ground really doubtful under the constitution, and prevent the states from continuing to exercise all the legitimate authority they now possess as to banks and debts, however much it may be regretted that public opinion has not yet run with more strength against the abuses of banks, and to exert prompt correction. It is not proposed at this time to go into the consideration of farther details on these points. But the danger to be guarded against now, seems to be rather of an opposite character from that of over issue by the general government in the exercise of its express powers. On the contrary, apoplexias exist that it may not continue firm in the support of all which has already been accomplished in connection with the currency. If should occur, and the states should be over in any degree the rashness of many to force something like a formidable steam power into all kinds of business, without due guards to prevent constant and fatal explosions, myriads of individuals, as well as some corporations and states, are likely to be overwhelmed in still wider ruin, and will ere long probably look to no escape except the application of the sponge of a general bankrupt law to all private liabilities, and the unconstitutional assumption of the public debt by the general government, to pay off oppressively those portions of the community who have any thing left to pay for the losses and follies of the rest.

A remedy which has been advanced to by some, and which consists in the creation of more credit, to cure the mischief of an existing excess of credit, or the formation of larger banks with like power of abuses, in order to correct smaller ones, must usually aggravate evils existing by the general government, and in constitutional objections, may, in point of expediency alone, well be discontinued.

A plan of free banking, adopted by the states, properly guarded and secured by provisions similar to those recommended by the undersigned as long as 1836, with such others as reflection and experience may sanction, appears far preferable. But, independent of that, no changes in the present system, as to banks, seem worthy of strenuous exertion, except those which would direct what shall be made safer, to restrict, control and regulate better the institutions that already exist rather than to incorporate more. Above all, should public efforts be directed to strengthen the certainty of prompt payment of the public debt, and to the adoption of an approach to uniformity in the amount of issues in similar states of trade; and of specie on hand, instead of multiplying them for speculation or cupidity, and thus keeping up a succession of expansions and contractions, and the evils which attend the existing disorders, and render the continuance of great fluctuations in all public as well as private affairs unavoidable, endless and ruinous. With much respect,

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of treasury.

To the president of the senate of the U. S.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Navy Department, Dec. 5th, 1840.

Sir: In the performance of a duty annually devolving on this department, I respectfully submit the following report:

The squadron in the Mediterranean remains the same as it was at the date of my last report, and consists of the Ohio 74, the Brandywine (first class frigate), and the Cyane schooner of war, the whole under the command of commodore Isaac Hull. This force has been found fully adequate to the protection of our commerce, which has remained unobscured in all parts.

The squadron on the Pacific station is composed of the frigate Constitution, the sloop of war St. Louis and the schooner Blark, under commodore Claxton. Since the date of the last report, the schooner Enterprise, then on her way home, and the sloop of war Lexington and Falmouth, which has been directed to return, have arrived in the United States, and have been replaced by the sloop Yorktown and Dale, and the schooner Enterprise, which is the case of the squadron, when joined by these vessels, will consist of a frigate of the first class, three sloops of war and a schooner. Commodore Claxton has been directed to dispatch the Yorktown on a cruise to the Sandwich and the Enterprise on a cruise to the coast of Japan, the Gulf of California, and the Ladrone and Marquesas, for the general protection of our whaling interests and other commercial purposes.

The squadron on the coast of Brazil, under commodore J. Nicholson, at the date of my last report, was composed of the sloop Independence, and the sloop of war Fairfield and Marion. The two former have returned to the United States, commodore Nicholson having been relieved in the command of that station by Commodore Zerkow (formerly of the Enterprise), who consists of the Potomac, first class frigate, the sloop of war Dracut and Marion, and the schooner Katherine. This detachment between the French government and that of the Argentine republic still subsisting, and the blockade continuing to be rigidly enforced, it has been thought expedient to augment this force, and the sloop of war Concord is now on the way of sailing for that purpose.

The squadron employed in the coast of Mexico and the West Indies, under commodore William B. Shubrick, at the date of my last paper, consisted of the frigate Macedonian, and the sloops of war Onizca, Erie, Warren, and Porpoise. The Onizca has been ordered to the north, for repairs, and the Erie, being found unfit for service, has been detached from the squadron. The remaining vessels, with the exception of the Warren, were directed to leave the station during the hurricane season. The Porpoise sailed to the north. Commodore Shubrick accordingly left Penacola in July last, with the Macedonian, Levant and Erie, and arrived at Boston in August.—Thence he proceeded to Export, and on his return visited the principal ports on the coast as far south as Norfolk, where, in conformity with his instructions from the department, he delivered the command of the West India squadron to commodore Jesse Wilkinson, who had been appointed to relieve him, and who has since returned to the States. The command of commodore Wilkinson now consists of the Macedonian frigate, and the sloops of war Levant and Warren, which force is deemed sufficient for the protection of our interests in that quarter in the present state of the world.

The frigate Columbia and corvette John Adams, employed in a cruise in the Indian and China seas, under commodore Geo. C. Reed, for the protection of the commerce of the United States in that quarter, have returned home. The Columbia, with the sloop of war Boston, have recently sailed for Rio de Janeiro, where they will replenish their supplies, and receive capt. Lawrence Kearney, now in command of the flag ship on the Brazilian station, who will hold his headquarters on board the Columbia, as commander of the East India squadron, and proceed with that vessel and the Boston to carry out his instructions.

An exploring expedition, as stated in my last report, was at Calao, whence lieutenant Wilkes sailed on the 6th July, 1839. Since that period, he has visited the Society Islands, Navigator's Group, New Zealand, and various detached islands, with whose inhabitants he has had the most amicable intercourse, and with the ports and harbors he has made himself particularly acquainted. On the 26th December, 1839, he left the port of Sydney, in New Zealand, and proceeded to penetrate the Atlantic sea, the south of the United States, the Vincennes discovered land is latitude 66.6, longitude 154.27 east, and had soundings in thirty fathoms water. The same day the Peacock made a similar discovery in latitude 66.31, longitude 153.40, and had soundings at a depth of three hundred and twenty fathoms. Lieutenant Wilkes coasted along this land, and had sight of it at various times for a distance of eighteen hundred miles, and has denominated it the Atlantic continent. It is to be regretted, however, that the vast masses of ice, with which it is every where defended, prevented a nearer approach than fifteen miles, and rendered it impossible to land. It is described as presenting one vast mass of snow and ice, apparently rising almost perpendicularly from the sea, and will probably forever baffle the efforts of man to explore its interior, or convert it to any useful purposes.

After repeated and persevering efforts to approach the coast and effect a landing, lieutenant Wilkes, his officers and crew having sustained the most heroic exertions and the exposures incidental to the hazardous enterprise, returned to Sydney the 11th of March, 1840, where he was joined by the Peacock and Porpoise, the former of which had been in imminent danger from coming in contact with an island of ice. Lieut. Wilkes speaks in the highest terms of the conduct of the officers and crews of the expedition. At the last dates, the 6th of April, he was at the Bay of Islands, N. Zealand, whence he was shortly to proceed to carry out his instructions.

The steam frigate Pulmon has been employed during the past season in experimenting with the Paixhans gun and shot, under the direction of captain Parry, and with a view to afford as many officers as possible an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the practice of gunnery, as large a number of supernumeraries have been attached to her as she could accommodate. The reports of captain Parry present very interesting results, and it is contemplated to continue the experiment for the purpose of demonstrating the relative advantages of the Paixhans gun and those in ordinary use, as well as affording a useful practice to our naval officers, by attaching them, in succession to this vessel.

The arrivals on the eastern coast of the United States, directed by the act of the 3d of March, 1837, have been completed under the superintendence of lieutenant Glynn, and it is expected that the department will be enabled to lay before congress either at or shortly after the commencement of the session, complete charts of all the ports and places which have been surveyed.

The brig Consort, under the command of lieut. Powell, is now occupied in surveying the coast from the Bay of Apalachicola to the mouth of the Mississippi, as directed by the act of making appropriations for the survey of the coast, 1840.

The sloop of war Freble, commodore Brevint, has been employed on the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador, during the late fishing season, in protecting the rights and interests of American citizens engaged in the fishery. On the 10th of September, the cruise she returned to Portland, whence she was ordered to Boston for examination previous to being sent on foreign service.

The brig Delphin, lieut. Bell, and the schooner Grampus, lieutenant Paine, have been employed on the coast of Africa, in the suppression of the slave trade. They returned at the commencement of the sickly season, and have since sailed in pursuit of the same object. The presence of these vessels on the coast during the season of the trade, will be a graceful traffic is carried on, will in all probability in a great degree arrest its progress, so far as it has been prosecuted by the assumption of the American flag, and do much to relieve the nation from the impositions of the foreign nations participating in the violation of the laws of the United States and the policy of their government. From the report of lieut. Bell and Paine it appears that the traffic in slaves is now carried on principally under Portuguese colors, and that the great number of slave stations, as they are denominated, established at different points of the coast, under the protection of the neighboring native chiefs, who furnish the slaves and receive irregular goods manufactured in England, expressly for this purpose, render the slaves so formidable, as to afford an opportunity offers for the slave to approach the land under cover of night, and receive them on board.—Both officers are of opinion that as long as these stations are permitted to exist, and this barrier carried on, all attempts effectually to arrest the traffic in slaves will end in administering only partial remedies, which will but aggravate the disease. There can be little doubt that the number of slaves transported to Africa is greatly increased, and that in the adoption of measures for its suppression and punishment, which it would seem have served no other purpose than to excite the cupidity of unprincipled adventurers, by increasing the value of slaves, and the temptation of participating, which overpowered all apprehension of consequence.

During the past year three small schooners, the Flirt, the Wave and the Osage, which had been previously procured and employed by the war department, under the command of making appropriations for suppressing Indian hostilities, approved 3d March, 1838, having been placed under the direction of this department, were employed on the coast of Florida, under lieutenant McLaughlin. That officer lately returned to the north in the Flirt, bringing with him men whose terms of service had expired, together with the sick and disabled attached to the expedition. He has since sailed with men sufficient to complete the complement of all his vessels, as well as for boat service. An additional number of marines has also been attached to his command, with a view to operations on land against the Indians, as well as the protection of the lives and property of the citizens, and the prevention of the introduction of slaves by the means of the export trade.

The two Atlantic frigates commenced under the second article of the act approved 3d March, 1839, one at New York, the other at Philadelphia, have been so far completed that the former will be ready for launch in a few days, and the latter in the ensuing spring, as soon as the Delaware is free from ice. The engines and boilers are also in a course of speedy completion, and when finished, will be placed on board, and the vessels prepared for service.

The apprentice system continues in operation; and thus far, its results are highly satisfactory. The conduct of the young lads is generally exemplary, and such is their rapid progress in the art of seamanship, that by the time they are of age for service, our commanders generally prefer them to older seamen. I take this occasion to recommend that this system be fostered to the utmost extent of which it is susceptible, being fully of the opinion that the present one great naval difficulty, and the only remedy that increasing scarcity of competent petty officers and able seamen, which greatly embarrasses the operations of the navy, delays the sailing of our public vessels, and places the defense of our harbors and the interests of the United States in the protection of crews, a great portion of which are foreigners.

This scarcity of seamen for the use of the navy is, I apprehend, owing to the high wages they receive in the merchant service, and the comparatively short periods of their engagements in commercial voyages; to the absence of an apprentice system in the merchant service; and the discharge of seamen when their term have expired on foreign stations, where the reductions of climate and the allurement of pleasure attach them to the soil, and whence many of them never return, or return so enervated, as to be comparatively unfit for active service. The last inquiry I have instituted result in the fact that many of our seamen are now scattered among the islands of the Pacific, and on the coast of South America; and though directions have been given to reclaim them whenever it may be found practicable, there can be little doubt that a large number are thus irretrievably lost to their country. I have also sufficient reason to believe that the modification of the navy ration, which was proposed to congress, but which has not been definitely acted on, would, if adopted, contribute materially to attach our seamen more permanently to the service; and I take this occasion earnestly to request that the early adoption of the measure be the policy of this subject generally, as one of vital importance to the well-being of the navy.

The accompanying report and letter from the commissioner of pensions, exhibit the number of pensioners, the amount of their pensions, and the means now remaining on hand for the payment of the same, may become due the 1st of Jan. and 1st of July, 1841. From these documents it will appear that under the operation of the navy pension laws, and most especially under the course of the year 1839, the navy pension list, which at the present time stood at upwards of a million of dollars, the annual amount of which was sufficient to meet all demands, now consists of one hundred thousand dollars in pension, five per cent stock, greatly depreciated, and fourteen thousand dollars of stock of the bank of Washington, in the same situation, thirty-five thousand three hundred and thirty-nine dollars five per cent stock of the city of Washington, and eleven thousand four hundred dollars of stock of the Union bank of Georgetown, the latter totally unsalable at this time.

By the same statement it appears that the sum of one hundred and fifty-one thousand three hundred and fifty-two dollars and thirty-nine cents, will be required in the course of the year 1840 to meet the claims arising out of the present pension list, and that consequently, either an appropriation of that sum, during the present session, must be made, or the pensioners will remain unpaid, and the faith of the nation, which has been pledged, will be found a deficiency in this fund, remains undredemed.

The estimates which accompany this report have been prepared with a due regard to economy on our part, and the protection of the honor and interest of the United States on the other. The number of vessels now in commission is fully equal to those employed in preceding years, and it is believed that during the past year, neither the persons nor property of our citizens have any where suffered outrage or wrong for want of prompt attention in affording the means of protection and redress.

It will be perceived that the board of navy commissioners have again presented an estimate for additional clerks, which, as has been stated, are indispensable to the prompt performance of the duties of that office, which are daily increasing, and which there is no reason to believe will suffer any diminution in the future. Respectfully submitted,

J. K. FAULDING,

To the president of the United States.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—24 SESSION.

SENATE.

December 19. Mr. Mangum presented the credentials of William A. Graham, of N. Carolina, who, after being duly qualified, took the oath of office.

Mr. Siler presented the credentials of William S. Fulton, senator elect from Arkansas, from and after the 4th of March next.

The following senators appeared in their seats: Messrs. Webster, Tolland, White, Calhoun and Rives.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, The senate then proceeded to ballot for chairman of the committee on commerce, when Mr. King, of Alabama, having received 29 out of 32 votes, was declared elected to the office of chairman.

The chair then announced the standing committee of the body, as follows:

On foreign relations.—Messrs. Buchanan, (chairman), Clay, of Kentucky, Calhoun, Kansas and Allen.

On finance.—Messrs. Wright, (chairman), Webster, Nicholas, Benton and Hubbard.

On commerce.—Messrs. King, (chairman), Davis, Norvell, Ruggles and Moulton.

On manufactures.—Messrs. Lumpkin, (chairman), Preston, Knight, Buchanan and Allen.

On agriculture.—Messrs. Moulton, (chairman), Dixon, Linn, Sturgeon and Smith of Connecticut.

On military affairs.—Messrs. Benton, (chairman), Preston, Wall, Pierce and Nicholas.

On the militia.—Messrs. Wall, (chairman), (chairman), Smith, of Indiana, Anderson, Fulton and Mangum.

On naval affairs.—Messrs. Williams, (chairman), Southard, Culberr, Talbridge and Tappan.

On public lands.—Messrs. Walker, (chairman), Fulton, Clay, of Alabama, Prentiss and Norvell.

On private land claims.—Messrs. Linn, (chairman), Sevier, Clayton, Moulton and Huntington.

On Indian affairs.—Messrs. Prentiss, (chairman), Linn, White, Phelps and Lumpkin.

Of claims.—Messrs. Hubbard, (chairman), Young, Merrick, Williams and Huntington.

On revolutionary claims.—Messrs. Smith, of Connecticut, (chairman), Sturgeon, Giamah, Crittenden and Robinson.

On the judiciary.—Messrs. Wall, (chairman), Clayton, Anderson, Crittenden and Smith, of In.

On the post office and post roads.—Messrs. Robinson, (chairman), Lumpkin, Wright, Fulton and Henderson.

On roads and canals.—Messrs. Young, (chairman), Phelps, Henderson, Mangum and Smith, of Indiana.

On prisons.—Messrs. Prentiss, (chairman), Prentiss, White, Roane and Huntington.

For the District of Columbia.—Messrs. Merrick, (chairman), Crittenden, Mangum, Southard and Clayton.

On patents and the patent office.—Messrs. Sturgeon, (chairman), Davis, Prentiss, Robinson and Potter.

On public buildings.—Messrs. Fulton, (chairman), Merrick and Smith, of Connecticut.

To audit and control the contingent expenses of the senate.—Messrs. Knight, (chairman), Fulton and Porter.

On exiguous bills.—Messrs. Henderson, (chairman), Porter and Welch.

Mr. Norvell presented a memorial from sundry inhabitants of Michigan, praying the enactment of a uniform bankrupt law. Referred to the committee on the judiciary by several senators of their intention of introducing bills.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, moved that the senate now proceed to the election of chaplain; but the motion was lost.

On motion the senate adjourned to Monday next.

December 11. The following senators appeared in their seats: Mr. Southard, of New Jersey, Mr. Preston, of S. Carolina, Mr. Anderson, of Tennessee, and Mr. H. Dickinson, of Maine.

The president pro tem, communicated to the senate communications from the state, war and navy departments, containing statements of the expenditures of the contingent funds of those departments; all of which were severally ordered to be printed.

The following memorial and petitions were presented and appropriately referred.

By Mr. Clay, from Origen Batchelder, of New York, praying that a board may be appointed (with the concurrence of other nations) for the settlement of all difficulties without recourse to arms.

By Mr. Merrick, from the several banking institutions of the District of Columbia. Also, from the Howard institution, asking the aid of congress.

By Mr. Wright, from citizens of Jefferson county, New Jersey, praying the enactment of a uniform bankrupt law.

By Mr. Wate, from the Mount Carmel and New Albany rail road company, asking a donation of land to aid in constructing said road.

Mr. Clay submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the collection, sale, keeping, transfer and distribution of the public lands," ought to be forthwith re-enacted, and that the committee on finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

Mr. Clay also submitted the following, which was ordered to be printed and read.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate statements showing the quantity of land reported by the registers and receivers of the several land offices in pursuance of a resolution of the senate of the 25th of April, 1829, to have been unsold on their respective districts on the 30th day of June, 1829, after having been offered at the minimum price per acre, the quantity of the several land offices, what proportion of the land so unsold on that day consisted of first rate land, and what was the estimate of the value of the unsold land, and what was the estimate of the average value per acre of the unsold land, and what part of said land so remaining unsold on the 30th

June, 1829, aforesaid, has since been sold, and at what price, discriminating between the amounts sold in each of the districts. And the secretary is further directed to prepare parallel columns to be printed, exhibiting in one connected view the quantity of land unsold on the day aforesaid in said districts, the amount of land so sold, the value as assessed or estimated by the land officers, and the prices at which the lands have been actually sold, and the aggregate value of the land as assessed, and the aggregate amount of the sales made since the 30th June, 1829, in each land district.

Mr. Ruggles submitted the following: That the president of the senate be requested to communicate to the senate, if not incompatible with the public interests, any correspondence which may have taken place between this government and Great Britain relative to the jurisdiction of the boundary, not heretofore communicated to the senate; also, on like condition, any correspondence had with the governor of Maine on the same subject, not heretofore communicated.

On motion of Mr. Davis, Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be requested to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws as to mitigate or wholly abolish the imprisonment of witnesses in criminal cases.

The following resolutions were submitted by Mr. Young, and generally agreed to.

Resolved, That the committee on commerce inquire into the expediency of granting an extension of credit to the state of Illinois on the duty bonds already given, or hereafter to be executed, on the importation of rail road iron into that state.

Resolved, That the same committee inquire into the expediency of establishing ports of entry and delivery for the Great Lakes, Alton and Chicago, in the state of Illinois.

Resolved, That the same committee inquire into the expediency of establishing a marine hospital for sick and disabled seamen and indigent passengers navigating the Mississippi and Ohio rivers at the city of Cairo, in the state of Illinois.

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the abandonment of Kick Island in the state of Illinois as a military post.

All the parts of the president's message were appropriately referred, save that which relates to finance; which, on motion of Mr. Webster, was postponed until Wednesday next, there being 20 yeas and 19 nays.

Mr. Benton asked leave to bring in a bill to establish a prospective and permanent pre-emption system; which having been granted, Mr. B. made some preliminary remarks, intimating that he designed to report the bill on Wednesday next, and then tested the vote, and on that he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. Hubbard was not prepared to vote on the bill until he understood its details; and would, therefore, defer his vote until the bill was printed, and the further discussion postponed until Wednesday next, which was agreed to.

A number of bills were introduced, twice read and appropriately referred; which will be noticed hereafter.

On motion of Mr. Young, the senate proceeded to ballot for chaplain; when the rev. Mr. Cookman was duly elected. The vote stood:

For the rev. Mr. Cookman, 25 yeas.

For the rev. Mr. Thurston, 10 do.

For the rev. Mr. Shaw, 4 do.

On motion, the senate adjourned.

December 13. The president pro tem. communicated to the senate a message covering reports from Mr. Young, superintendent of the coast survey, showing the progress made therein during the year, and also of the work for the fabrication of standard weights and measures.

Also, a letter from the secretary of the treasury, reporting the same in compliance with the 5th section of the act for the relief of interest debtors of the United States. Referred to the committee on the judiciary.

A number of petitions were presented and referred, and several petitions were removed from the files of the secretary's office and again referred to appropriate committees.

Mr. Fulton, from the committee on public lands, reported the following bills, without amendments: A bill to authorize the inhabitants of the township of right north, range thirty-two west, in the state of Arkansas, to enter a section of land in lieu of the sixteen section in said township, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes.

A bill authorizing the inhabitants of fractional township ten south, of range one east, in the state of Arkansas, to enter one-half section of land for school purposes.

A bill to authorize the committee on the public lands, reported the following bills, without amendments:

A bill to relinquish to the state of Alabama the two per cent. fund reserved by the act for her au-mission into the union, to be applied to the making of a road or roads leading to said state.

A bill to establish an additional land district in the state of Alabama.

A bill to grant other lands to the inhabitants of townships deprived of the 16th section by Indian reservations.

A bill to relinquish the reversionary interest of the United States to a certain reservation in the state of Alabama.

Mr. Hubbard, from the committee of claims, reported without amendment, the bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine deca against the United States.

Mr. Norvell, from the committee on the public lands, reported, without amendment, the following bills:

A bill granting to the state of Michigan a quantity of land to aid said state in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Marie; and

A bill to create an additional office in the state of Michigan, and for other purposes.

The following bills were introduced on leave, twice read and appropriately referred, viz:

By Mr. Sevier, of Indiana, a bill to authorize the Mount Carmel and New Albany rail road company to enter on a credit a quantity of land to aid the company in the construction of a rail road from New Albany, in the state of Indiana, to Mount Carmel, in the state of Indiana.

A bill to regulate the land offices in the state of Indiana, and for other purposes.

By Mr. Tappan: A joint resolution to limit the tenure of office of the judges of the federal courts of the United States.

By Mr. Hubbard: A bill to provide for the settlement of the claims of New Hampshire against the United States.

By Mr. Norvell: A bill to authorize the president of the United States to cause certain surveys to be made.

The resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, calling on the secretary of the treasury for certain information in relation to the public lands, came up in its order.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, having suggested amendments to the resolution, the same were adopted; and the resolution, as amended, reads as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to compile and report aforesaid, such statements showing the quantity of land reported by the registers and receivers of the several land offices, in pursuance of a resolution of the senate of the 25th of April, 1829, to have been unsold on the 30th day of June, 1829, after having been offered at the minimum price per acre, discriminating between the several land districts, what proportion of the land so unsold on that day consisted of first rate land, and what was unfit for cultivation, according to the reports of the said officers; what was their estimate of the average value per acre of the unsold land, and what part of said land so remaining unsold on the 30th June, 1829, aforesaid, has since been sold, and at what price, discriminating between the amounts sold in each of the districts. And the secretary is further directed to cause parallel columns to be prepared, exhibiting in one connected view the quantity of land unsold on the day aforesaid in each district, the amount so sold, the value as assessed or estimated by the land officers, and the prices at which the lands have been actually sold, and the aggregate value of the land as assessed, and the aggregate amount of the sales made since the 30th June, 1829, in each land district.

Resolved further, That said secretary cause to be taken in compiling report aforesaid, such alterations as may have been made in the said statements, as embraced by said reports, made pursuant to the said resolution of the senate of the 25th of April, 1829, showing in what districts, and to what amounts, said districts have been enlarged or diminished since the said 30th of June, 1829, and also what new lands then embraced by said several land districts, have since been sold.

Resolved further, That the secretary cause to be communicated statements showing, in separate columns, the quantity of public land which has been offered for sale, and which has been offered and not sold, at the minimum price, in each state and territory, for a period of five years, and less than ten years; the quantity so offered and remaining unsold for ten years, and less than fifteen years; the quantity so offered and remaining unsold for fifteen and less than twenty years; the quantity so offered and remaining unsold for more than twenty and less than thirty years; and the quantity which has been offered and not sold, and remained unsold for more than thirty years; showing the aggregate at the foot of each column, and the general aggregate of all the items, which have been offered and not sold, and remained unsold for five years and upwards up to the last returns.

The resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. Clay, to repeal the rub-treasury law, coming up in its order—

Mr. Clay said it had never been his purpose, in offering this resolution, to invite or partake in an argument on the great measure to which the resolution related, nor was it his purpose now. He would as lief argue to the convicted criminal, when the rope was round his neck, and the cart was about to remove from under his body, to persuade him to escape from the gallows, as to argue now to prove that this measure of the sub-treasury ought to be abandoned. But Mr. C. had offered the proposition which he wished to submit as a resolution; and it was now due to the senate that he should say why he had presented it in that shape.

It was the ordinary course in repelling an inquiry either to move a resolution for an inquiry by a committee on the subject of repeal, or else ask leave to bring in a bill to repeal the measure which they wished to repeal. But the measure which was now under consideration was not a bill. But these ordinary forms might be and ought to be dispensed with. And if they should look for examples to the only period which bore any analogy to that of the present, they would find that the House had power, but under circumstances so different from those attending the accession of the President of North Breda. At that time the alien law had not been limited in time, but had been made permanent in its operation. It was not, therefore, ridiculous to have moved a resolution of inquiry as to the expediency of repelling that most odious measure? Besides, the sub-treasury had now been established, and the subject of unnecessary expenditure and reiterated argu-ments were not those that of the duration of the last war. Under these circumstances, a discussion of the measure would be both unnecessary and misplaced. It was sufficient to say that the House had resolved to repeal the measure, and that the senators of nineteen states had been instructed to repeal it. It might, indeed, be contended that the presidential election would be a sufficient answer to the question. But there might well be a dispute about it. Goveaux on the other side had said that such and such an election had decided this or that measure, one instance of which related to a Bank of the United States, and which was a subject of great and long-continued controversy. But on one point there could not be a diversity of opinion, and that was, that this nation, by a tremendous majority, had decided that the President should be elected by the people. The nation speaks and wills and commands, what was to be done! There was no necessity of the formation of sending to a committee, for a slow process of inquiry, but there was a necessity of doing what the House had decided to do. The House had decided that it was instructed to reform. The only question now was, who would act against the will of the nineteen states; and Mr. C. thought gentlemen who profess to be patriots would not do so. He thought that he could not hesitate to comply with it now.

Sir, (said Mr. C.) I had hoped, for on that the president of the United States, when he communicated his late message to congress, would announce the fact which I have stated, and would have conformed to it in his suggestions to congress. I would not, indeed, have asked the president to present such a message, but I would have expected him to congress, "I have been wrong all this time, and I now retract my error." Sir, it would have been unmanly to urge him to such a step, and I would not have required it of him. But we had a right to expect that the president would have said what was the fact on this subject, that the nation had decided to amend the constitution, and that he would have recommended that the will of the country should be obeyed. But least of all could we expect that he would recommend, as he did, certain improvements of this measure, and that senators should concur in amending a measure against which the nation had decided. And, even if they should persevere in such a course, I would not have expected that they should have said that the measure cannot be continued after the new president shall commence his administration.

Our words to the effect of the repeal. What has been said of this measure? It is said to have been very successful, by the report of the secretary of the treasury. Sir, I would have been much better pleased if that document had gone into detail, and had told us what had been done, and what changes had been made, and really taken place, arising out of this measure. All this he has omitted, and he has only told us that the measure has so far satisfied all our expectations, and that it has been most favorable in its operation. But what is its operation? Sir, I am far from the creditors general, and was I was much surprised to find that a gentleman of the rank of a honorable senator from New Hampshire, (Mr. Hubbard) can tell, who, on all occasions, has stood forth the ready protector and advocate of the secretary of the treasury, though I must say it was a most ungrateful return for the secretary of the treasury to have been so grossly deceived. I am glad to learn from the honorable chairman of the committee on finance, (Mr. Wright), who is one of the instructions against the measure, and let him give it in detail, how the sub-treasury has acted and how it is now working; how it is varying the financial and commercial concerns of this country. Sir, I can tell you that I have read the resolutions, and I understand and I understand that not the slightest difference has arisen from what was going on before the 4th of July last in the operation of this system. Now, as then, the notes of all the specie paying banks are received, and the same is true of the notes of the government general. The process is this: A merchant in New York who has to pay say $400, gives two checks, of $200 each, but no specie. One of these checks is endorsed "specie," but the other has no such endorsement. He takes the check without the "specie" bank and credited, not to the government, but to the receiver general, on his own private account. That is the action of the sub-treasury. Both checks are cashed paper, convertible at the will of the holder into specie. The check without the "specie" endorsement is no more specie than the one without the endorsement. And such was, in fact, the usage before the 4th of July last. Prior to that, the paper of no bank not paying specie was received, and it is the same now. The only change in the operation of this measure. Prior to the 4th of July last, in New York, for example, the moony was received, and placed in the banks on private account, and the government had no control over it. And so it is in all the other cities. The government has no control over it. Allen, and government has no control over it. The result is, that the whole revenue passes under the care and custody of a private individual, into some bank. If I am right in this, it is very clear that the government has no control over the money. It is very inconsiderable, and must so continue. But I trust, if the account is to be kept with the banks, that instead of individuals, it will be opened, as it formerly always was, with the treasurer of the U.

I think, then, Mr. President, that no sort of inconvenience can possibly result from the repeal of this measure. But even if it could, that is now no consideration for us; but when we have our instructions, I at least shall obey the will of nineteen states.

Forbearance, then, from a general discussion, which has been continued three years and three months. I am now ready for the vote on the resolution, though I shall not urge it. If gentlemen want farther time, I will give it. I will not, however, be obliged to stand to draw them a request so reasonable as that.

Mr. Wright said he was from one of the nineteen states which the senator from Kentucky had addressed, and he would not have been so happily rejoiced in this movement. He rejoiced that there was a disposition in the party now about to come into power, to make precisely the issue that was to be made by this bill. He would not have thanked the senator for presenting this proposition. He would say, also, with that senator, that he did not desire further to discuss the measure, either before or after the vote. He would not say, however, that, when the senate should act on the proposition, they might act with an understanding of what it was, and when the senate was full. But it was not so. It was not so. It was not so. It was not so. A member had left, and had not yet returned. But in any case, if the senate were to act on the subject, he desired they might go directly to the object of the proposition, without the delay of sending it to a committee.

The senator from Kentucky was singularly impressed with the clearness of the revuls of the late election at least the one point of the sub treasury; and Mr. W. would not say whether or not that point was the one which he would have been sure to vote for in W. the first election in this government, wh principles were not declared, and when measures in prospect were not avowed; and it is the strongest possible apology for me to say that no measure was then offered by the election. We had a general election for electors, when, we had the fashion for candidates to avow their principles; and yet we have heard gentlemen on the other side attempting to parry the issue, and to contend that nothing prejudiced by the popular voice was decided by the election. I have no objection to the question of the congressional election of 1828 and 1839. If ever there was a distinct issue, it was then. It was, as the senator says, pending this war of more than three years, that this measure was then almost the only point in controversy. And it was then that it was one which was equally favorable to it, and the measure was consequently adopted. And this was done by the country panning the controversy. That popular mind may have changed; but, if so, and if it has now pronounced against this measure, it was equally favorable to it, and it has it been in favor? Was it a national back? And will the renator from Kentucky contend that it was?

Will the party assume it? And there is another political party with other views, (conservatives); will they return to the deposit banks; and will the honorable senator admit that he does not say that they will select either one or the other of these measures. But the honorable senator will triumph declaration against this measure. And how is it so? By what declaration of the opposite party is he to determine this point? Sir, I had supposed that the honorable senator, in saying this thing, it was that we should pull down this magnificent building and erect a log cabin in its place; and, instead of these splendid pictures and other things, erect a log cabin in its place. But the senator will not say that this was to be the result. And yet we can prove that with double the force and testimony with which we can prove the truth of the proposition, that the destruction of the sub-treasury measure? And still we are to be silent and submit, because of such a popular decision. Sir, I will not say a word against this decision, when it is fairly ascertained. It is likely to bring into power shall come constitutionally into their places. I shall be one of the first ready to render constitutional submission. But, in a verdict against the measure, I am ready to admit that it decides against this measure.

What, then, is the argument of the senator from Kentucky in favor of this precipitate repeal? Is it that the measure has made mischief in the country? That it has done evil to the people? No, I do not understand him. But it is that it is not carried out in its terms and spirit; that the law is not observed, but violated. The senator may be right in this, for I am not able to testify as to its correlative facts. But if it is so, does it follow that the law is to be repealed because it is not observed? Should we not rather institute an inquiry whether these officers do their duty?

And if the senator had thought fit to take Philadelphia as his example, he might have made a different case. I know that in New York all the banks are specie-paying banks; and I know it is the constructive duty of the receiver general to receive three-fourths of the duties there in specie-paying paper. But does the senator say that any checks are received there on non-specie paying banks? And if it is an individual who takes the money to the vault, is the law violated or the community injured? His argument, as I understand it, was, that they were little benefited by it, and therefore it was not a wise or a proper measure. But is it not better as it is now, than if it were willy nilly to be executed?

In conclusion, Mr. W. disclaimed any desire to enter into the general argument, and called for the yeas and noys on the question of the resolutions, which were ordered.

Mr. Clay. Mr. President, it is always a pleasant to me when I have the honor to submit a proposition in a form so acceptable to the honorable senator from New York; and I am disposed to allow the honorable senator to have the honor of the proposition desired by the senator, or postponing this measure till the senate shall be more full. And as I am no Christian, or endeavor to be so, I will not return evil for good. Though I recollect, when this measure was first introduced, the honorable senator from New York would not allow a single day to the senator from Delaware, (Mr. Clayton); though he would not then, though earnestly entreated, allow the senator from New York a single night; though all this was done with the concurrence of the senator, still I am for returning good for evil, and I am very happy that better days and more liberal sentiments are coming. I will concur in any reasonable postponement which the senator may desire.

But while, p, I will notice a few remarks of the senator from New York. He says this is a very convenient party now coming into power, because it is without avowed principles—a coat skin, like a cabin party. And before I proceed further, I must tell you that I have no objection to a coat skin party, so long as the coat is made of the wool of the men who have been driven out of power by a party whose residence is a log cabin and whose covering is coat skin? Sir, there must be something wrong about it, or the defeated party would have never met so hard a fate from a party which they look so much upon as a coat skin party, and which is so much more than a coat skin party. I think I am safe in saying the senator is correct. But does he in fact know my principles or the principles of my friends with respect to this sub treasury measure? Have not we been battling with the whole country on one side against this identical measure? The senator tells that the popular voice was in favor of the sub treasury measure, and that the elite of the people were in the popular branch. Sir, I hope he will relieve me of the necessity of looking into that New Jer-any affair, and of discussing the manner in which that gallant state was stripped of her sacred rights and her authority trampled under foot, in a manner degrading to a deliberative assembly, and disgraceful to the age in which we live. But I will not go into it. In the progress of the war gentlemen did gain a little, and we were subject to reverses prior to 1840. But who that regards the truth, and has been attentive to the progress of events, can rise in his place and deny that the elections of 1840 repeated the scenes of 1800? They were reversed against it; the object was put off, and to dispose with a measure which had disturbed the community, and deranged the affairs of the country for more than three long years. It is not at all like the cases alluded to in the session and former elections. The election of 1832, for instance, was construed into an expression of public opinion against the bank of the United States.—

But we all know that general Jackson was then in favor of a bank of the United States. He so said in his message, and he was then supported on the ground that he was friendly to the establishment of a bank of the United States. And I then denied as I do now that the interest of gentlemen from those elections was justly drawn. But now, whether the late election is favorable to a bank of the United States or to a league of banks, on one point, and that is as respects this measure, it is utterly impracticable there can be two opinions.

The honorable senator calls on us to say what other measure is to be resorted to after that is destroyed—a bank of the United States or local banks. Sir, sufficient to the day is the evil there is. We have nothing more, but the sub-treasury to handle. That is an obstacle in the way of any measure. Let us first remove that, and it will then be time for the senator from New York to be heard in his inquiries.

But to say a party coming into power are without principle. But does he not know that they are against the sub-treasury, and in favor of some sound and safe regulation of the currency? That they are for economy? That they are against the extravagance of the revolution? That they are in favor of retrenchment in their aid? And that they are opposed to the late fiscal usurpations and abuses of executive power? Sir, the gentleman forgets that the election of 1840 was a case decided on Tuesday, Nov. 2, 1840. He seems to think that he is addressing an assembly in New York, at Faneuil-hall or elsewhere. Because general Harrison did not choose to reply in impetuosity, the gentleman charges him with the part of a coward. But of principle. But, on all subjects he was manly and open, and it was on principle that the people brought him into power. But do gentlemen really mean to assert that they are without principle? No, sir, no. They know the principles of the new administration well enough. They know that it will not denounce bank paper and then give us treasury notes; that it is against all exponents of this kind; that the administration will be equally and fairly conducted; that it will not have debts to a large amount, throwing the government in all its departments—to the Indians, for state stocks made for political purposes, and reduced to two-thirds of their original value; that the Florida war—literally covered over with debt, and all the time preaching against debts, and all the time using treasury notes; and they know, if they do not tell us how much of debts they have incurred, we know we have the means of ascertaining, and cast up the aggregate to a great amount—an enormous and mysterious amount.

Sir, it is the will and pleasure of the majority to vote down the resolution, let them do it unavailingly, and say that they will not do it. The will of the people shall prevail. But if the will of the people is to be carried out, there is no reason for it. But the sub-treasury should be repealed, and I affirm it. Mr. Calhoun (indistinctly heard) said he hoped that the party acting with the senator from Kentucky would have been contented with their success, and would go on with the business of the session. Let the new president when in power prevent this measure of repeal, and in his report said that it would then be time enough to act upon it. If his administration should be really one of retrenchment and economy, Mr. C. would not require how it came in, but would support any act necessary to which he could give aid.

But he did not view this resolution in the same light as the senator from New York. There had been very great excitement, and there now ought to be a calm, so that the people could think over the whole affair, and see the necessity of a law which they could not arrive under excitement.

The senator from Kentucky had said that the present measures under this measure were not more than for the old practice. Why, then, repeat it? But Mr. C. did not hold it to be the same. The sub-treasury, whether it was wise or expedient, was at all events not unconstitutional. The gentleman from Kentucky was now for restoring a state of things which that senator had denounced. The sub-treasury, which all the power should be in the hands of the president. If the practice was as the senator had stated, Mr. C. pronounced it contrary to law, and hoped the senator would move a resolution of inquiry on that subject, and Mr. C. would not be obliged to repeat the results of the law.

Mr. C. proceeded to argue that the sub-treasury was not the only subject at issue in the late election, but there were a thousand issues. He indeed feared that the majority of the people were against the sub-treasury, but he did not whether they were in favor of the condemned United States bank, or of the pet bank system. And let the question come when it might, the only alternative would be either the sub-treasury or the bank of the United States; for he held it impossible that gentlemen ever could go back to that assemblage, rickety, condemned pet bank system. The question, therefore, was between the sub-treasury and a Bank of the United States. Mr. C. would not argue, and he, when general Harrison was asked, then will be the time, and let the question of a bank come when it will. I will resist it with every energy which God and nature have given me, for, (with respect to the bank) it is to be chartered for twenty years, I deem it worse than to have a president for life, and more dangerous to the liberties of the country.

Mr. C. argued still further in favor of a calm. Mr. Henderson argued against the sub-treasury, having been condemned by the late election, and said he did not therefore consider himself instructed on the subject by public opinion.

Mr. Hubert also argued on some points said he was not sorry for the introduction of the resolution; but there would be debate; and Mr. H. was from a state now strongly in favor of the measure. The senator from Kentucky had said that it would be repealed after the 4th of March; but Mr. H. did not know how he could tell, unless it was true, as had been rumored, that gen. Harrison had declared that senator more worthy of being president than himself. Mr. H. expressed his regret that in the election of Mr. Woodbury to the senate, and rejoiced that he was to be succeeded by one so able.

Mr. Allen then moved as a substitute the following:—
Resolved, That the financial policy established at the origin of this government: by the first acts of its legislation, and especially by the 30th clause of the "act to regulate the collection of duties," &c., approved by president Washington, July 18th, 1793; and by the 4th section of the "act to establish the treasury department," &c., approved by president Washington, September 8, 1799; be in strict conformity to the fundamental principles of the constitution.

Resolved, That by a long series of subsequent acts, tending to the great detriment of the public welfare, that policy had been departed from, and was, by the act to provide for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue, approved by president Van Buren, July 4, 1840, fully restored and ought to be adhered to and thereby.

Resolved, That the government ought to collect no taxes from the people, either directly or indirectly, that are absolutely necessary to an economical administration of its affairs.

Resolved, That the taxes paid by the people ought not to be paid by the government to individuals or corporations.

Resolved, That the taxes paid by the people ought not to be placed by the government in the custody of any person not made by the constitution and laws regular to the people.

Resolved, That in the transaction of its own affairs, the government ought to receive and expend no money, except such as is made a law by the constitution.

Mr. H. raised a question whether this substitute was in order, but he was told, as the president pro tem, had just before retired.

On motion of Mr. Hubert, the substitute was ordered to be printed, and the subject was laid on the table till to-morrow. The senate then adjourned.

December 16. The vice president of the United States appeared and took the chair.

Mr. Phelps and Mr. Mead also appeared in their places.

The vice president communicated to the senate a letter from the war department, covering a report of the board of dragoon officers assembled at Carlisle for the purpose of witnessing an exhibition of horsemanship, and a report of the board of dragoon officers, in respect to the purchase of a new war-proof ammunition, invented by Samuel Colt.

Mr. King presented a memorial from the legislature of Alabama, asking the establishment of a land office in the late Cherokee purchase.

Several petitions and papers were presented by Messrs. Smith, of Indiana; Merrick, Young, Rogers, Wade and Linn, on private claims which were appropriately referred.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on roads and canals, reported the bill by him introduced on yesterday for the benefit of the New Albany and Mount Carmel rail road company, and for other purposes, and it recommended its passage.

Mr. Williams, from the committee on naval affairs, reported the following bills without amendment.

A bill to regulate the pay and emoluments of officers in the navy.

A bill to regulate and establish the navy ratings. Mr. Wall, from the committee on the judiciary, reported the following bills:

A bill supplementary to an act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases.

A bill to prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States or altering any such foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin.

A bill more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

Mr. Tallmadge asked and obtained leave to introduce the following joint resolution to amend the constitution of the United States to relation to one president.

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, (two-thirds of both houses deemed necessary), That the following article be added to the constitution of the several states as an amendment to the constitution of the United States, which article when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, to be valid, to all intents and purposes as part of the said constitution: "The president of the United States shall hold office for one term of four years, and shall be ineligible thereafter."

The following bills were introduced on leave, twice read, and appropriately referred, viz:

By Mr. Smith, of Indiana, a bill to confirm to the state of Indiana the lands selected by that state for the purchase of that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal that lies between the mouth of Tippecanoe river and Tipton, and for other purposes.

By Mr. Prentiss, a bill to authorize the payment of insolvent prisoners in certain cases.

By Mr. Fulton, a bill to perfect the titles to lands south of the Arkansas river.

By Mr. Sevier, a bill asking appropriations for the removal of the dead river.

A bill to authorize the legislature of the state of Arkansas to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools in that state; and

A bill to revise the act entitled "an act to enable claimants to locate within the limits of Missouri and the territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved the 26th May, 1824, and an act amending the same, and extending the provisions of said act to claimants to lands within the states of Louisiana and Mississippi.

By Mr. Anderson, a bill to amend the act entitled "an act to authorize the state of Tennessee to name grants and perfect titles to vacant lands heretofore scried, and to settle the claims to vacant and appropriated lands within the same."

By Mr. Henderson, a bill to confirm the survey and location of claims for lands in the state of Missouri, north of the river and south of the 31st degree of north latitude.

On motion of Mr. Hubert,

Resolved, That the committee of claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to James H. Bell compensation for his services in removing Indians from the military reservation attached to Fort Leavenworth.

On motion of Mr. Linn,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the most, either specially or generally, for receiving the returns of the

A like motion was adopted, introduced by Mr. Clay, of Alabama, for extending the time for completing the census in those states or districts where the census had not been made during the prevalence of disease or other cause.

On motion of Mr. Wall,

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the removal of certain obstructions in the navigation of the river Passaic and of Newark bay, in New Jersey.

Also, on the same committee to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the removal of the obstructions in the navigation of the sound or kill Van Hook, and in the harbor of Poughkeepsie, between New York and the city of New York, in the year 1840, New York, in the report of cap. Kearney and others.

decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—yeas 299, nays 8.

And so the votes of Mr. Winthrop and Mr. Jan. I. Williams were received; in consequence of which, the vote, instead of being 90 against 89 for reconsideration, stood 91 for reconsideration, and 90 against it.

The speaker said that the motion of Mr. Steady for reconsideration being carried in the affirmative, the motion of Mr. Albion, made on the 9th instant, was the subject of the next business.

Mr. Steady then moved to amend Mr. Albion's motion so as that 5,000 copies of the message, with the accompanying documents, be printed, and 15,000 without the documents.

Mr. Fillmore moved that the whole number of the message to be printed be reduced to one-half with documents, and the other half without.

The question on Mr. Fillmore's amendment was put and negatived.

Mr. Briggs then moved to amend the amendment of Mr. Steady by printing 10,000 with the documents, and 5,000 without.

The question on this motion was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays—yeas 110, nays 96.

Mr. Thompson, of Kentucky, rose and announced to the house that SIXTH H. ANDERSON, his predecessor in this congress from the 8th district in Kentucky, had departed this life, at his residence in Garrard county, since the last session. Mr. T. remarked that his death was a public calamity, because the country, in the morning of his life, and his career of usefulness was a sacrifice of her most promising sons. In the councils of his native state, he had rendered service to that state, and achieved for himself an enviable reputation.

Mr. Thompson said that his services had not only manifested to this body the rich attainments and high order of intellect that, combined with his private virtues, had secured to him not only public confidence at home, but also that respect and attachment which all the better sympathies of social life ever accord to merit and worth. The bar of which he was a member and an ornament, in his native state, regret his unluckily death his district lost the loss. Allied with the best talents of the state, he has left a young family to mourn the bereavement of a kind parent and an affectionate husband. Mr. T. presented the following resolutions as a token of condolence to that family, and as the last kind office and tribute of respect we can pay to the memory of one who yet lives in the cherished remembrances and affections of his friends, his relatives, and of the state of which he was a favorite child, and on whom the richest high and proud hopes of future usefulness and eminence. There is allotted to but few a better and brighter fortune than seemed to await him. The sentiment that "they whom the gods love die young" was a tender delusion of heathen superstition, in this instance, he trusted, but exemplified and adopted by a wise and mysterious dispensation of the Christian's Providence. The malediction, "May you die from home," was an imprecation he had no energy making-out enough to utter, and he now reposes as he lived and died, surrounded by his household and friends.

Resolved, That this house with deep regret have heard the announcement of the death of SIXTH H. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, late a member of this congress.

Resolved, That to testify their regard for the deceased, and as an evidence of the sympathy they feel, and hereby tender to his surviving relatives, they will wear crepe on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, As a further testimony of respect for the deceased, that when this house adjourn to-day, it is a journey to morrow.

Mr. Letz, of Pennsylvania, rose and addressed the house as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER: In accordance with a practice which has been sanctioned by long usage, I rise to discharge a painful duty, in doing which I feel sure the house will sympathize with me. I rise, sir, to announce the death of WILLIAM RAMSEY of Kentucky, who was a distinguished member of the Pennsylvania delegation, and represented the Cumberland district. He died suddenly, in October last, in the city of Baltimore, somewhat remote from the bosom of his near relatives, but where, however, there were not wanting friends to show appropriate marks of respect to his memory. His death was not less sudden than melancholy. From early life he was afflicted with feeble health and a weak constitution.

Having been called, by the people of his district, to serve them in the national legislature of his native country, and desirous to execute the trust reposed in him, he struggled through the last unusually arduous and exciting session, in the discharge of his duties, in a manner alike honorable to himself, gratifying to his friends, and satisfactory to his constituents. At the close of the session he found his constitution rapidly yielding to the ravages of a confirmed consumption; and, during the recess of congress, in the youth of his days, with the faintest rays of life before him, (could he have lived to realize them), and at a time when, one would think, he might be buoyant with hope, he sank a victim to gloomy melancholy, leaving numerous friends to lament his premature and deplorable death.

I have never been able to feel fully the propriety of panegyric on occasions like this; it excites little or no interest where the subject of it is unknown and cannot reach his ear, nor enhance his character in the esteem of those who know his goodness, his talents and his virtues. I may be indulged, however, in simply saying that Mr. RAMSEY, as a man, was liberal and kind—as a friend, was true and faithful. He enjoyed the advantages of a superior education, received in this country; and he visited some of the most famous places in Europe in the anxious pursuit of knowledge and for the improvement of his health.

Some time after his return from Europe, he was, in 1838, elected to the 26th congress, and in 1840 was again returned, by a generous and enlightened constituency, to the 27th congress. But, alas! he is now no more. He died a high-minded and honorable man.

Without making further remark, I ask the house to pay the customary tribute of respect to the memory of a deceased member, by adopting the resolutions which I hold in my hand, and now send to the chair.

Resolved, That the members of the house will testify their respect for the memory of WILLIAM RAMSEY, by wearing crepe on the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved, That the house do now adjourn.

The speaker put the question on these resolutions, and they were agreed to without a dissenting voice; and thereupon the speaker adjourned the house until to-morrow, 12 o'clock.

Thursday, Dec. 12. Mr. Jones, of Virginia, moved the committee of ways and means, after termination of the house to report at this time a bill making partial appropriations for the service of the year 1841; leave being granted, he reported the bill, which was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Jones then moved that the house do now go into the committee of the whole on the bill; which, being agreed to, the speaker left the chair, and it was taken by Mr. Briggs. The bill was then read, and proposed to make the following appropriations: For pay and mileage of members of congress $250,000.

For pay of officers of congress, 25,000
For contingent expenses of the senate, 25,000
For contingent expenses of the house of representatives, 100,000.

Mr. Cushing proposed an amendment, appropriating $125,000 to pay the compensation allowed by the act of 1837, for the services of the electors who bring to the seat of government, the electoral votes for president and vice president at the recent presidential election; which was agreed to.

The committee then rose and reported the bill to the house, and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time forthwith. It was accordingly read the third time, passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The resolution from the senate for the appointment of a joint committee to direct the expenditure of money appropriated for the library of congress, was, on motion of Mr. Tillinghast, taken up, considered and adopted.

Mr. Briggs said that, in looking into the printed report of the state of the finances, laid on his table to-day, he had discovered what he conceived to be an error in the print. The excess of exports was set down at $16,300,000; it evidently should be something over forty three millions. He noticed it, and thought might be corrected in the extra number of the document which the house had ordered to be printed.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, inquired whether the error was in the print or in the original? If in the original, the house had no right to correct; it should be returned to the secretary of the treasury for correction.

Mr. Briggs could not say whether the error was in the original or the print.

Mr. Garrison, of Virginia, said it should be ascertained in which copy the error existed; and if found to be in the print, it should be corrected as matter of course.

Alter some further desultory debate, the clerk was then directed to cause the error to be corrected.

On motion of Mr. Everett, it was ordered that it was

Resolved, That the postmaster-general be directed to lay before this house a list of all expenditures in the transportation of the mail, made since the adjournment of the session, and the date when such expenditures were made, and the time when they took effect; and the amount of the reduction of compensation on each.

Mr. Peterson, at his request, was excused from serving on the committee on the public buildings and grounds.

Mr. Hand, in pursuance of notice given on Thursday last, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal all acts heretofore passed on that subject.

The bill was then introduced by Mr. Hand and was read twice by its title; he then moved that it be printed.

Mr. Russell moved that it be referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Hand moved that it be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The question on sending the bill to the committee of the whole, was decided in the affirmative, by precedence by the rules, the yeas and nays were ordered, and, being taken it was decided in the negative, yeas 96, nays 88. The bill was then sent to the committee on the judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Fillmore moved the following resolution; which was read and agreed to.

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house what machines, tools, or implements, if any belonging to the military service, or used in the construction or repair of the harbors or piers, or other public works on the great northern and western lakes, or the waters connected therewith, have been sold since the first day of January, 1840, and the cost of such machines, implements or tools, respectively, and the price for which they were respectively sold, and the authority by which such sales were made.

The vote proceeded, on motion of Mr. Parish, of Maine, to an election of chaplain. The vote was taken twice, and resulted as follows:

	1st ball.	2d ball.
Rev. Mr. Braxton , 101
" " Bates , 31		13
" " Reese , 60		56
" " Danforth , 14		withdrawn
" " Snow , 4		0
" " Briggs , 1		0

Mr. Braxton having received a majority of all the votes given was declared duly elected.

On motion of Mr. Reed, the message from the president, communicated to the house a few days ago, recommending an immediate appropriation for the relief of the navy pension fund, was referred to the committee on naval affairs.

The speaker then laid before the house sundry communications, viz:

A letter from the treasury of the United States, (Mr. Selden), transmitting copies of his accounts for the 1st, 2d and 3d quarters of the year 1839; the accounts for the 4th quarter and the 1st and 2d quarters of the present year have not yet been adjusted by the accounting officers; as soon as they are adjusted, they will be laid before the house. The letter was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the first comptroller of the treasury, accompanied by a list of balances which have remained due more than three years on the books of the fourth auditor, (navy). Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

A report from the secretary of war, made under the order of the 7th July last, calling on him for the amount of "expenditures in suppressing Indian hostilities in Florida, showing distinctly the various items of expenditure." Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the secretary of the treasury, accompanied by a report made in pursuance of the 8th section of the act of the 2d March, 1831, for the relief of insolvent debtors to the United States. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the secretary of war, accompanied by statements of the expenditures on account of the contingencies of the various branches of the war department for the year ending 30th September, 1840; and a list of the officers of the army to $2,587,81; commissioner of Indian affairs to $1,508,87; commissioner of pensions to $1,405,78; commanding general to $241,91; adjutant general to $1,081,65; quartermaster general to $762,84; commissary general of subsistence to $2,211,81; commissary general of purchases to $570,11; surgeon general to $543,61; ordinance office to $962 45; engineer office to $1,220 16; topographical bureau to $1,345 66; paymaster general to $416 17; superintendent northwest executive building to $4,239 26. These documents were referred to the committee on expenditures in the war department.

A letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the report made to the treasury department by professor Hauser, superintendent of the survey of the coast and of the work for the fabrication of the United States weights and measures, showing the progress made during the present year in those works respectively. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the secretary of the treasury, with statements of the expenditures made by him in the various offices of the treasury department for the year ending 30th September last. Referred to the committee on expenditures in the treasury department.

A letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting an account (in print) of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year 1839, accompanied with many valuable statistical statements. It was laid on the table.

A letter from the secretary of state, transmitting statements of the expenditures on account of contingencies for the year 1839: amounting for the department and for publishing the laws to $16,047 44; same for foreign papers and books to $4,62 13 4; same for the purchase of books to $1,000 00; to $3,555 02; expenses of foreign intercourse to $12,963 41. Referred to the committee on expenditures in the department of state.

A letter from the first comptroller of the treasury, transmitting a list of balances due more than three years on the books of the second auditor; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the first comptroller, transmitting a list of balances standing on the books of the treasury more than three years against receivers of public moneys. Ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Mr. Russell moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of the treasury be authorized to employ a clerk, at the rate of four dollars for each day's session, under the appointment of the committee.

Mr. W. Cod Johnson moved to amend the resolution by adding "and that the committee for the District of Columbia be authorized to employ a clerk, when that committee may think it necessary, at the rate of four dollars per day."

A letter from the secretary of state on the propriety of appointing clerks to committees, which was participated in by Mr. W. Cod Johnson, Mr. Russell, Mr. Beatty, Mr. Thompson, of Miss, and Mr. Craig.

Mr. Johnson's amendment was disagreed to, and the resolution offered by Mr. Russell was twice agreed to by yeas and nays—80 to 63.

Mr. Fillmore moved the following resolution, which was read and adopted:

Resolved, That the committee of elections be directed to prepare and report to this house a bill prescribing the mode to be given by the electors in case of a contested election, and regulating the manner of taking testimony therein, and of contesting the same.

Mr. John Quincy Adams moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be required to cause to be communicated to this house, so far as may be compatible with the public interest, copies of all documents in the department of state, showing the origin of any political relations between the United States and the empire of China; the first appointment of a consul to reside at or near Canton; whether such consul, or any other subsequently appointed, has ever been received or recognized in that capacity; and the present relations between the government of the United States and that of the Celestial Empire.

This resolution was read, and, before any question had been put thereon, the house adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 16. At 12 o'clock the speaker took the chair, and called for petitions.

Mr. Washburn presented the memorial of the undersigned and undersigned of Boston, setting forth the insufficiency of the ordinary revenue cutters for the New England coast, and particularly for affording prompt relief to merchant vessels in distress, and praying for the substitution of a larger cutter of that station; referred to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Tillghurst presented the petition of Thomas Cook, John G. Howe and others, for duty on imported pins; referred to the committee on manufactures.

On motion of Mr. Tillghurst, the following memorials and petitions, pending at former sessions, were referred anew, under the order of this session, viz.

Memorials of Robert Johnson and others, of Simon Dodge and others, of N. G. Rutgers and others, of Nicholas Brown and others, for a harbor on Block Island.

Of Elisha Dyer and others, for removal of obstructions in Providence river.

Of James Rhodes and others, for removal of obstructions in Patent harbor.

Mr. Griswold presented sundry petitions, viz:

A petition of Seth Driggs, praying for the interference of the government in relation to a claim on the Colombian government. Referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

Three petitions from citizens of New York, asking for the passage of a general bankrupt bill; referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Kingston presented a memorial signed by the citizens of the legislature of Pennsylvania, asking congress adequately to encourage the production of silk; and to assess such reasonable duties on the foreign importations of silk in all their forms as would enable the government to collect a fair proportion of its revenue from that source.

Mr. Doty presented sundry petitions, viz:

Petition of R. C. Paine and others, praying an appropriation for a harbor at Racine, in Wisconsin.

Proceedings of a meeting in the town of Finch, in favor of a harbor at Milwaukee.

Memorial of citizens of Wisconsin, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation of Neush river.

Mr. W. Cod Johnson presented a memorial signed by a large number of the citizens of Washington for a renewal of the charter of the banks of the District of Columbia. This memorial was, at the request of Mr. J. read to the house, and referred to the committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. Atcham, it was Resolved, That a joint committee on enrolled bills be appointed in pursuance of the joint rules of the two houses.

Members, Burke and Taylor were appointed the committee on the part of the house.

Mr. Mark A. Cooper asked leave to offer resolutions; which was granted. He then introduced his resolutions, which were read and adopted, and are as follows:

1. Resolved, That the secretary of war communicate to this house, at as early a day as may be convenient for the department, a list of the reservations made by General Gaines, March, 1832, which remain unaltered, together with the valuations thereof, made under the authority of governor Carroll, former agent, and the value of the same making surveys, and the value of the same as made, and the remarks of the valuers in each case.

2. Resolved, That the secretary of war report to this house, a list of the claims which have been made in the settlement of the conflicting claims for Creek reservations between J. C. Watson & Co. and other claimants; at what time a special commissioner was appointed to adjust the same; who he is the person appointed; whether he has received his per diem pay, and at what rate, since his appointment; and at what time his duties under said contract have been completed.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, the report of the secretary of the treasury and other documents which were before congress at the last session, relating to the trade between the United States and the British colonial possessions, were referred to the committee on foreign affairs.

On motion of Mr. Dellet, of Alabama, it was Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for completing the census in those states or districts where the same has been prevented by sickness or other causes which the officers having that duty in charge may deem proper.

The resolution moved by Mr. Adams yesterday, came up, in order, for consideration.

Mr. Adams explained the object and the importance of the information sought to be obtained by his resolution.

At the suggestion of Mr. Cushing, the resolution was modified so as to insert "other departments" after department of state; and, as modified, the resolution was adopted.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be required to cause to be communicated to this house, so far as may be compatible with the public interest, copies of all documents in the department of state, and other departments, showing the origin of any political relations between the United States and the empire of China; the first appointment of a consul to reside at or near Canton; whether such consul, or any other subsequently appointed, has ever been received or recognized in that capacity; and the present relations between the government of the United States and that of the Celestial Empire.

On motion of Mr. Pettibone, it was Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the fees and emoluments of district attorneys of the United States, or of directing such fees and emoluments, beyond a specified amount, to be paid into the treasury.

The speaker then called the states for resolutions, when

Mr. Clifford, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill to provide for the settlement of the claim of the state of Maine, on account of the services of her militia. The bill was twice read, and referred to the committee on military affairs.

On motion of Mr. Lincoln, it was Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to this house what "subordinate custom house officers" have been dispensed with within the period of two years" last past, to which he refers in his late report on the state of the finances; and what cases have been the rate of compensation previously paid to those officers for their services. And also what additional number of such officers have been appointed or employed within the same period, in the several collection districts in the United States, and at what rates of compensation, with the dates of their appointment and employment respectively. Also, in what cases and to what extent "the compensation of officers and high house keepers has been reduced." And also, in what cases (if any) the compensation to any officer in the department employed in the collection of the customs, or otherwise, has been increased. And that he present the required information in such tabular form as to exhibit the comparative number of officers, and the amount of their compensation in each collection district, at the commencement and close of the said period of two years next preceding the date of the said late annual report, and also the relative cost of collecting the revenue from customs to the amount of revenue collected in each of the last two years, computed with the cost of collection and amount collected annually, since the 1st day of May, 1839. And that he also inform this house what officers "now employed in the collection of duties, whose former services he has been unable to find, and who, in consequence of the reduction of late years, at the different places where they are stationed, may be unemployed, and whose offices cannot be abolished without new legislation."

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform this house under what superintendence the custom houses in New York and Boston, respectively, are being constructed, the number and names of the commissioners employed to superintend the construction of said custom houses, the time they have been so employed, and the compensation paid to each.

On motion of Mr. Cushing, it was Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision for the organization of the several district courts of the United States; also, further provision for the institution of civil and admiralty powers in said courts.

The resolution moved by Mr. Tillghurst on the 10th inst. calling upon the secretary of the treasury to report to the house how far and in what manner the sub-treasury law passed at the last session has been carried into execution, was called up by the mover.

Mr. Vandeventer thought the resolution would cut out work enough for all the clerks in the department for the whole session. He opposed it because he believed it unnecessary, as the information, if obtained, would have no effect on any proceedings which might take place in the house upon the subject of a repeal of the sub-treasury.

Mr. Tillghurst explained the resolution, and showed the value of the information asked for, and its pertinency to questions upon which the house may, and probably will, be called to vote; in his remarks he spoke of the judgment of the people upon the sub-treasury law.

Mr. Duncan denied that the issue upon the sub-treasury question had been put to the people in the late election, and that the question was not referred to the next congress on that issue; that it was not, nor was any other public measure the leading principle upon which the presidential election had been decided; for that Geo. Harrison himself, when questioned, had refused to answer.

Mr. Morgan said that the question of the sub-treasury had been put in issue in at least one district, and that that district was the district of Cincinnati; and that he believed Mr. Pendleton could give testimony on that point.

Mr. Duncan said that he was not sure that any such issue had been made in the Cincinnati district.

Mr. Galbraith moved to lay the resolution on the table, and on this question the yeas and nays were called at 10.

A call of the house was then moved by Mr. Tillghurst, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. Galbraith withdrew his motion to lie on the table; and it was immediately renewed by Mr. Beatty.

The call of the house was then renewed by Mr. Toland.

The question was put, when there appeared for the call 23, against it 56.

A quorum did not vote; the question was therefore not decided.

Mr. Dickinson then moved an adjournment, which was carried; and the house adjourned.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

The following communication, which we find in the Baltimore American, of the 23d instant, bears a resemblance to that of HAZEN, in the Register, the original editor of the Register, which gives it a claim upon us for an insertion. We know not the author, but take leave to assure him, that whilst the volumes compiled and published by our venerated predecessor, have done nothing but justice to the distinguished individual to whom his communication alludes, yet, whenever examined with equal industry, in search of information relative to other prominent public men of this country, who have acted, within the period of his publication, del. dom and sayings will be found no less faithfully "registered" in its pages, or though they too had been especially in the view of the editor.—It is a trait that essentially belongs to the character of the work, and contributes greatly to its intrinsic value.

To the editors of the Age, &c.

GEN. HARRISON. I see by the Politeness papers that public dinners have been invited to J. HARRISON, Esq., author of A Life of Harrison, and gen. JOHN C. MONTGOMERY, the compiler of The Tippecanoe Almanac, as testimonials of the gratitude of their fellow citizens for their efforts to behalf of Harrison and reform. These gentlemen are most worthy of such distinguished marks of favor—for their writings and personal efforts exerted great influence during the campaign.

But whilst our political brethren in Philadelphia are thus honoring the early and active friends of Harrison in that city for their goodness, we seem to have forgotten that Maryland is not only entitled to the honor of having been the first to nominate gen. HARRISON for the presidency, but that a citizen of Baltimore furnished the materials on which the biography of that distinguished individual is based, and by which every reader upon his reputation was replete.

I allude to the late HAZEN NILES, the editor of Niles Register, who zeal in collecting and recording their events in relation to gen. HARRISON during and since the war, and particularly in commending his brilliant achievements to the applause of the country left a record which defies the assaults of malice and of time. Indeed, I have sometimes been impressed with the conviction, that the man of testimony compiled by the younger NILES from the Register and published as a Text Book, that HAZEN NILES was impressed with the conviction that the day was not far distant when general HARRISON would be a candidate for the highest office in the gift of his countrymen, and that such testimony would be required to repel the assaults of the malevolent. It was a similar impression, perhaps, which induced one of the most eloquent and distinguished orators who addressed the people during the late campaign, to declare from the public stand, while alluding to the testimony of The Text Book, that "if HAZEN NILES had left behind him no other evidences of his patriotism and love of country, that that alone should cause his memory to be held in grateful remembrance by every lover of civil liberty."

The intelligence from China is not later than we have direct.

From India it is both later and disastrous, to the British in the extreme.

The London Morning Post of the 10th, says: The unfavorable results of the premature withdrawal of our troops from Scinde and Afghanistan are now being repeated. In the interval that had elapsed since the departure of the previous mail from Bombay accounts had been received there of the British arms having sustained one reverse, and of the loss of a greater number of officers and men than during the whole of the Cabool campaign.

Khelat, the strong hold, which general Willshire captured in such gallant style, has been retaken; the whole of Upper Scinde was in a state of insurrection, and every day intelligence of fresh disasters was received at Bombay. The 1st Bombay grenadier regiment had been nearly cut to pieces in an engagement with the Belooches, when marching through a pass in the mountains to the relief of Kalat.

Five officers and 200 men were killed, and all the baggage, consisting of upwards of 1,000 caises, laden with supplies, horses, ammunition and between 40,000 and 50,000 rupees in hard cash, fell a prey to the Belooches. "Such," says our correspondent "is the effect of the premature withdrawal of our troops from the country, such the result predicted by the dinks of Wellington more than a year and a half ago, the foolish attempt to conduct extensive military operations on a peace establishment."

Vigorous efforts were making at Bombay to retrieve the disasters, brought about entirely by Lord Auckland's penny-wise and pound foolish measures.

Dost Mahomed Khan was still at large, and there were strong suspicions that the Amers of Linn and other native chiefs were intriguing against the British government.

The Khan of Chiva had threatened all the Russian slaves in his dominions, and lieutenant Shakespeare had offered to conduct them to the Russian frontier.

An array of observation was to assemble on the frontiers of N-pool.

LATER. Just as our paper was prepared for press, (a day earlier than usual, in order to have the enjoyment of Christmas), the mail brings us information of the arrival of the steamer Acadia at Liverpool on the 21st instant, bringing London and Liverpool papers to the 4th; twenty-one days later than hitherto received.

The steamer President arrived at Liverpool on the 27th November. Great uneasiness was felt in Liverpool, and ten guineas per cent. was paid at Lloyd's to insure her. She is to leave for N. York on the 10th of February.

Peace in Europe is considered as established.

Money remains in demand in England, but exchange with the continent was more favorable, and lime was confidently expected to improve.

Bank of England on the 26th Nov. advertised to make loans at 5 per cent. on bills not having more than 6 months to run, and other banks were discounting at the same rate.

The failure of the house of Wright & Co. London, caused considerable excitement. They had debased considerably in the fancy speculations at New York. They exhibit assets to the value of £500,000—liabilities 8 to 900,000.

The feeling in relation to American securities was somewhat less prices slightly better, but operations were suspended, waiting for the turn here—in relation to the returning specie payments. Quotations will be found in the Chronicle.

Mr. Jaudon on his arrival in England, published an account of the condition of the United States Bank of Pennsylvania.

A Princess. Queen Victoria, on the 23th Nov. just nine months and eleven days after her marriage, blessed her fond subjects with an heir to the throne of Great Britain, and was "quite as well as could be expected." She had recovered so far as to be able to attach her signature to official papers. The infant was to be christened after the name of her mother, ALEXANDRA VICTORIA, soon after the meeting of parliament.

There is no later intelligence from China. The blockade of Canton has been officially pronounced in Europe.

Recognition of Texas independence. The London Times of Nov. 18th says: "A commercial treaty between Great Britain and the republic of Texas was signed at the foreign office on Monday evening by lord Palmerston and general James Hamilton, the envoy from that republic. This convention, entered into on the basis of perfect reciprocity, of course recognises ipso facto, the independence of the new republic, which is now extricated on the one hand from the dominion of Mexico, and on the other, from the danger of incorporation with the American union. It implies also, unless lord Palmerston should have neglected all the precautions usual in such cases, the belief that Texas is able to maintain her independence."

Attillur Aiken, eq., of London, who came out in the Acadia, the bearer of the despatches concerning the official recognition by Great Britain of the independence of Texas. General Hamilton had not concluded his negotiation for a loan to the young republic, when the Acadia sailed.

The Monitor Parisien says that a loan of 600,000,000 of francs, or 24 millions sterling, will be proposed by the French government. The budget for 1841, will according to the Commerce reach nearly 80 millions sterling!

The remains of Napoleon had arrived, but were not yet landed.

HOLLAND.

The inauguration of the new king took place at Amsterdam on the 25th November.

The Dutch papers give a detailed account of the public debt of Holland, the gross amount of which is 1,357,560,000 florins, equal to about one hundred and fifty millions pound sterling—the greater part of it is only subject to 2 1/2 per cent. interest; but the total charges for interest, &c. is 43,514,000 florins, equal to two-thirds of the whole revenue.

SPAIN.

Embarkment and capture of St. Jean D'Acce.—This formidable fortress, second only it is said to Gibraltar, was attacked by the allied squadron on the 2d Nov. and after a bombardment of 26 hours, from the Austrian frigate La Guerriere, fell into the principal magazine, when in a moment the whole place was in ruins and most of the garrison killed. No further resistance was made. Upwards of 2,000 killed, 3,000 prisoners and a large number of wounded, besides a large quantity of artillery and munitions of war, among them 300 pieces of field artillery and £240,000 in specie. Acre having been the grand depot and arsenal of Mehemet Ali. The garrison was supposed to have consisted originally of 6,000 men.

MEXICO.

The Corpus Christi, an American ship, has been captured and four of her men murdered by the commander of a Mexican launch, named Gonzalez, carrying 16 guns. Gonzalez had letters sent and was commended by the Mexican government to treat with Ribaud and Thompson respecting their pardon and return to the country. On arriving at the bar no vessel was in sight, except the American ship, which Gonzalez boarded. While on board the Mexicans was conversing with the mate, Gonsales took affront at some remark the latter made and ran him through the body with a sword, killing him instantly. The wretch then ordered the sleepers, three in number, to be tied, taken on shore and shot. Two of them fell at the first fire, and while the other was begging for quarters, Gonzalez ordered his ears to be cut off! A second discharge ended his sufferings. The Mexicans pretend that the ship was on a smuggling expedition, but nothing can justify such a diabolical outrage. Major Smith, the American consul at Matamoros, is investigating the affair. [N. O. Pic.]

The commercial house of Messrs. Rubio, at San Louis de Potosi, has entered into an arrangement with the Mexican government, by which it is entitled to import into Matamoros merchandise to the amount of one million of dollars, the duties on which will amount to over $300,000.

The Texian man-of-war schooner San Antonio, lieut. Moore, from Tampico bound to Galveston, has taken three Mexican vessels prizes and burnt another—all valuable.

The Texian minister to Mexico, who was returning to Texas with lieut. Moore, died on the passage, and a gentleman who accompanies him was very sick.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

CONGRESS. George Guest, esq. has been appointed vice consul of the Oriental republic of the Uruguay for the city of Philadelphia, and officially recognized by the president of the United States.

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY—IMPORTANT. Rumors reached on some days since of a British regiment having actually marched into and taken possession of the disputed territory. The next mails brought intimations that it was supposed to be a mistake in the officer commanding, as the civil authorities had received no directions upon the subject. The Boston Atlas of the 13th however confirms the fact of the occupation. It says: "We have seen a gentleman this morning, who left Portland last evening, and who informs us as a fact that a regiment of British troops had arrived at Madawaska, and taken possession of the disputed territory. Capt. Miller, the British messenger, was sent by air John Harvey to give the information to Gov. Fairfield—He knows nothing of the intended occupation until the arrival of the troops, and feeling it to be due from himself to Gov. Fairfield to notify him of the fact. There is some excitement here on the subject. The regiment is about 600 strong. We shall hear more to night." At Bangor and Portland, the cause of the movement was enveloped in mystery—the more so from the circumstance that sir John Harvey, as captain Miller stated, knew nothing of the intended movement until he received official information that it had been made. Capt. Miller left Boston on Tuesday morning for Montreal, taking the road through Vermont, to carry the despatches in return from sir John Harvey to governor general Thompson.

THE TOBACCO CONVENTION.

We regretted not having room to "Register" the proceedings of any of the meetings which took place in the various tobacco growing sections of the union, preparatory to the convention, at many of which interesting views were taken of the condition of the trade. We had laid them by for insertion, but the proceedings of congress and of the legislatures of the states of the union, and the numerous public documents, messages, &c. with which this period of the year is crowded, precludes the hope of finding room for them, unless it be by an extra sheet. We are therefore content to give the content with giving the proceedings of the convention itself.

There can be no doubt of the fact, that the interest of this portion of our community have been long overlooked, and not sufficiently pressed upon at least not sufficiently pressed upon the attention of either of foreign countries—of our own congress—of the AMERICAN COMMUNITY. We rejoice to observe indications of awaking to the subject in earnest.

Washington, Tuesday, Dec. 15, 1840.

Pursuant to public notice, a convention of the tobacco planters of the United States assembled this day in a chamber of the board of aldermen in this city.

A large number of delegates appeared from the several tobacco growing States.

At fifteen minutes past 12, the convention was called to order by the hon. Daniel Jenifer, of Md. on whose motion

Governor Stung, of Maryland, president of the convention held in this city in the month of May last, was unanimously elected president, and took the chair accordingly.

Mr. Jenifer then nominated as vice president a gentleman who, he said, came from a distant state, and who had taken great interest in the matters touching which the convention had assembled—Amoske G. Gordon, of Kentucky.

The nomination was seconded by the hon. Philip Triplett, of Kentucky, and was unanimously agreed to.

And, on motion of Mr. Triplett, John S. Skinner, esq. of Baltimore city, and John Mercer, esq. of Anne Arundel county, Md. were appointed secretaries of the convention.

On the suggestion of the hon. Walter Coles, of Virginia, an additional vice president was ordered to be appointed.

And, on motion of the same gentlemen, Robert W. Bowie, esq. of Md. was unanimously elected to this office.

The hon. Wm. D. Merrick, of Maryland, one of the delegates to the convention, was, on his motion, excused from further attendance this day, by reason of important duties requiring his presence in the senate chamber.

The convention was then addressed at great length by the hon. Daniel Jenifer in a review of the policy pursued for many years past by our own and foreign governments with reference to the tobacco planting interests, and in a general inquiry into the measures which the convention might be called upon to adopt, and into the purposes for which it had been convened.

Mr. J. concluded by offering the following resolution.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the president to consider and recommend such measures as may be deemed most expedient to be adopted by the convention.

The convention was also addressed by the hon. Walter Coles, of Va. and Thomas F. Bowie, esq. of Maryland.

After which, the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

And, on motion of the hon. Joseph R. Underwood, of Kentucky, the committee was ordered to consist of eleven members; but, on the suggestion of T. F. Bowie, esq. the number was subsequently increased to thirteen.

On the suggestion, gentlemen were appointed members of the committee: Hon. Daniel Jenifer, of Maryland, hon. Philip Triplett, hon. Walter Coles, hon. John Miller, John Mercer, esq. Thomas F. Bowie, esq. hon. Joseph R. Underwood, Robert Ghiselin, esq. Wm. Stewart, esq. Thos. Somerville, esq. Wm. L. Gogging, J. D. Freeman, esq. and J. Shaw, esq.

On motion of Robert W. Bowie, esq. the following resolution was adopted.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into and report to the convention to-morrow, the amount necessary to defray the expenses of this convention and the means of providing said amount, as well as to delay arrears of expenses incurred by the last convention.

The committee was ordered to consist of three members; and J. S. Skinner, Robert W. Bowie, and George C. Washington, esqs. were appointed the members thereof.

On motion of Mr. Jenifer, it was then Resolved, That when the convention adjourned to meet to-morrow morning, (Wednesday), at 10 o'clock.

And then, on motion of Mr. Triplett the convention adjourned.

Wednesday, Dec. 16, 1840.

The convention was called to order at 11 o'clock. The hon. James Garland appeared and took his seat as a delegate from the state of Virginia.

J. S. Skinner, esq. from the committee appointed yesterday to inquire into and report the amount necessary to defray the expenses of the present convention, and the means of providing said amount, as well as to delay arrears of expenses incurred by the last convention, made a report, which concluded with a resolution providing that each member pay into the hands of a treasurer to be appointed the sum of $5, to be applied to the purposes above stated.

The report having been accepted, the resolution was seconded by Geo. C. Washington, esq. of Md. was elected treasurer.

Hon. Daniel Jenifer, from the committee of thirteen members appointed yesterday "to consider and recommend such measures as may be deemed most expedient to be adopted by this convention," made the following report:

Mr. Jenifer from the committee appointed by the president to consider and recommend such measures as may be most expedient to be adopted to accomplish the objects of this convention, reported that the limited time allowed them has compelled the committee to confine their report to a general review of the subject.

That since the adjournment of the tobacco convention which met in this city on the 1st of May last, there has been no change in the burdens and restrictions imposed upon the tobacco trade of the United States by the nations of Europe, except in some unimportant matters by our own kingdom; and the facts stated by the committee in their report to that convention are now referred to, and by us reasserted, and their arguments and suggestions adopted. Since the publication of the documents by which the last session, in consequence has been received at the department of state on this subject, except a few unimportant communications from Sardinia and Belgium. No change has taken place with foreign governments in regard to this staple article from what has already been reported. We have no hopes of a favorable action on their part until the congress of the United States shall adopt measures commensurate with the object.

Great Britain still continues her excessive duty of seventy-two dollars and seventy-five cents per hundred pounds, or eight hundred per cent. on the prime cost of this article of our produce, while we continue to receive the product of the labor of her citizens at an average duty of twelve and a half per cent.

France yet continues her still more odious monopoly or regie, retaining in the hands of her king, or those to whom he sells the privilege, the sole right to import, manufacture and sell the American tobacco in that kingdom, by which the quantity of American tobacco which is consumed in France has been reduced to six or seven thousand hogsheads per annum, from which she derives a revenue of ten millions of dollars.

Russia, Spain, Portugal, and some of the minor powers of Europe adhere to their various monopolies under different names, but all tending to the manifest oppression of this our staple. And the German powers included in the Zollverein or commercial union of Germany have not reduced any portion of their trade duties or abolished in the slightest degree their commercial system, in which tobacco is the article most heavily taxed, as it is indeed in every nation in Europe, except Holland and Belgium. They have met us in that spirit of equality which should exist between every civil nation, and have friendly commercial relations; who have a right to insist upon and never should be satisfied without a free exchange of commerce on equal and reciprocal footing.

And with several of the European governments exist for a few years, and just regard to the planting interest requires that they should not be relieved unless the odious burdens and restrictions imposed upon the staple of tobacco be modified.

The treaty with the Hanseatic towns of Lubeck, Bremen and Hamburg expired by limitation in December, 1839, but continues in force until twelve months' notice shall have been given of the intention to terminate it, and a fair opportunity now presents itself to our government to do us justice with these powers.

The American ministers at the court of Great Britain have for many years urged, with great ability, on that government, the propriety of diminishing the duty on tobacco as a matter of justice to the United States on general principles of policy and free trade between two friendly nations; and have shown by arguments, which we think it would be difficult to answer, that, even as a measure of revenue, the excessive duties on the privilege, to a great extent, defeat their own object. But our arguments have proved unavailing, and Great Britain continues her duty of 72½ cents per pound on this product of our labor.

With equal ability our ministers to France commenced with Mr. Jackson, in 1793, and continued down to the present time by gen. Cass, have remonstrated against the French system of monopoly as injurious to the American tobacco growing interest, and injured by its departure from that reciprocity and equality which the French have insisted upon with some statesmen, in their communications with our minister in 1793, in all their commercial intercourse with the United States. Their remonstrances have met no other response than that of the French emperor, who has changed the law creating the monopoly of American tobacco to the year 1852.

By negotiation, therefore, nothing can be expected from her. The last ray of hope from that source has expired, and the American tobacco planters must look to that tribunal which can afford them relief for the evils they endure—to the senate and house of representatives of the United States in congress assembled, who their constituents most appeal for a redress of the grievances herein set forth. And we rejoice that this appeal has been most ably seconded by other sources in various states in the union.

Amongst our agents abroad communications from Mr. Dodge and Mr. Miles, have been repeatedly received by our government, which evince great zeal and labor in the different spheres in which they have acted.

We have seen with pleasure a resolution introduced into the senate of Georgia to instruct their senators and request their representatives to use their best efforts to have a law passed in Congress to tax all French wines, silks and brandies in proportion to the duty which they lay upon our tobacco in their ports. The governor of Virginia has called the attention of the legislature of that state to the subject in his message to them at their present session, and submitted whether it is not expedient, through their representation in congress, to enforce the just claims of their tobacco planters to a reduction of the enormous duties imposed on tobacco by most European governments.

And as early as January, 1837, the legislature of Maryland unanimously passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the senators and representatives of this state in the congress of the United States be and they are to take under their special care this highly important and much neglected interest, and that they be particularly requested to oppose all and every adjustment of the present tariff without obtaining for the tobacco interest a fair and equal participation in the benefits to be derived from such adjustment."

In conclusion, your committee recommend to the convention the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the only effectual remedy for the evils the tobacco interest labor under from the high duties imposed by Great Britain, and the monopolies of France and other nations Europe, of it is to be found in the action of congress, by countervailing duties; and that the convention relies on the wisdom of congress in discriminating between these governments which have and those which have not manifested a disposition to abandon or modify their present oppressive duties and restrictions imposed on tobacco from the United States.

2. Resolved, That it be recommended to the government of the United States, that the treaties now in existence with foreign countries, which contain no stipulations for reciprocity in duties on their respective products, be not renewed.

3. Resolved, That the governors of the several states of this union, engaged in the cultivation of tobacco, be earnestly requested to call the attention of the several legislatures of their respective states to the subject of the American tobacco trade with foreign nations.

4. Resolved, That a copy of the proceedings of this convention be laid before the senate and house of representatives of the United States, and that the senators and representatives from tobacco growing states be earnestly requested to take such speedy and efficient means as in their judgment may be best calculated to accomplish the object contemplated by this convention.

The report and accompanying resolutions having been read—

The convention was addressed at great length by hon. Philip Triplet and hon. Jos. R. Underwood, of Kentucky; George Stewart, esq. of Baltimore; and James Garland, of Virginia; Walter Bonie, esq. and John D. Jenifer, of Maryland; hon. Walter Coles, of Virginia; hon. Wm. D. Merrick, of Maryland; hon. John Jamison, of Missouri; and Thomas F. Bowie, esq. of Maryland.

After which, the report and resolutions were adopted.

On motion of hon. Daniel Jenifer, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be tendered to the mayor and city council of Washington for the use of their hall for the accommodation of the members of this convention.

And on motion of the same gentleman, it was also unanimously

Resolved, That the president be and he is hereby authorized to convene this convention at any time he may deem the interest of the planters may require it.

Whereupon the convention adjourned sine die.

THE ARMY.

Maj. Gen. Scott has reached Washington via Norfolk.

More troops for Florida. The ship Liverpool sailed from New York on Wednesday morning, for Savannah, having on board one hundred and six recruits for the 3d regiment of infantry in Florida.

Captain J. Dimick, 1st artillery, (who returns to Fort Columbus) commands the detachment. Lis. J. W. Parson, 2d infantry, and R. W. Foster, 6th infantry, are attached to the command. These officers will join their regiments in Florida.

A correspondent of the Savannah Georgian, writing from Florida, says: "The only news I have of the progress of the campaign, is the return of col. Riley's command to their respective posts, Fort King, Russell and Holmes. They scouted to the south to within some thirty miles of Tampa and back—some of them marching 250 miles without even the sign of an Indian having been discovered. The country on the route is represented as utterly worthless to a white population."

Savannah, Dec. 9. The express just arrived from Fort King says that 13 Indians came in this morning and delivered up their arms to colonel Riley. They, they, state there are a great many more to come in a few days.

One hundred and seventy recruits, intended for the 3d artillery arrived here on Monday last. Thirty-five arrived at Fort Searle on the same day. The following officers accompanied: major McClintock and Child; lieutenant Bragg, Wyke, Gilman, Van Vleet, Thomas and assistant surgeon Barnes.

J. B. Peyton and V. B. Leidenberger, late 2nd lieutenants of the 3d infantry, U. S. army, have been dropped from the service.

Lieutenant Boyd, 3d artillery states that Indian tracks were seen a few days ago, on the narrow point of land, two miles south of this post, Fort Lauderdale, where they have never before been seen since the war.

General Armstrong has divided that part of Florida which is occupied by the U. S. troops into districts, to which the several corps have been respectively allotted as follows.

The Atlantic district, garrisoned 3d artillery.
St. Johns district, " 2d dragons.
Ochlawaha district, " 2d infantry.
Micanopy district, " 7th infantry.
Wacassaw district, " 3d infantry.
Wichloachee dis., " 8th infantry.
Tampa district, " 8th infantry.
Southern district, " 1st infantry.

THE NAVY.

The Constellation of 36 guns, captain Storer, sailed from Boston harbor on the 9th inst. for the East Indies, via Rio Janeiro.

The Army and Navy Chronicle states that lieuts. Peter Grant, Vail and Andon, of the U. S. navy, were in Paris on the 8th September on their way to Marseilles, to join the Mediterranean squadron.

The Norfolk Beacon says: "Commander Fitzhugh has been ordered to the U. S. sloop of war Levant, in place of commander Smoot, who is superseded."

PENNSYLVANIA.
 A state convention is to assemble at Harrisburg on the 4th March to nominate a candidate for governor for the next October election. The Baller Repository of the 12th inst. says that "forty-four of the Pennsylvania papers, and many of them among the oldest and most influential in the state, have already placed the name of David R. Porter at the head of their editorial columns, and declared their determination to give him their undivided support."

James Cumson, esq. resigned the office of president of the board of canal commissioners on the 15th ult. in consequence of ill health.

VIRGINIA.
Judicial. The Richmond Whig says: On Saturday, John Allan, of Buford, was elected a judge of the court of appeals of Virginia. Judge May was voted for. The contest was animated, and both gentlemen were supported with a zeal which his high qualifications well deserved. There was a little party manoeuvring, although both judges Allen and Judge May are eminent names in the legal party."

The governor has received the resignation of Mr. Holleman, representative in the congress of the U. States, and Monday the 28th inst. is appointed for an election to supply his place.

NORTH CAROLINA.
Manufactures. The Fayetteville (N. C.) Observer, says that 4,000 bales of the present cotton crop will be bought in that place for the factories there.

John P. Richardson was, on the 9th inst. elected, by the legislature, to be governor of this state, and William K. Clawney, to be lieutenant governor.

GEORGIA.
Congressional. Judge Colquitt has resigned his seat in congress, in consequence of the fact election in that state resulting in an implied disapproval of his political course.

The whigs have nominated Hines Holt, jr. of Columbus, as a candidate for congress in place of Judge Colquitt.

A bill from the senate, providing for biennial sessions of the legislature of Georgia, has passed the lower house by a vote of 160 to 19.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

War Department, Dec. 5, 1840.

Sir: Since my report of the last year on the several branches of the public service committed to my charge, the army has been actively and usefully employed in Florida, and on the northern and western frontiers.

The design entertained by the department, of keeping the regiments entire, and concentrating the troops whenever it is practicable to do so, has been persevered in with the most beneficial results. A commensurate has likewise been made in establishing depots for the receipt of the recruits of each separate regiment, where they may be drilled and disciplined before they are sent off to their respective stations in garrison or in the field. The recruit ought never to be sent to join his company on service, until he has been thoroughly taught the duty of the soldier; and this instruction will be better given at regimental than at general depots. By dividing each regiment into two bodies, in the manner proposed, every important station in the country may be occupied, either as a place of arms, or as a rendezvous of the regiment; and, by a proper distribution of the latter, the intermediate forts may be temporarily occupied by partial detachments, without injury to the discipline of the whole corps. I cannot too strongly urge the adoption of this method of distributing the whole army in time of peace. To divide it into small permanent detachments will be to destroy its efficiency and its discipline, and in the event of war, to expose the posts to be captured, and the whole regular forces of the country to be nearly sacrificed. A large number of the natural and well grounded jealousy justly entertained against the existence of a large standing army in our country, sound policy and a due regard for economy render such an establishment altogether inadvisable; and it becomes necessary, therefore, to provide other means of defending our northern and maritime frontiers against the dangers to which they would be exposed at the commencement of a war. None other occur to me, than those I have already recommended, viz: central positions for the regular forces, from which they could move upon any point of attack or defence, and such an organization of the volunteer or militia forces as would enable them to maintain the posts intrusted to their charge until relieved by the regular troops; a system which ought to be matured in time of peace.

For the western frontiers, posts, garrisoned by regular troops, cannot be dispensed with. They need not be very large; but they ought to be constructed of fire-proof materials, and in such a manner as to be defensible by a small garrison against any number of men not effected by the regulars. A plan which will effect these objects perfectly has been devised by the chief engineer, and been adopted. The quarters for the men ought likewise to be built of durable materials, and be permanently furnished with iron single bedsteads, in lieu of the double bedsteads, and with wooden bunks now in use. This change, for obvious reasons, should be introduced into all the barracks in the United States.

The chief and best position for the concentration of troops, independently of the regimental rendezvous, is, for the northern frontier, near Albany, in the state of New York; and near St. Louis, in Missouri, for the western—points from which easy communications radiate to every part of those extensive lines of defence, and whence troops may be transported with certainty and rapidity wherever their presence may be required. For the maritime frontier of the Gulf of Mexico, I would recommend, in addition to the permanent fortifications planned for its defence, and now being erected, the establishment of a depot, somewhere below the falls of the Ohio, for armed sea steam vessels. It would seem to furnish the best means of bringing the vast power of the upper country to the defence of the coast, and of using it, when there, in the most efficient manner.

element manner. A certain number of vessels of war might be kept in constant readiness strong enough to carry a good battery, and light enough to descend the river at all seasons, and to cross the bars of the Mississippi. These boats ought to be of iron, as combining lightness, strength, and speed, and might be constructed of the requisite size for about fifty guns, and dollars each. Materials should be collected for the construction of boats to be built of wood, and stored until wanted; when with the vast resources of Ohio shops and mechanics, the boats and the crews, they might be put together in a very short time, and a fleet, equipped and manned with the hardy boatmen of the western waters, and a few able bodied seamen, might be floated to the ocean, fully equal with the existing and contemplated flotilla, to protect the whole gulf frontier. The very able report on the defenses of the country made by a board of distinguished officers, and submitted to congress during the last session, proves conclusively the absolute necessity of preserving and continuing our system of permanent maritime works of defense, and exhibits in the clearest manner their superiority over floating batteries of any and every description. In this view of the subject I fully concur, and even think that the facility with which the coast and harbors may be approached and entered by steam vessels of war renders strong permanent works more than ever necessary. The projectiles which will be used in future wars will, from their size and description, prove destructive to armor, masonry, and give an immense advantage to stone walls over any fabrics that can be penetrated by shells. It may be proper here to remark, that the capture of the castle of San Juan de Ulloa, at Vera Cruz, has led many persons to suppose that stone fortifications are to be destroyed by shells. This is incorrect. After that event, I caused experiments to be made at Old Point Comfort, by firing, at point blank range against a stone wall erected for that purpose; the shot broke against it, making very little impression. No armor, therefore, need be entertained of the ability of our building materials to resist hollow shot. I do not think, however, that the permanent works should be the only defenses relied on; but, regarded moveable steam batteries as essential auxiliaries. These ought not, in my opinion, to be large vessels, but of light draught of water, capable of carrying two guns for throwing shells of eight or ten inches diameter, and so constructed as to be able to resist the direct fire of an enemy. These steam batteries should be manned by artillerymen, and be under the command of the officer charged with the defense of the harbor fortifications, so as to secure harmony of action. In order to test the utility of such a force, I had a cannon of the calibre of ten inches, the chief of the ordinance, Col. Buford, was sent to Boston, where he has conducted a series of experiments with the most satisfactory result. I recommend that these guns be adopted into the service, and form part of the armament of our fortifications and of our steam floating batteries. Some successful experiments have, likewise, been made with war rockets, and a machine constructor for preparing them appears to answer the purpose perfectly.

The great amount of property vested by the government in arms, amounting to several millions of dollars, no less than the risk to the national safety by adopting any new and untried mode of fighting, convinced of their superiority by long tried experiments in the field, has induced me, generally to discontinue their introduction into the service. I fear that every attempt to increase the rapidity of firing, such as facilitating the loading by the use of levers, or by multiplying the chambers of the gun, will fail, as they have hitherto done, after involving the government in great expense. There is, however, one improvement, which has been lately tried in the field by the armies of Europe, and which presents a more decided and ascertained advantage, that I am constrained to recommend its adoption into our service—I mean the substitution of percussion for flint locks. The alteration may be made on the guns now in the arsenals, and no other change need be adopted to construct all new arms, whether rifles or muskets, with percussion locks.

Having repeatedly recommended without effect, the establishment of a national foundry; and having reason to fear the usual course would not lead to the service from the want of proper regulations to govern the contracts with private establishments; by your consent, I sent to Europe the board of officers who had been for some time employed in fixing the prices, orders and mode of contracting for artillery, in order that they might acquire such information as would enable the department permanently to regulate this important branch of the service. I am happy to state that, wherever they have been, the national establishments have been found to be, in general, and with praiseworthy liberality, every facility afforded to their researches. They have returned ed hope, after having attained all the advantages which were expected from their investigation; and the knowledge they have acquired will be applied to the practical improvement of our ordnance. A concise report of their proceedings while in Europe is herewith submitted, in connection with that of the officer in charge of the ordnance department.

In the expectation that congress would sanction the creation of a corps of sappers and miners, (an addition to the army at once necessary and economical), I sent an officer of the engineer corps to the school for sappers and miners in France, to obtain that practical information of the art, which is not possessed, and cannot be acquired here. The French government, with its accustomed liberality and kindness, permitted in every instance our officers to attend its schools of practice, and afforded them equal means with its own to pursue their studies there, allowing them privileges not generally granted to foreigners; thereby evincing, as the minister of war is pleased to remark, the friendly disposition of his majesty's government towards the U. S. State. In feeling, you have authorized me to say, is fully reciprocated, and the liberality of the French government fully appreciated. The officers sent to the school of sappers and miners, at Saumur, during the twelvemonth's instruction, and are now employed in a manner which I trust will enable the department very much to improve the cavalry service.

An advantage of separating the staff officers from the line of the army, and attaching them to the service from the present system, have been before brought to your view, but cannot be too strongly or too frequently urged. The present organization of the army does not allow a single subaltern officer in a regiment, and the companies are rendered inefficient from the absence of those officers who are on staff duty. The discipline of the troops is most injuriously affected by this arrangement, and if they are opposed in the field to more than such a deficiency would permit.

I beg leave to bring to your notice once more the expediency of extending the law of March 2, 1837, which provides for the enlistment of boys for the naval service, so as to embrace the army and ordnance corps. Its effect would equally inure them to the class of people to whom the boys belong, and to the army. It would secure to the sons of the former a comfortable subsistence, proper moral restraints, and a good practical education, while it would provide for the army with recruits, and commissioned officers, so difficult to be procured by enlistment, and without which an army cannot be efficient.

I am happy to state that experience has proved the correctness of the opinion formerly expressed, that the increase and proper organization of the staff department would produce a more economical administration of its different branches. In the execution of the law, the department, especially, a very considerable reduction has been effected during the last year; in some measure produced by the fall of prices, but arising in a much greater degree from the increased efficiency and better administration of the department, in consequence of the number of officers under the present organization bearing a more due relation to the laborious duties and high responsibilities of this important branch of the military service.

The expediency of the suspension of the application of lands appropriated for the prosecution of the works under the supervision of the quartermaster general's office during the season for active operation, little progress has been made in them since my last report. The works, however, recomended in my report, should be recommenced and completed as soon as practicable: Fort Gibson, Fort Wayne and Fort Smith—the two former as soon as tracts of land are determined upon. I am not precisely satisfied with the reports in relation to the progress of Fort Gibson; and as it is contemplated to erect permanent works in the vicinity of the old fort, it is important that the site should be selected with great care. That on which the works of Fort Wayne are now in progress, is so very unfavorable, that it became necessary to abandon it and to remove the troops to a more favorable position. Pursuing that line, small forts should be constructed at Spring river and Marias de Cygne; and west of it, at the head of the navigation of the Kansas river, and west of the Fort Lavenworth, at Table creek, on the Missouri, below the mouth of Platte river. To connect this last post with Fort Snelling, a fort ought to be constructed at or near the forks of the Des Moines river, from the mouth of which, indeed, I believe the erection of any works at the western extremity of Lake Superior to be unnecessary; and for the present, advice that Fort Snelling remain in its present position.

During your administration, nearly forty-one thousand Indians have been added to those already residing near the western boundary, while the additional security to the border states have not been commensurate to the added local dangers to which such an increase of warlike and discontented neighbors exposes them. In the act of placing the Indians there, by which the interior states are so largely benefited, the government has contracted a solemn obligation, not only to defend that people when attacked, but to anticipate the danger, by erecting such works as will ensure their safety, and inspire them with confidence in the means employed for their protection.

It affords me great gratification to be able to report that the Canada frontier has been free from any disturbance since I had last the honor to address you on that subject. Your advice to our fellow citizens on that border appears to have produced the most salutary effect, and the excitement which existed there has, I am happy to think, entirely subsided; and no further apprehension need be entertained of a violation on their part of our moral obligations. Owing to the expenditure of the appropriations for fortifications, it has not been suspected, the works on this frontier have not been much advanced, but they will, it is expected, be completed during the next season. In addition to those already authorized, I have recommended the erection of barracks at Spring Wells, near Detroit, and a position between Buffalo and Black Rock, in the state of New York; and also a strong work at the outlet of Lake Champlain.

On the northeastern frontier, until the boundary question is projected, the works which have been confined to the erection of barracks at the junction of the Mattawamkeag and Penobscot rivers. During the past year, the works on the maritime frontier have been carried on slowly, and they still remain in an unfinished state. In consequence of the defects of our Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and of our harbors and dock yards, I beg leave to refer to my report of last year, and to that made during the last session of congress in reply to a call of the senate for information on the subject. The condition of the coast remains unaltered, and the expediency of providing for its completion unchanged. The whole coast from Passamaquoddy bay to the Sabine river is exposed, on every point not defended by nature, to be invaded without any previous declaration of war, the expense of attempting to protect the long line of troops for our year only, would cost more than to erect the works which have been planned, and which are deemed sufficient to defend the several points of the coast, and to insure the possession of the territory only for a short period. But to defend an unsifted point of attack, or to drive an enemy from a position he might occupy, would be attended with great expense of blood and treasure; and while I feel confident that the stout arms and brave hearts of our fellow citizens would ultimately prevail, and drive an enemy from our soil, I cannot approve the policy which would expose the best and bravest of our artisans and workmen to encounter, without the trained bands of mercenary soldiers they would be opposed to. When we take into consideration the character of our people, and sparseness of the population in proportion to the extent of the soil, it is not wise to rely altogether for our defense on numbers and untrained valour. The battalions that might fight our battles are composed of soldiers taken from every class of the community, and the issue of every battle must depend on the moral and physical quality of some of its best and wealthiest citizens. An effort ought therefore, to be made to furnish them the means of protection, and to instruct them to defend their country, so that the loss we must under our present circumstances, by the reduction of the territory.

No appropriation having been made at the last session of congress for the works of internal improvement which were under the superintendence of this department, they have, for the most part, ceased. I have the opinion expressed in my last report, that the system requires to be revised, and will regard to the principle upon which such improvements ought to be authorized, and the manner in which they ought to be conducted.

The report of the chief of the topographical engineers, made to congress at its last session, contains an elaborate statement of the history and progress of all the works of internal improvement carried on by the orders of government; to which I beg leave to refer. It is to be regretted that congress has not yet had time to return to the subject, or the small amount asked for clearing the river and timber badly accumulated at the Red river raft, which obstructs the navigation of that stream. The expenditure necessary for this purpose is perfectly legitimate, and the necessary supplies for the troops stationed at Fort Towson, are transported up this details of the plan I refer to the accompanying report of the commissioner of Indian affairs, and particularly to his instructions for carrying it into effect addressed to the superintendent of the western territory.

While on this subject, it affords me great gratification to be able to speak in terms of merited praise of the Methodist manual labor school in the Shawnee country. The teachers, and especially the superintendent, for their Christian zeal in the cause of Indian civilization, are likely to be crowned with success; and there is reason to hope that the high expectations raised by this extensive establishment will be fully realized under its present pious and competent instructors. The department would be happy to promote similar establishments on the part of other religious sects, equally zealous, no doubt, in spreading the light of the gospel among the savans, and equal to the task of advancing their moral culture. It is conceived that, to produce durable beneficial effects by education, it must be made practically useful; and that those domestic arts which are imparted to our pupils by the example of their parents and associates, and form, as it were, a part of their nature, must be taught in the schools, and instilled into them by education.

Perseverance for one or two years longer in the policy of removing the Indians from the baneful and destructive influences which surround them within the states and territories, will unite the remnants of tribes, still within those limits, to their brethren in the west; offering, as it is believed the only chance, not only of civilizing the red man, but of perpetuating his existence.

By the accompanying report of the commissioner of pensions, it will be seen that the number of pensioners of every class on the rolls of all the states and territories, and in the District of Columbia, (except those paid out of the navy pension fund), amounts to forty-four thousand three hundred and ninety-four; of which two thousand and seventy-two cases have been admitted since the period of the last annual report. The number of deaths of pensioners that have occurred during the last year, and been reported to the department, is sixteen hundred and five. From the number of unclaimed pensions, it is believed that many more have died, of whose decease, we have no information. The number of invalid pensioners is now four thousand two hundred and eighty-nine, having increased four hundred and fourteen since 1839. The number of widows is principally, to the hardships of the service in Florida. The number of revolutionary pensioners under the act of March 15, 1815, has decreased from above twenty thousand to seven thousand nine hundred and forty-six. Under the act of July 7, 1822, thirty-one thousand eight hundred and eighty have been admitted on the pension roll; of which number, twenty-three thousand two hundred and seven yet remain. Eleven hundred and eighty-six pensioners were admitted under the law of May 15, 1828, for the benefit of officers and soldiers of the co-equal army who served during the war only six hundred and fifty are now borne on the rolls. The number of widows pensioned under the act of July 4, 1836, is three thousand four hundred and sixty-eight, of whom two thousand seven hundred and sixty survive. Five thousand nine hundred and twelve widows have received the benefit of the act of July, 1832; but the list is now reduced to five thousand five hundred and eighty-six. All those now on the rolls, who were dropped on the 4th of March next, when the term of their pensions expires by law. From the number of applications, the commissioner is of opinion that not less than four hundred will be added to the year 1841.

The total sum drawn from the treasury during the past year, to pay pensions, amounts to two millions forty-eight thousand, six hundred and sixty-three dollars, exclusive of any pensioners who have died.

The experience of two years confirms the opinion I formerly expressed of the vexatious operation of the law of the 6th of April, 1838, which fixes the short period of eight months for the return to the treasury of unclaimed pensions. The intention of the law, no doubt, was to withdraw that sum from the pension agent; whereas its operation, on the contrary, draws that additional amount from the treasury at Washington, while it produces disappointment, inconvenience, delay and expense to the poor pensioners.

By the fourteenth article of the Cherokee treaty of December 29, 1835, ratified May 23, 1839, it was agreed on the part of the United States that such warriors of the Cherokee nation as were engaged on the side of the United States in the last war with Great Britain and the southern tribes of Indians, and who were wounded in such service, shall be entitled to such pensions as shall be provided by the Congress of the United States. I respectfully suggest that congress be asked to act upon this section of the treaty. There are not many Cherokee warriors who come under that description, but they are very desperate, and the good faith of the government is pledged in their favor.

I cannot forbear bringing to your notice the extensive condition of the important archives of this department. Many of them are kept in small buildings, at an inconvenient distance from the war office, and surrounded by combustible material. A fire-proof building, capable of containing all these detached offices, might be constructed for a sum, the interest on which would not exceed the amount required for paying the rents of those now occupied for the purpose. All which I respectfully submitted.

J. R. POINSETT.

The president of the United States. REPORT FROM THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Post office department, December 7, 1840.

Sir: I submit a report, showing the service of this department in the past year, its present condition and future prospects.

The extent of the post routes in the United States covered by mail service, on the 30th of June last, as near as could be ascertained, was 155,739 miles.—The total transportation of passengers, mail matter, and express, on the 30th of June last, was about 36,370,776 miles.

The annual cost of transportation, estimated at the rate of pay existing at the close of the year, was $3,290,576 dollars, viz:

	Miles.	Cost.
By stage and coach,	12,182,445	$769,663
By stage and coach,	20,290,278	1,911,853
By stage and coach,	4,898,053	595,338

Total, 36,370,776 $2,926,854

In addition to this service, the mails by steamboats and other vessels, under the 5th and 6th sections of act of 1825, are estimated to have cost, the last year, about 9,000 dollars, and there has been paid for ship and way letters, about 26,000 dollars.

The resolution of congress of May 14, 1838, authorized the postmaster general to extend the term of the then existing contracts for six months, so as to have them terminate on the 30th June next, the 1st of the last of December. In pursuance of this authority, the contracts which would have expired with the present year were extended to the 30th of June, 1841, in consequence of which the savings which would otherwise have fallen into the year 1840 will not take place until the spring of 1841. The advantage for this service has been prepared, and will soon be published.

The accounting to about seven hundred, established by the act of the 7th of July, 1839, have been put into operation during the past year, and have made considerable addition to the expenditure for the transportation service. This extension, with the belief that the unusual increase of revenue would not be realized, has indicated a policy of retrenchment rather than general improvement; but, since I took charge of the department, some improvements have been effected on some of the most important routes which the public interest seemed to demand, and where little additional expense was incurred.

I have also executed contracts for additional service on a few rail road and steamboat routes, where retrenchments would be made at about one half the equivalent to the new liabilities assumed. These changes have given some additional expedition to the great north and south mail, as well as to several large mail contracting and it is important points.

The number of contractors in the service during the last year were about 2,100. The number who had been fined, or had deductions made from their pay for delinquencies in the performance of their engagements, was 12,519; the number on the 30th day of June, 1839, was 12,750; on the same day of the present year, the number was 13,461, showing an increase during the year of 698. There have been established during the year, 359 post offices, and 271 discontinued. The number this year is 18,828. There have been during the year 3,231 postmasters appointed, of whom 959 were for new offices.

The revenue of the department for the year ending June 30, 1840, as appears from the settlement of the accounts of postmasters in the auditor's office, was

Letter postage, $4,002,776 07
Newspapers and pamphlets, 635,229 61
Fines paid to postmasters for violation of law, 260 00

$4,638,265 68

The expenditures of the department for the same period were:

For compensation of postmasters, $1,025,925 92

For wrapping paper, office furniture, advertising, mail bags, mail tools and keys, and stamps, mail depredations, and special agents, blanks, clerks for offices, and miscellaneous, 441,775 96

For ship, steamboat, and way letters, 33,410 81

For transportation, 2,552,995 16

Excess of expenditures, $210,845 17

The revenue, as compared with the preceding year, shows an increase of $61,651 64, being a fraction over one per cent.

The average annual increase of revenue from 1832 to 1839, inclusive, has been about 10 per cent. But as this period includes the two years ending June 30, 1837, of extraordinary augmentation of revenue, amounting to 15 per cent, the first year, and 30 per cent, the second, 10 per cent, is considerably above the ordinary annual increase, which may be estimated at about 6 per centum. The decline in the revenue, however, for each past year, may be estimated at about 5 per cent, or 225,000 dollars.

Statement of the revenue and expenditures of the post office department for the eleven years ending 30th June, 1839.

	Revenue.	Expenditure.
June 30, 1829	$1,707,418 42	$1,782,132 57
1830	1,550,553 10	1,937,707 93
1831	1,997,511 64	1,936,122 87
1832	2,267,570 17	2,126,171 66
1833	2,417,011 38	2,339,414 87
1834	2,832,749 21	2,910,605 08
1835	2,993,556 66	2,757,350 08
1836	3,408,323 99	2,684,766 36
1837	4,303,428 63	3,803,428 63
1838	4,335,077 97	4,261,827 16
1839	4,477,614 04	4,654,718 42

From this tabular statement, it appears that while the expenditures of the department have been steadily increasing, the revenue has not only been maintained, but has been increasing, varying from a mere nominal increase to an advance of 20 per cent. to a single year.

The extension of the mail service, and the advance in the population and business of the country, are the causes of the ordinary increase of the revenue. But temporary and extraordinary circumstances often counteract these more permanent sources of increase, so far as to prevent any material advance. This has been the case the past year; during which a combination of causes have operated to impair the revenue of the department to nearly the extent of the average annual advance.

But the present unfavorable condition of the finances of the department is not wholly to be attributed to the decline of the revenue the past year; it is, in part, the result of the too sudden and large extension of the service during the years 1837, 1838 and 1839, occasioned by the extraordinary surplus which accrued in 1837. This surplus, on the 30th June, 1826, was 611,842 dollars.

The postmaster general, in his annual report of that year, recommended a reduction of the rates of postage. Congress did not deem it expedient to do so; but, by the act of the 21 July, 1838, established about seven hundred new post routes which it became the duty of the department to put into operation. The action on this subject by congress was considered as indicating its desire that the surplus which had accrued, and which might accrue, should be expended in providing additional mail accommodations. The causes which had produced the above surplus on the 30th June, 1826, continued to operate during the remainder of that year, and a part of the year 1837, and as the new contracts did not go into operation until after the 1st of February, 1837, the revenue continued to exceed the expenditure; and, on the 30th June, 1837, the surplus amounted to 756,208 dollars. During the session following, congress, by the act of the 7th of July, 1838, established about seven hundred additional routes, which were to be put in operation on the 1st of July, 1839. The revenue of the department would justify it. The second section of the same act provides "that every rail road within the limits of the United States that now is, or may hereafter be, made shall be a post route, and the postmaster general shall cause the mail to be transported thereon: Provided, it can have it done on reasonable terms, not paying therefor, in any instance, more than 25 per centum over and above what similar transportation would cost in post coaches."

The very liberal construction given to this act by the postmaster general, favorable to the interest of the rail road companies, did not satisfy the spirit of equity which belongs to corporate monopolies; and it was found impracticable to obtain contracts from several of the rail road companies. And congress, by the act of 25th January, 1839, extended the maximum rate of compensation for rail road service to three hundred dollars per mile.

The new routes established by the act of 7th of July, 1838, were mostly put into service in 1839; and contracts have been made for service on the rail roads then in existence, and most of those which have since been completed, at rates of compensation, varying from twenty-five to three hundred per cent. above what had been paid for coach service on the same routes. In England, the average rate of compensation for rail road service is about ninety dollars per mile; and the highest sum paid on the most important routes is one hundred and seven dollars per mile, and the contractors are required to convey mails as often, and at such times, as may be ordered by the postmaster general. Here, with a rate of compensation nearly two hundred per cent. higher, it has been found impracticable, on most of the routes, to obtain the contracts before the time of the departure and delivery of the mail, which is so essential to the service, and is exercised on other routes. In addition to the compensation paid to the rail road companies, there are considerable incidental expenses incurred by the postmaster agents on the more important routes for conveying the mail to and from the cars at the ends of the routes, and for supplying intermediaries office, not on the lines of the route. The substitution of rail road for coach service, has borne very heavily on the revenues of the department.

The new routes established in 1836 and 1838, being many of them, in sections of the country where the roads are bad and the settlements sparse, have yielded an income bearing but a small proportion to the expense of the service.

This great extension of the service, and the substitution of a higher and more expensive for a cheaper grade, under the acts of congress referred to, and the improvements on other routes, which the public interest seem to have required in 1836, have carried the expenditures of the department, for three successive years, beyond its accruing revenues: In the year ending on 30th June, 1838,

the expenditures were	$1,621,837 00
The revenue which accrued was	4,235,077 00

Excess of expenditure over the revenue	$386,700 00
--	--------------

The expenditures in the year ending
June 30, 1839, were	$4,654,719 00

The revenue which accrued was	4,477,614 00
-------------------------------	--------------

Excess of expenditure	$177,104 00

The excess of the expenditures for these two years was met by the surplus funds which had accumulated in 1837, and nearly exhausted that surplus which was available.

In the annual report of my predecessor, made in December 1839, he says: "The general financial disasters of last year have not reduced the revenue, as might have been expected, but have prevented most of the anticipated increase and thrown the department upon its surplus, to sustain most of its extensions. The indications now are, that there will be a slight improvement in the revenue of the current fiscal year, over the preceding; but not enough to produce any material effect. An advance somewhat greater may be reasonably expected, next year, but not great enough to meet the increasing cost of mail service, and put into operation the new routes established by the act of 1838, and congress. It will hence be seen that, for more than a year to come, the curtailment, rather than the extension of service on routes now in operation, is to be expected."

The anticipated increase during the year 1839, was realized, and amounted to 65 per cent.—producing $241,560. But the greater increase looked for in 1840, has essentially failed; and the quarter ending 30th of September last, exhibits an actual decrease in the revenue, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, of about 5 per cent. This unfavorable result has been occasioned mainly by the second anticipation of the banks in a large section of the union, followed by a general depression of the commercial interests of the country; which appears to have been apprehended at the close of the last year, as the postmaster general then said: "It is possible that the recent suspension of specie payments by the banks, in a large portion of the union, may again check the increase in the revenue of the department, so as to make retrenchment necessary; but, in any event, they will be inconsiderable."

But the present apparently unfavorable financial condition of the department need occasion no anxiety. It can be sustained upon its own resources, and can be placed in a safe and prosperous condition. Yet, to afford it temporary relief, curtailments of service, to a limited extent, are necessary. This has already been commenced, and will be continued as far as may be found requisite to place its finances in a sound condition. The curtailments of service will be made so as to occasion as little inconvenience to the public, or injustice to the contractors, as such an operation will admit of. As periodical retrenchments are unavoidable, it deserves consideration, whether it is not better for congress to exercise some authority by which all general curtailments are to be effected, so as to remove executive discretion, and secure an equal apportionment of the reduction of service among the different sections of the country. Congress, in the exercise of this authority, which the department in its present condition, we discover its resources, and its ability not only to sustain itself, but probably with the aid of some remedial legislation, to admit of a prospective reduction of the tariff on foreign postage, which public sentiment seems to demand.

These causes are to be found in the unequal fluctuations since 1834 in the financial interests and commercial business of the country. The period of the depression of the country, which commenced in 1834 to the spring of 1837, occasioned an extraordinary increase of revenue, which produced the large surplus that existed in 1836 and 1837. This surplus formed the basis of the great extension of the mail service in 1836, which has since placed the limits to which it could have been carried by the ordinary increase of revenue, as to absorb nearly the whole of this surplus in two years. When the reaction came on, which, under any circumstances, could have depressed its revenues, the department was left with an excess of service far beyond its natural limits; which had originated from the extraordinary increase of its revenues in 1836 and 1837. But the unusual increase of revenue over the expenditures during those two years, was not only confined to the great extension of the mail contracts for transportation, during that period, but mostly been made when prices were low, and the revenue accruing from their performance, was received when prices had advanced from fifty to one hundred per cent. The department, therefore, enjoyed the advantages of an excited state of business, without the drawback which, under other circumstances, the advance in prices would have occasioned.

On the other hand, the excess of the expenditures over the receipts for postages, the last three years, is not more to be attributed to the depression of the revenue from the state of the times, than to the circumstance that all the existing contracts were made during the high state of prices, and at an average advance of about fifty per cent. above the rate of compensation paid prior to 1836.

Should prices not vary essentially from their present standard, it is reasonable to suppose that the future letting can be made at greatly reduced rates than the present. This is an important consideration, which, to a few years without any retrenchment of service, could hardly fail of placing the finances of the department in a prosperous condition. But it cannot be used immediately available, so that a temporary extension of service, to a limited extent, becomes an essay.

The restoration of commercial activity, can confidently anticipated, may reasonably be calculated to produce a considerable improvement during the two last quarters of the current fiscal year, and a somewhat greater increase the next year.

With a reasonable expectation of a reduction in the expense of the transportation, and nearly a certainty of a considerable increase in its revenues, the future prospects of the department are highly satisfactory.

The present is a peculiar crisis in its financial affairs, resulting from the operation of causes which I have endeavored partially to explain, and which are not likely, in the same degree at least, again to occur.

There are other causes of a more limited influence which have contributed to impair the revenue the past year. The greatly increased expense of the transportation of the mail upon rail roads is not only a way in which they affect the revenues of this department. The great facilities which they afford for the transmission of letters and newspapers out of the mail, have evidently diminished the receipts from postage. This is proved by the sudden falling off of the revenue at points where these facilities have recently been provided. Information has also been received from the agents of the department, showing that letters and newspapers, sent by persons, were extensively conveyed out of the mail on the rail road and steamboat lines, and on many of the stage and coach routes. So far as these practices, so detrimental to the income of the department, were believed to be in violation of laws, they endeavored to enforce them, regarding it as my duty to suppress the laws. And in respect to letters carried by carriers and drivers, their efforts, it is believed, have been generally effectual; but there is no prohibition against persons carrying letters and packets who may pass over rail roads in the same vehicle which transports the mail, and the rail roads afford great facilities for sending letters in this way.

For fifteen years preceding the introduction of the new system in England, the postage-tax had rather declined, notwithstanding the increase of population and business. This was, by many, ascribed to the high rate of the tax, but the better and more prevailing opinion attributes it to the numerous rail roads which have gone into operation.

The practice of carrying newspapers and letters by mail, without having secured the privilege in the contract, I found to be so general, that it could not be suppressed without great inconvenience to the public; and the dignity of the law admitted of doubts in regard to the remedy to be applied. That I should best discharge my duty by permitting these practices to continue, and leave it to congress either to remove the prohibition or to make the law more effectual in its enforcement. As it is probable that the enforcement of the law would have the effect of stopping the carrying of newspapers on the mail routes, rather than causing them to be conveyed in the mail, it would seem both just and politic to abolish the restriction entirely.

Another source of detriment to the revenue the past year, has been the exercise and abuse of the franking privilege to an unprecedented extent. During the last three quarters, the free matter constituted a very large portion of the entire mail. As the contracts have been without reference to this extraordinary addition to the bulk and weight of the mail, the burden of the transportation was thrown upon the contractors. The free matter is not only completely exempt from taxation, but the department is subjected to the charge of postage for every free letter or sealed packet delivered at offices where the postmaster's commissions do not exceed five hundred dollars per quarter. At some offices this allowance to the postmaster has absorbed his whole quarterly salary.

The books of the department furnish no data for determining the number of free packets conveyed in the mail, as a large portion of them are not entered on the post bills. At the post office in this city an account was taken of the number and weight of free letters and packets during three weeks ending the 21st day of May, the 21st day of June, and the 21st day of July last. There were 22,083 free letters and packets from the executive departments, 20,363 free letters from members of congress and 392,268 public documents and other franked packets—making in all 421,669. The public documents and packets from congress, exclusive of the letters, weighed 32,639 pounds, nearly sixteen and a half tons, and cost the department, for the season of thirty-three days, as the average of the free letters and packets sent from the office in this city during the late session of congress amounted to 4,751,359 and the two evils allowed to postmasters to receive the delivery of free letters would be $95,627. This is probably a very low estimate, as an assertion; and the two evils are not paid at offices where the postmaster's commissions exceed five hundred dollars per quarter.

It may be estimated that there has been abstracted from the revenue of the current year, by the free letters and packets, the sum of $150,000.

And there are facts that have come to the knowledge of the department, which show that great abuses have been practised by those enjoying the privileges, in the highest as well as the lowest stations, in converting the correspondence of others, to the great injury of its revenue. This and other abuses of the privilege appear to be rapidly increasing, and imperiously demand, if not the entire abolition, or such restriction upon it as could be enforced by the department.

The provision in the act of 1825, allowing two cents to postmasters on free letters should be aboceeds of the public lands for the continuation of the Cumberland land in Ohio to its western termination, to be constructed in a continuous line from east to west, and of distributing the residue of the said proceeds among the several states upon the principle of what is called Mr. Clay's land bill, taking the census of 40 as the basis of the apportionment.

Mr. Hubbard moved to lay the resolution on the table, and the question was put by yeas and nays, which were ordered. And then, before the question had been put, an adjournment was moved and carried.

Friday, Dec. 18. At 12 o'clock, the house was called to order by the speaker, and the journal of yesterday read.

Mr. Sturdy rose and stated that in offering the resolution yesterday to direct the comptroller general to deposit such books and papers of his department as may not be required for daily and immediate use, in the vaults of the new treasury building, for safe keeping, it did not mean to be understood as intending to throw out any suggestion of imputation against the present incumbent; but that the late head of the post office department was lurking about the city, and he was mean enough for any thing.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, from the committee of ways and means, asked leave at this time to report a bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions, and leave being granted, the bill was reported, twice read, and passed.

Mr. John C. Adams inquired of the chairman of the committee of ways and means whether the bill just reported by him contained any provision for the relief of the navy pension fund, so strongly recommended a few years since by the president of the United States in a special message to Congress. Mr. Jones answered that it did not; that the message to which Mr. Adams alluded had been referred to the committee on naval affairs.

Mr. Reed stated that the committee on naval affairs had not acted on the subject, because of the non-attendance of the chairman.

Mr. Adams hoped the absence of the chairman of the committee would not long interpose to prevent important business from being transacted—that unless an appropriation was speedily made for the benefit of the navy pension fund, the pensioners on that fund would have to go unpaid.

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, chairman of the committee of ways and means, asked the committee to be authorized to appoint a clerk at four dollars a day.

Mr. Williams, of North Carolina, inquired if it was contemplated to continue the clerk through the next recess of Congress? Mr. Jones answered that he did not know that it was customary to continue committee clerks through the recess—in the present case it was not intended to do so. Some member of the committee for the year and nays, but they were not ordered, and the motion was adopted. The committee of ways and means are therefore authorized to appoint a clerk at $4 a day.

Mr. W. C. Johnston moved that when the house adjourns to adjourn to meet on Monday next, as signing as his reason for the motion, that opportunity might be afforded to replace the seats and repair the injuries done to the hall and furniture by the falling of the chandelier, his own seat together with the seats of several other members having been entirely demolished. The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon, on motion of Mr. W. C. Johnston, the house adjourned over to Monday next.

Monday, Dec. 21. The house was called to order by the speaker, and the journal of yesterday and the house several communications, viz:

1. From the secretary of the treasury, with a statement of the funds of the Chickasaw Indians, as required by the act of the 20th April, 1836, for carrying into effect the treaties with that tribe. This report gives a detailed account of the receipt and application of money received on trust for the Chickasaw for lands sold for their benefit. Referred to the committee on Indian affairs, and ordered to be printed.
2. From the secretary of the territory of Wisconsin, accompanied by a printed copy of the laws of that territory passed at the two last sessions of the legislature. Referred to the committee on the territories.
3. From the commissioner of public building in Washington, accompanied with copies of all contracts made by him from the 1st of December, 1839, to the 1st of December, 1840, with the names of applicants for said contracts, and the amount of their respective bids.
4. From the clerk of the house, as follows:

Hon. R. M. T. HYNTER, speaker, &c.

Sir, In pursuance of the following resolution of the house, dated December 18, 1840:

Resolved, That the clerk of this house be instructed to report by what authority the sum of $1,180 50 was paid to Charles J. Ingersoll, &c. for his expenses in taking testimony, &c. in the contested election with Charles Naylor, &c. pending the last session of Congress, and out of what fund, &c. he was paid, as reported in document No. 7, to this house.

I beg leave to report that, on the 20th July last, a paper was handed the accounting clerk of this office, containing a list of the witnesses in the contested election of Naylor and Ingersoll, together with the number of days each witness had been in attendance. On the face of this paper is an order signed "J. Johnson, chairman of accounts," that the witnesses above named be paid $2 per diem.

Resolved, That the committee on accounts be instructed to the clerk his report of this account, to be paid the sum of $1,180 50 for the purpose of paying the said witnesses. At the beginning of the session, Mr. Ingersoll returned the receipts of the individuals paid, and $110 in money, stating that that amount had been over-paid. In casting up the receipts I find them to amount to $1,116 50. And the amount returned by Mr. Ingersoll, $110 50.

The amount paid to Mr. Ingersoll, $1,120 00. All which is respectfully submitted.

HUGH A. GARLAND.

The motion of Mr. Davis, of Indiana, made several days since, to reconsider the vote by which the bill introduced on leave by Mr. Jones, of New York, to amend the laws upon the subject of naturalization, was referred to the committee on the judiciary, came up in order for consideration.

After a few remarks from Mr. D. he moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider, which was taken and decided in the negative by yeas and nays; yeas 90, nays 93.

Mr. Bolts, after a few words of explanation, offered the following resolution: Resolved, That the committee of accounts be instructed to report to this house by what authority, at what time, and on whose application they directed the clerk of this house to pay the sum of $1,120 to Charles J. Ingersoll as compensation to witnesses he produced in the contested election between said Charles J. Ingersoll and Charles Naylor.

Resolved, That the committee of accounts be instructed to the clerk his report of this account, with instructions to report by what authority, at what time, and on whose application they directed the clerk of this house to pay the sum of $1,120 to Charles J. Ingersoll as compensation to witnesses he produced in the contested election between Messrs. Ingersoll and Naylor, as reported in document No. 7; by what authority and on what vouchers he sent to Mr. Naylor the sum of $1,120 to Charles J. Ingersoll, and which that gentleman says he returned; and the said vouchers gave the names and time of attendance of the said witnesses, in whose handwriting they were filed, and what has become of the same.

Mr. Briggs asked Mr. Bolts to accept the following as a modification of the resolution he had proposed:

Resolved, That the report of the clerk of this house on the contingent expenditure of the house, and all the papers in relation to money paid for witnesses and all the expense of taken testimony in the case of Messrs. Naylor and Ingersoll, be referred to the committee on public expenditures, with directions to inquire whether much money has been paid in said case, to whom, for what, and by what authority said money was paid; and whether by his witnesses in the said contest, and which that gentleman says he returned; and the said vouchers gave the names and time of attendance of the said witnesses, in whose handwriting they were filed, and what has become of the same.

Mr. Briggs then offered his proposition as an amended proposition of Mr. Bolts, and gave his reasons for so declining, and then moved his proposition, and as follows: Resolved, That the committee on accounts be instructed to report by what authority they authorized the clerk of this house to pay the sum of $1,160 50 to C. J. Ingersoll and his witnesses in taking testimony, and for other expenses incurred in the contested election between C. J. Ingersoll and Charles Naylor.

Mr. Briggs then offered his proposition as an amended proposition of Mr. Bolts, and gave his reasons for so declining, and then moved his proposition, and as follows: Resolved, That the committee on accounts be instructed to report by what authority they authorized the clerk of this house to pay the sum of $1,160 50 to C. J. Ingersoll and his witnesses in taking testimony, and for other expenses incurred in the contested election between C. J. Ingersoll and Charles Naylor.

After making his remarks, Mr. Cushing moved the previous question, which was sustained by the house. Mr. Briggs then withdrew his amendment.

The question on the amendment of Mr. McGill, moved by Mr. Briggs, and the negative, and the affirmative, resolution, as modified by him, passed in the affirmative.

Mr. McGill then moved his amendment as a separate question, to recommit to the clerk his report, with instructions to report as set forth in his amendment; which was agreed to.

Mr. Albert Smith, in pursuance of the notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill to regulate the pay of surgeons in the navy of the U. States, which was twice read and referred to the committee on naval affairs.

A number of names were presented, amongst which were five, by Mr. Underwood, to wit: from Hemiola Hope and 50 others, ladies of Baltimore; from Emily G. Fulton and 67 others, ladies of Baltimore; from John Coates and 62 others, of Chillicothe, Ohio; from John Smith and 138 others, of New York; and from Capt. Geo. Gauthier and 159 others, passengers on board the steamboat Columbia, praying Congress to act upon the bills reported by the select committee at the last session to prevent steamboat disasters.

Mr. Underwood also presented a letter, addressed to him by Dr. J. P. Vantyne, stating the number of steamboat disasters which had occurred within the last six years, their nature, and the destination of life and property on board, from which document it appears (as Mr. U. informed the house) that the whole number of disasters which Dr. V. had been able to obtain information concerning was 185; that the number of lives lost was 1,735, the number of wounded was 373; of these were killed by explosions, collisions, and fire, on the Mississippi and its tributaries, 991, and wounded 260; on sea and tide-water, deaths from the same cause were 1,475, and wounded 1,075, and 138 others, of the same cause were 85, wounded 11.

Mr. Underwood stated that the information, as far as it went, was no doubt accurate; but it did not embrace, as the letter showed upon its face, the extent of the mischief. It was, however, an important document, and he hoped the house would print it. For himself, he felt under obligations to its author for the diligence and talent manifested in its preparation.

A select committee was raised, on the motion of Mr. U. to whom the five petitions, the letter of Dr. Vantyne, and the report and bills of the select committee at the last session on the subject of steamboat disasters, were referred, and the letter of Dr. Vantyne was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Monroe, under the notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases; which was read, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Davis, of Ky. under the notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill to regulate the fees and costs and mode of proceeding of the United States, to regulate the fee bill, and to limit the emoluments of certain officers; which was read and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Deft, under the notice heretofore given, obtained leave to introduce a bill to exempt the mail in the harbor of Mobile; which was referred to the committee on commerce.

Mr. E. Davis offered a resolution directing the postmaster general to inform the house whether Ralph Jackson is a contractor for carrying the mail in the state of Illinois; who are his sureties, or who is responsible to the department for any failure on his part to fulfill his contract.

On motion of Mr. Galbraith, it was Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions inquire into the expediency of extending the act of July 7, 1825, granting full pay and pensions to certain widows, for another period of five years; and also into the expediency of extending the act of June 7, 1832, supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the revolution, so as to grant pensions to those who served at any time previous to the treaty of Greenville, in August, 1793.

On motion of Mr. Fillmore, it was Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to inform the house of his opinion, incommunicable with the public interests, of the correspondence between this government and that of Great Britain, or the officers or agents of either, or the officers and agents of this government, with the president or any of its departments, which has not heretofore been communicated to this house, on the subject of the outrage of the sinking of the Carroll on the Niagara frontier, and whether there is any proposal for compensation being made on the part of said boat for the loss thereof; and, also, whether any communications have been made to the government, or to the president or any of its departments, with the president or any of its departments of the state of New York for being concerned in said outrage; and if so, that he communicate a copy thereof to this house.

Mr. Fillmore also introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, to change the time for the commencement of the session of Congress, and to require Congress to convene on the 4th of March to the 1st of December; which was committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and directed to be printed.

Adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

PENNSYLVANIA.
The amount of interest falling due on the state debt of Pennsylvania, on the 1st of February next is stated by a correspondent to be $390,000.
Dickinson college, for a catalogue of which, for 1840, we are indebted to col. Suffer, shows the number of students in the institution, including all departments, to be one hundred and sixty nine.
The board of instruction, which is now fall, comprises the following: rev. John P. Durbin, D. D. president; Merritt Caldwell, A. M. professor of natural philosophy and political economy; William H. Allen, A. M. of the natural sciences; rev. John McClintock, A. M. of languages; Thomas E. Sudler, A. M. of mathematics; hon. John Reed, L. L. D. of the law department; rev. Levi Scott, A. M. of the grammar school; Thomas Bowman, A. M. do.

Bank of Virginia. A committee of the house of delegates has been appointed to examine into the affairs of the Bank of Virginia, in connection with the late immense defalcations. Since which the house has passed another resolution, by a vote of 108 to 4, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee on banks inquire what, if any, were the reasons connected with the removal of Anthony Robinson, jr. from the office of cashier of the Bank of Virginia, which did not equally apply to John Brockebrough, president of that institution; and if any, what they were.

GEORGIA.

The tariff and a national bank. The senate of this state, by a vote of 43 to 34, have passed a serious act of resolutions denying the right of congress, under the constitution, to charter a bank, or to impose a tariff for the protection of domestic manufactures. Several whigs voted in favor of the resolutions.

The constitutionality of a tariff for the purpose of revenue for the support of government, is admitted on all hands; and by the operation of such a tariff, domestic manufactures will, of course, be protected to some extent. It is against a tariff laid for the sake of protection, that the supporters of the above mentioned resolutions object.

ALABAMA.

The vote of electors. By an extraordinary oversight the vote of Alabama is likely to prove a nullity. Speaking of the voting by the electors, the Tuscaloosa Monitor says:

"The college of electors having been called to order by its chairman, col. Reynolds, of Franklin, the roll was then called by its secretary, Geo. I. Jones, esq. of this city, when each elector responded, Marlin Van Buren, of N. York, for president of the United States; Richard M. Johnson, for vice president."

It is that by the way in which the proceedings were conducted, it is altogether null and void, the constitution expressly providing that the vote shall be by ballot;—that the balloting for president shall be distinct from that of vice president;—and that these facts shall appear on the face of the certificate of election.

same day, contains his inaugural address, of which, that paper remarks that it is "just such as might be expected from the known abilities of the author." The address is characterized as a profound, judicious and statesmanlike document, containing much to engage the attention of men of reflection, statesmen and political economists.

A considerable portion of the address of Gov. Corwin is devoted to the important and fruitful subject of banking, in its various aspects. The objections which are urged against the system, as now existing, are stated,—their degree of reasonableness analyzed, and so far as founded in truth, the means of remedy discussed or suggested. With regard to the general question, as to the utility or even necessity of banks, in a country such as ours, which would make the most of its means, and with the least practicable delay, the following paragraph is to be observed:

"If the community were deprived of that credit which is now furnished by banks, any one conversant with the enterprising spirit of our people will at once see that individuals and voluntary associations would furnish that credit in other forms. It then becomes a question, which of these two is as likely to be laboring and producing classes? If this be the true question, and our experience is not utterly deceptive, its solution at once results in favor of incorporated companies, guarded by every provision which the wisdom of the legislature may suggest."

As a means of improvement in the state banking system, and of giving greater firmness and ability to the banks, to withstand the shocks consequent upon revolutions in the business of the country, Gov. Corwin suggests the establishment of a state bank, with a convenient number of branches at proper points in the state—with such capital as the business of the country would seem to require. The state to own one fifth of the whole stock, and each branch to own the balance of its own stock. The whole capital to be pledged for the liabilities of each branch, and the amount of circulation, at any and all the branches, to bear a proportion to the capital employed—the proportion to be fixed by the legislature.

Another plan of reform suggested is, to "recharter so many of the present banks of the state, as shall be thought necessary, and such of them only, as on thorough examination shall be found to be in a sound and healthy condition."

Either of these plans might, it is suggested in the message, be made to work beneficially for the general interests.

MR. WRIGHT'S SPEECH ON THE FINANCES.

In his address, Dec. 17, 1840, Mr. Wright said the honorable senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Webster) had felt it to be his duty to open this discussion upon the message of the president, pending a simple motion to refer the portions of it which he had alluded to the appropriate committee of the senate, under the apprehension expressed by him that the publication and distribution of the statements and views of the president might produce erroneous impressions upon the minds of the people of the country. A similar apprehension entertained by Mr. Wright as to the remarks of the senator moved him to make this reply to that gentleman. A belief that his remarks were calculated to give erroneous impressions as to the manner in which the financial condition of the country at the present time, made it his duty to set aside some of the positions and arguments of the honorable senator, and to correct, as far as he might be able, the errors of fact and conclusion which seemed to him to be in his discourse. This he intended to do as briefly as possible; and in the discussion he should endeavor to imitate the courtesy which had so clearly distinguished the language and manner of the honorable senator.

The senator first referred to page eight of the message, where the president speaks of a national debt and a national bank. The senator did not, at that time, consider it within his object to make any remarks in reference to the president's observations as to a bank; but it was to the views expressed in the message on the subject of a national debt, to which his attention was directed, and to which his attention was directed with that point and force which always characterizes the senator's mind, and he might, perhaps say, on this occasion, the language which sometimes characterizes his arguments. He had asked if the president supposed, or if any body supposed, that there was a party in this country friendly to a national debt, per se. He (Mr. Wright) did not believe that position met the president's remarks at all, for he did not understand the president as ordering his views and urging his reasons against the contraction and perpetuation of a national debt on the ground that it was a debt to be contracted for the single and sole love of the debt for itself. He understood the president as taking other and higher ground, and as endeavoring to impress upon his countrymen, on the occasion which called forth that message, the evils of debt under any circumstances whatever—under whatever circumstances and for whatever consideration contracted—and attempting to convince them that it was a debt to be contracted at all times and upon all occasions, and for all considerations, when the safety and honor of the nation will permit. Such he understood to be the drift and purport of the message upon this very important topic. Yet he (the N.Y.) was prepared to go further than the president had gone, and say what he had said. He would say, not that there is a political party in this country in favor of a national debt, per se, but that there are interests in this country so placed, that they are ever active, and he believed they constituted an influence against which it was one of the prominent objects of the president to warn congress and the country. What are those interests which naturally favor a national debt, per se, and which are ever active in endeavoring to get a national debt derived from its existence? Retired capitalists, men who have withdrawn from business with a capital which they wish to preserve for themselves and their families, constitute one such interest. Such persons naturally desire a permanent investment for their money; and it is most rational that they should vastly prefer their country as their debtors, if it be of good standing and credit, to any other. Look at England. What supports and perpetuates this country, in relation to its external debt, but British national debt? It rests upon the debt, and could not be sustained without it—and the indebtedness of the country is its strength and power. Mr. W. said he spoke not of this interest, as now existing in this country, in relation to its external debt, as an influence itself; it must grow up in every prosperous community; will ever exist in some form, and can only be curbed and controlled by a people and government free from debt.

But was there not another interest, and an important one in every commercial community, which was benefited by, and therefore was in favor of, the existence of a national debt for itself? He spoke of that great interest connected with foreign commerce, the assignment of a medium of exchange, the maintenance between its own and foreign countries. Why, he had seen frequently the utility of a national debt pressed upon the country for this cause; and quite recently articles had appeared in the public newspapers, and in the newspapers of other countries—stating that since the extinguishment of our debt, fluctuations in our paper system had been more frequent and more deleterious, and contending that the existence of a national debt, and its influence on commercial transactions were necessary to give that system stability. But a year ago, a proposition was deliberately put forth of that character, recommending that this country should create a debt, not singly to furnish these commercial accommodations, but urging that these would be necessary incidental benefits, while other great objects, valuable in the mind of the writer, were supposed to warrant the contraction of the proposed debt of hundreds of millions. These were not all.

Such securities, he thought, which created that class of enterprising, acute persons, who seek a living, and their fortunes, by dealing in stocks—the class of brokers. They, as a class of men, must be attached to a national debt, per se, for nothing could be so profitable to them as the obtaining of an abundance of national stocks and securities, and that abundance of customers, seeking investments and a market, which a full supply of superior stocks would never fail to present to that department of trade. Such securities, he thought, must have a tendency to keep the prices of stocks more stable, and thus render the profits of the broker more certain, and his calling more safe, if not more lucrative.

A further interest, having the same natural tendency, was the money incorporation of the country, authorized to deal in stocks and exchange, or practically so dealing, with or without authority. These institutions, more naturally than the brokers, must favor the existence of a national debt, per se, inasmuch as the profits of their business would be equally involved, while their own stability would be much more essentially promoted. He did not enumerate this interest with any political reference. It was an existing interest in our country and in every country where the world of trade and commerce existed. It was an existing interest, to trade and commerce, it was a healthy interest to trade and commerce, while, without restraint, it was a fearful interest. It was always active, and at times powerful beyond the wildest calumny of the confidant people. Yet it was an interest which a people free from debt need not fear, but from which any people loaded with debt, public or private, had every thing to apprehend. It was a corporate interest, representing no one to which business men, and the people, and the destitute, of his nature, of all human sympathies. There was still another interest which should be, in his judgment, in favor of a national debt, per se. He referred to the men and interests in the country which favored the establishment and preservation of a national bank as an institution to regulate our currency and credit. He did not speak of this interest as that of a political party in the country, or as connected with any existing political party. His object was to follow the course of argument of the honorable senator from Massachusetts, and take a general view of the topics under discussion; and he believed in his heart that every man who desired the establishment and perpetuation of a national bank of the United States should desire, as the only safe and secure foundation for such an institution, a permanent national debt. In his opinion, that was the only safe corner stone, the only secure foundation, for a national bank in this country. It was not his place to say, on the present occasion, whether the patriotism, or purity of purpose, of any friend of a national bank. He would not, if he could avoid it, make this discussion political, much less partisan.

He had looked at our own history, and found that a national debt had been the basis of our power, and, though, the controlling cause, of our two former national banks; and he believed further, that the existence and continuance of the debt had given to both the most of the permanency and stability which the public mind ascribed to the currency and the institutions controlling our currency and credit.

He had also referred himself to the pecuniary institutions of England, and became equally satisfied that the national bank there could not sustain itself for an hour, without its connection with the paper system of that commercial country, if disconnected from the British national debt. The capital of the bank consists of the debt, and the country is a debtor for the credit it commands. How, then, is the country to get the money to pay the principal of the debt, and how can the debtor, though the proudest government in the world, control the creditor, while these embarrassing relations exist? It cannot be done, unless the Bank of England make us, as enduring as the British empire.

So here. So every where. When a government is in debt, and requires a permanent credit beyond its means of payment, it may require a government bank to manage and regulate its fiscal affairs; to extend credit, when the necessities require, and to regulate private business as to make that extension safe and profitable to itself.

He must then repeat, that, in his judgment, every man and every interest, in this country, favorable to a national bank, should be also favorable to a national debt, as the only safe foundation upon which such a superstructure can be erected with any reasonable promise of permanency.

He must conclude, therefore, that there were in this country interests—strong, powerful and active interest—in favor of a national debt, per se; that these interests have favored, do now favor, and will continue to favor the contraction and perpetuation of a national debt, for the advantages which they may derive from it, and that the country, by its warning his countrymen against their influence in this direction. Other interests might be added to the enumeration, but these were sufficient to elucidate the argument, and show the danger to be constantly apprehended.

The honorable senator, if he (Mr. Wright) had understood him correctly, admitted that the views of the president, as expressed in his message, upon the subject of a national debt, were correct and sound; that several of the questions he gave rise to, by his to his countrymen, because, as he contended, they were contrary to the practice of the administration and of the president at his head.

To prove this position, he asserts that the present is the first administration, under our institutions, which has begun a national debt in time of peace. The assertion is true; and yet it is a fair presentation of the point intended to be discussed? It is calculated to do injury to the president or to his administration? Why did not the senator say that the administration of general Jackson was the first, under our institutions, which ever paid a national debt? It would have been as true; and yet the assertion, presented in this way, would have been calculated to do injustice to every man who ever believed in the debt of general Jackson. The fact is, that no administration prior to that of Mr. Van Buren had ever existed under our constitution which could begin a national debt, because every preceding administration had found a national debt in existence. Such a debt was asserted during the war of the revolution, before our present government was formed; and was first finally extinguished during the administration of general Jackson, and yet he believed he was safe in saying that every administration had been under a national debt, and thus added to the existing debt, and had made payments towards its extinguishment. While, therefore, it was true that no administration prior to that of Mr. Van Buren had begun a debt, either in a time of peace or war, and that an administration prior to the administration of Van Buren had paid off and extinguished our national debt, it was also true that all administrations, as well in peace as war, had borrowed money, contracted debts and paid debts. The simple assertion of the senator, then, that the administration of Mr. Van Buren was the first administration which had begun a debt in time of peace did not in his judgment, and he pronounced the opinion with deference, present fairly to the country the president or his administration.

I must feel it proper here to remark that, if the subsequent positions of the senator were sound, no debt had been begun under Mr. Van Buren's administration, because a national debt had not ceased to exist. That which had been treated as our national debt, and that on which our fiscal accounts were extinguished during the administration of general Jackson; but if the items of Indian and other claims referred to by the senator are to be set down as items of a national debt, then, alas, our national debt never been begun, but the administration of Mr. Van Buren cannot have "begun" such a debt.

The true and fair question is, however, why and under what circumstances has any portion of debt been contracted under this administration? (Mr. W. said) I spent much time in answering this inquiry, as most of the senators present were members of the body in 1837, and would retain personal recollections of the whole matter. All would recognize that congress and contracted extraordinary debt for the single purpose of supplying the treasury and enabling it to preserve the public faith and honor; that this call was not made at a time of scarcity or want in the public funds, but when our revenue was abundant; that the bank of the country was in sympathy with the banks, and millions due from them; that their inability to pay the drafts of the treasurer, in conformity with the laws of congress, created the want and compelled the call of congress; and that the bank of the country, the banks of the country, by the admission of all, to borrow money upon the credit of the people to keep the national treasury in operation.

This new debt was not, then, contracted, or, in the language of the senator, begun, because of extravagance of the administration, had expended our substance. No; but because our trustees, because those with whom the money of the people had been placed for safe keeping, could not pay upon demand according to our laws—because our millions upon millions were without our control, in the keeping of banking institutions, and the credit of the people was resorted to, to sustain the faith and honor of the country. What was the extent of the power then conferred upon this administration to contract a debt? If his recollection served him, it was $10,000,000. And what were our dues from the banks alone? If he was not mistaken, some thirteen or fourteen millions of dollars; and beyond that, one of the prominent and worthy objects of the loan was to enable the government to pay the debts of the merchants of the country, who were equally distressed with the public treasury from the revolutions of the time. Under such circumstances it was that the present administration "began a debt in time of peace."

The next position of the honorable senator is, that the administration of Mr. Van Buren has expended much more money annually than the accruing revenue. That he (Mr. Wright) believed to be true; but he did not propose to follow the senator in the data given to prove the position; he would say, what he was sure would not be controverted, that the administration had expended, year by year, just so much and no more money than congress had appropriated and ordered to be expended; that every year the appropriations of congress had exceeded by millions the estimate of expenditure presented to it by the executive departments; and that it was a matter for congress to provide the means to meet the expenditure itself directed, and not to be left to the discretion of the administration if the honorable senator had said, in passing, that, during every year of its existence, the mass of the public expenditures had been materially and rapidly reduced. The expenditures of 1839 were $18,000,000 less than the expenditures of 1838, and the secretary's report—the two documents to which the senator had referred in this discussion—would be less than those of 1837.

Those of 1839 were some six millions less; those for 1840 had been from two to three millions less than those for 1839, and the expenditures for 1840 were materially less than those for any preceding year. This, then was both sides of the book; it was the present administration as it is, in reference to expenditures. During its term, those expenditures had been reduced, and the reduction was the result of the commencement of its four years to the present hour. This was a just and entire view of the matter.

The next position taken by the honorable senator was the most wrongful one in his argument, and without which Mr. W. might as well have remained silent to make this reply. The senator did not even assert his point; but, in a manner most courteous, expressed his opinion that the president had made a variety of mistakes and omissions in his statement of the present national debt, as given in his message; that the country is, in fact, more in debt than the president and secretary of the treasury have represented it to be, and that, without his correction of these mistakes, these exemes of debt might be charged over to the coming administration, and the present might retire under appearances more favorable than the facts would warrant.

To examine these opinions and apprehensions of the honorable senator, and to try them by the facts, should not be the province of the present administration, but he had principally induced him to appear before the senate upon the present occasion.

It was admitted that the president had referred to the balance of the outstanding treasury note truly. He had stated that the treasury had received $1,000,000 more and a half millions of dollars, but the complaint was that he had represented that as the whole debt of the country at the present time, and as the amount which would be paid over to the whole debt at the time when he should hand over the administration of its affairs to his successor. Now, how had the senator sought to show that the president had been mistaken? By referring to what was called the trust funds; and, principally, and he believed, entirely, to those portions of the trust funds which pertain to the Indians. In reference to the Indian trust funds, he said not that the fact was so, but that, on examination, he was inclined to believe that portions of them had been expended for the ordinary uses of the treasury, and that, not being repaid upon the country; that the moneys stipulated by Indian treaties to be invested had not all been invested, but that some hundreds of thousands of dollars of those moneys had been expended for the ordinary uses of the treasury, and that, not being repaid, and were now a debt against the treasury. He (Mr. Wright) had taken as much pains to obtain information upon these points as the time which had elapsed since the senator's remarks were made could permit; and he was anxious to state the facts fully, plainly and truly, as far as he was able, and as the various Indian treaties varied in their provisions as to the trusts constituted under them, and conferred upon the United States, he would be compelled to speak of each of the various Indian trusts separately, each by itself, to make himself understood, and to enable others to understand the facts. He would refer then, in the first place, to the treaty with the Chickasaw Indians, as that treaty was peculiar, and the trust constituted and assumed was novel in our dealings with the Indian tribes. In this case, the United States had become the voluntary trustee of the Chickasaws, and had stipulated to sell their lands as the public domain of the United States, and to divide the proceeds of the sale of the treaty, of the survey and sale of the land, and such other expenses as might be incurred for account of the Indians, not including any commissions or other compensation to the trustee, and to account to them for all the moneys of the trust which were expended. In other words, the treaty binds the United States to sell the lands of these Indians to the best advantage, to account to them for the whole proceeds, and to manage such of their cash funds as shall remain in the hands of the government, without charge for trouble or responsibility.

Upon inquiry at the treasury department, he learned that a law of congress had placed the principal part of the money to be received under this treaty in charge of the secretary of the treasury, for the purpose of investment; that small portions belonged to Chickasaw orphans and to certain members of the tribe denominated "incompetent Chickasaws," remained in charge of the secretary of war; that, of the money in the hands of the secretary of the treasury, all has been invested, over and above the portion consumed in expenses in conformity with the treaty, which there has been time to invest since the receipts; that this money is mostly paid in at the Ponchartraine land office, the state of Mississippi, and it is required to get the money to the land office, and to bring the money into the treasury; that there may be now from $20,000 to $30,000 of these funds in the land offices, in transit, and in the treasury, but view to their final and permanent adjustment by himself or his friends. He was taking leave of his responsible position, and Mr. W. rejoiced to believe he was doing what he believed it was alone proper for him to do, confining himself strictly to the discharge of those duties which his short remaining official term required at his hands. In reference to the adjustment of the tariff he had done as he should have done—he had left the whole matter to those who were to come after him, and who should be, as they claim to be, the more immediate and accessible representatives of the popular will, and he (Mr. W.) did not speak untruly when he said his most ardent wish was that they might be able to adjust that difficult question to the satisfaction of the country, and satisfactorily to every individual involved.

A single word more, and he would close. The honorable senator concluded with a remark which manifested a disposition to say that the friends of this administration were, or were to be made, responsible for the necessity of an extra session of congress, if a convocation of the new congress should be ordered by the new president. Now he, (Mr. W.) was one of those who should do every thing in his power to oblige the country, and to be able to accomplish that object, with the greatest certainty, he should use his utmost endeavors to keep the appropriations of this session within the anticipated surplus of the year 1841. He believed the estimates prepared for the coming year would be intended to adhere to them strictly. Having done so, he should cheerfully leave it to those who have been placed in power by a triumphant expression of the popular voice, to call a congress when they pleased, and to recommend such measures as they pleased.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—21 SESSION. SENATE.

December 22. A number of memorials and petitions were presented, and various papers relating to private claims on file, in the secretary's office were referred to appropriate committees.

Several bills were reported from committees, principally on private claims.

Mr. Preston, introduced, on leave, a bill in addition to an act to promote the progress of the useful arts, referred to the committee on patents.

Mr. Calhoun introduced, on leave, a bill to cede the public lands within the limits of the new states on certain conditions therein named.

Mr. Norvell brought in a bill to amend and continue in force the act chartering the city of Washington, and moved that it be referred to a select committee.

After some remarks from Messrs. Merrick, Preston and Southard, in opposition to the reference to a special committee and in favor of referring it to the committee on the District of Columbia, and Messrs. Norvell and Clay, of Alabama, in favor of a special committee, Mr. Norvell, at the request of Mr. King, and Mr. Clay, of Alabama, withdrew his motion, when the subject was referred to the committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. Ruggles.
Resolved. That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of interdicting by law the allowance of salvage to the officers and crews of revenue cutters and of public armed vessels employed by the government in enforcing laws to suppress vessels during inclement seasons and at other times.

On motion of Mr. Porter.
Resolved. That the president of the United States be requested to transmit to the senate any information in his possession relative to the survey directed by the act of June 13th, 1839, entitled, "An act to amend an act to designate the boundary line between the state of Michigan and the territory of Wisconsin."

The bills yesterday introduced, to be engrossed, were severally read a third time and passed.

The resolution introduced by Mr. Norvell relating to the removal of the chandler, was taken up, and, after a short debate, somewhat playful in its character, in which Messrs. Tappan, Norvell, Hubbard, and others participated, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

And the senate adjourned.

December 22. Mr. Benton presented the petition of John Ward and others, asking to be allowed to import free of duty into the United States steamboats for the purpose of navigating the red river. Referred.

Numerous papers relating to private claims were removed from the files of the senate and referred.

The following bills were introduced on leave, twice read and appropriately referred.

By Mr. Henderson, a joint resolution for the relief of the sufferers at Natchez by the late tornado.

By Mr. Anderson, a bill to provide for the allowance of invalid pensions to certain Cherokee warriors, under the treaty of 1826.

By Mr. Pierce, a bill to equalize the pay of the army and for other purposes.

By Mr. Merrick, a bill authorizing letters testamentary and of administration to aliens in the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. Walker, it was Resolved. That the secretary of state be directed to communicate to the senate the returns of the census of 1840, so far as received into his office, giving only the average of the population in each state and territory, and the number of whites, of free persons of color, and all other persons, in three separate columns, and waiting how far the returns are incomplete in any state or territory.

The bill was then proceeded to take up the general orders on the calendar.

A bill for the relief of sundry citizens of Arkansas, who lost their improvements in consequence of the destruction of the United States and the Choctaw Indians, after being advocated and explained by Mr. Fulton, was ordered to be engrossed.

The bill supplementary to "an act to provide for the adjustment of titles to land in the town of Detroit and territory of Michigan, and for other purposes," passed April 21, 1836, was considered in committee of the whole, and, after being explained and advocated by Mr. Porter, was amended and ordered to be engrossed.

The bill to authorize the Mount Carmel and New Albany rail road company to enter on credit a loan of $100,000 to aid in the construction of a rail road, was taken up, when, on motion of Mr. Benton, it was laid on the table.

The bill to regulate the pay and emoluments of pursers in the navy was taken up, and explained at some length by Mr. Williams.

Mr. Hubbard hoped the bill would be permitted to lie over for the present; its features involved many changes, which, in the present condition of the treasury, would require serious consideration. The bill was accordingly postponed to the 27th inst. Mr. Hubbard. It be understood the bill, it contemplated an entire change in a system which had hitherto worked well, and, besides, he was opposed to having the government go into the market for the purchase of lands to be sold to the sailors. The ground taken by the chairman of the committee, who advocated the bill, was, that the sailors were liable to injustice; but he thought, even if this were so, it might be prevented by limiting the profits of purchase to the most moderate rate.

Mr. Williams explained that the pursers, under the bill, would make the purchases as formerly, but that no profits would be allowed to be taken from the purchase of the poor sailor, save such only as might be permitted to the purser to protect him from losses incident to such measures. He had no objection that the bill should lie over, however, until senators were prepared to act on it. [The bill was accordingly postponed.]

The bill to make new provisions respecting navy pensions, and to repeal certain acts relating to navy pensions, was then taken up; when Mr. Calhoun thought it fully early to discuss a bill of as much importance as the one before them; and intimated a wish that it might also lie over for the present.

Mr. Wright was of opinion that its consideration should be postponed. It was a bill involving principles of great importance, and should certainly receive the fullest consideration of the senate.

On motion of Mr. Williams the further consideration of this bill, together with the bill providing for pay and emolument of pursers, was postponed until the 1st Monday in January next, and made the special order for that day.

The bill to prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign gold, silver or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver, or other coin; and the bill to amend an act entitled "an act to amend an act to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," were ordered to be engrossed.

On motion, the senate adjourned.

December 24. The following memorials and petitions were presented and referred to appropriate committees:

By Mr. Preston, from J. S. Nevins, praying compensation for his services as clerk to the commander of the South Sea surveying and exploring expedition.

By Mr. C. C. Clenden, from citizens of Georgetown, asking the recharter of the Farmers' and Mechanics' bank.

Numerous petitions relating to private claims were also, on motion, removed from the files of the senate and referred.

Mr. Ruggles, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill to provide more effectually for the better security of the lives of passengers in vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.

Several reports were also made from committees on private claims.

The bills notified yesterday as having been ordered to be engrossed, were severally read a third time and passed.

The following bills were introduced on leave, twice read, and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Clay, of Alabama, a bill to amend an act entitled "an act to grant certain relinquished and unappropriated lands to the state of Alabama, for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Tennessee, Coosa, Cahaba and Black Warrior rivers," approved May 23, 1828, and the several acts supplementary and amendatory thereto.

A bill making additional appropriations for completing the levee at the mouth of the Mobile harbor.

A bill providing for the payment of certain claims of the state of Alabama.

By Mr. Nicholas, a bill to authorize the legislature of Louisiana to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of schools within that state.

Mr. Benton asked leave to bring in his bill to lay a tax on bank notes and other paper money used for circulation in the states and territories. Mr. B. explained at length the object of the bill.

As Mr. Benton ended for the reading of the bill, Mr. H. asked leave to move that Mr. Huntington submitted whether a bill of that character was cognizable in the senate, by the constitution, which expressly provided that all bills for the purpose of raising revenue should originate in the House of Representatives. It took a view of the main features of the bill, as explained by the senator from Missouri, and contented himself with appealing to the senator whether the bill did not strictly come within the prohibitory clause of the constitution. The question of reception he asked the yeas and nays.

Mr. Benton replied that such bills, or those of a like character, had been tolerated before, and referred to the compromise act, which he maintained had been passed in that body, and all he asked was, that his bill might have the same course.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, thought that the question of reception had better come up after the bill was printed, and its provisions understood. At the first blush, there appeared to him other important objections, of a constitutional character, besides those suggested by the senator last up. If the power existed to tax the banking institutions of the states for revenue, it might, with the same propriety, be so exercised as to annul the whole of the protective doctrine he was not prepared, by any means to admit.

Mr. Webster contended that more respect ought to be had for the constitution than to entertain such a bill in the senate.

A motion was made by Mr. Pierce to lay the motion to receive on the table; when a long discussion ensued, chiefly on points of order, in which Messrs. Hubbard, Hamilton, Webster, Calhoun, King, Pierce and Preston took part.

The question on laying the motion to receive on the table was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, Linn, Lundy, Marshall, Porter, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Sargent, Tappan, Walker, Wall, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Buchanan, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Hunt, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, King, Knight, McKim, Mangum, Nicholas, Phelps, Porter, Preston, Fremont, Roane, Ruggles, Smith, of Indiana, Tallmadge, Welles—22.

Mr. Benton said that his object was attained, and he would withdraw the motion for leave to introduce the bill.

On this point a discussion ensued, which lasted for some time, as in the right of the senator to withdraw the bill. Mr. Huntington, Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Webster, Mr. Preston and others, denying the right, and Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Pierce, Mr. Sevier and others, maintaining it.

Mr. Benton then asked leave, by the courtesy of the senate, to withdraw it; which being granted, the senate adjourned over to Monday.

December 28. The vice president communicated to the senate a letter from the state department, covering an abstract of the returns of collectors.

Also, from the legislative council of Iowa, praying an appropriation to improve and continue the military road from Dubuque to Missouri.

Also, asking an amendment of the organic laws of the territory.

After the presentation of memorials and petitions, several reports from committees, on private claims were made.

On motion of Mr. Norvell,

Resolved. That the committee on Indian affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to enable the president of the U. S. to negotiate for the extinction of the Indian title to the unappropriated lands lying in the upper peninsula of the state of Michigan.

On motion of Mr. Smith, of Indiana,

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report to the house a copy of correspondence between the department and the governor of Indiana relative to the lands granted to the set of the 2d of March, 1837, for the part of the Volusia and Erie canal which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and the line of the state of Ohio, which could not be set off to the state of Indiana in the settlement that took place in 1829 and 1830, in consequence of the Indians into these not being then extinguished. And that he also report what quantity of the state of Indiana, was entitled to under said set for that portion of said canal and what portion of the land has been granted to Indiana already, as Indian reservations by treaty with the Miami.

On motion of Mr. Benton,

Resolved, That the committee on foreign relations inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for an outfit for Commodore Porter, not provided for when appointed resident minister at Constantinople.

On motion of Mr. Walker,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of assigning the present district judge of the United States for the state of Mississippi to one of the districts in said state, and of appointing a separate judge for the remaining districts.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama,

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the appointment of a marshal in each district attorney for the middle district of Alabama.

The following bills were severally considered in committee of the whole and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A bill to amend an act entitled "an act to authorize the state of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles to certain lands therein described, and to settle the claims to the vacant and unappropriated lands within the same," passed the 15th day of April, 1836.

A bill to authorize the secretary of the treasury to procure steam vessels for the revenue service.

A bill allowing drawback on foreign merchandise exported in the original packages to Cullhuahua and Sanle Fe, in Mexico.

A bill making an appropriation to complete the removal of the raft of Red river, and for other purposes.

A bill to establish a board of commissioners to hear and examine claims against the U. States.

A number of relief bills were also considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed, after which the adjourned.

On the 29th, in the evening, immediately after the reading of the journal, Mr. Anderson rose to announce the death of his colleague, the late F. L. L. GRUNDY, of Tennessee; after which Mr. Benton followed, adding his testimony to the worth of the deceased.

The usual resolutions adopted on these melancholy occasions were then passed, and the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, Dec. 22. The speaker laid before the house sundry communications:

I. From the secretary of the navy, accompanied with a list of officers on furlough or leave of absence, showing the names of the officers, with the date of absence, the time allowed, and the date of furlough, the time those on furlough or leave have served at sea at any one time for the last twenty years, and how often their furloughs have been renewed, &c. Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

From this return it appears there are on leave or furlough 1 commander, 32 lieutenants, 4 surgeons, 7 assistant surgeons, 9 pursers, 13 passed midshipmen, total 66.

II. From the secretary of war, with a report from the commissioner of pensions containing the information which is required to be laid before congress at each session by the joint resolution of the 29th May, 1830, in relation to pensioners, revolutionary, invalid or otherwise, who shall have made application for pensions or an increase of pensions, and who, in his opinion, ought to be provided for, but whose cases may not be embraced by the laws.—Laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

III. From the clerk of the house, as follows: To the hon. R. M. T. Hunter, speaker, &c.

In obedience to the further order of the house, passed December 21, 1830, "that said report be recommitted to the clerk, with instructions further to report by what authority, on what vouchers, and through whom, he paid to E. B. Bailey the sum of $300, to Bayne Newcomb the sum of $116, and to George Lowry the sum of $104, for services rendered by them in taking depositions in the case of the contested election between Messrs. Ingersoll and Naylor, as reported in Doc. 7; by what authority, and on what vouchers, he sent to Mr. Naylor money to pay his witnesses, and which that gentleman says he returned; whether the said vouchers give the names and time of attendance of the said witnesses, in whose land writing it was filed, and what has become of the same," I beg leave to report.

That the account presented by E. B. Bailey for services as clerk, &c. amounted to $269 80. On the face of this account was an order signed by the chairman of the committee on accounts to pay $600 said Bailey.—The account presented by Bayne Newcomb for services as commissioner, &c. amounted to $320. By a similar order written on the face of the paper, I was directed to pay $116. The account of Geo. Lowry, as doorkeeper, amounting to $100, being reduced to $104, and the balance was directed to be paid by a verbal order. In like manner the sum allowed for payment of witnesses on behalf of Mr. Naylor, amounting to $780 70, was also directed to be paid by verbal order, which is the mode usually practised by the committee when accounts are clear and undisputed.

The vouchers give the names and times of attendance of witnesses; but having no acquaintance with the handwriting in which they are drawn, I herewith communicate the original papers (Nos. 366, 336) for the use of the house.

The various sums above mentioned, together with one other of $104 for Peter Lewis, were enclosed in separate drafts to the hon. Charles Naylor, Philadelphia, to be paid out to the respective claimants, as will appear from the letter of the accounting clerk herewith communicated and marked A.

In Mr. Naylor's answer to this letter, he returned $780 70, the sum allowed for witnesses, and also the draft for $104 in favor of Peter Lewis, stating that he did not feel authorized to receive and pay out the same, as will more fully appear from his letter; a copy of which is herewith communicated, and marked B.

The sum of $11 50 returned by Mr. Ingersoll, as stated in my former report, and $884 76 returned by Mr. Naylor, have been credited to the contingent fund of this house.

All which is respectfully submitted.

HUGH A. GARLAND,

Clerk of house of reps. United States.

Mr. Floyd moved that this communication be referred to the committee on accounts, who have under consideration the clerk's communication of yesterday, on the subject of the said subject.

Mr. Smith, of Connecticut, thought the report ought to be referred to the committee on public expenditures, or to a select committee, as it was the act of the committee on accounts that was under investigation. He moved that the matter be referred to the committee on public expenditures.

Mr. Floyd explained, and showed the propriety of the reference to the committee on accounts.

The question was then put on the reference to the committee on accounts, and carried.

Among the petitions, &c. presented to-day, were the following:

By Mr. Morgan, the petition of John Richardson and other citizens of Cayuga county, New York, asking for the passage of a general bankrupt law.

By Mr. P. J. Wagner, the petition of Daniel Cady and 252 others, inhabitants of Fulton county, New York, praying for a law to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

By Mr. Grinnell, memorial of Paul Babcock and 1,190 other citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a bankrupt bill.

Also, a memorial of James Millin and 165 citizens of New York, asking for the passage of a bankrupt bill.

Mr. Cusey, from the committee on the public lands, reported a bill for the relief of the owners of bounty land warrants granted for military services in the late war between the Great States and Great Britain; which was twice read, and committed for to-morrow.

Mr. Lincoln, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a right of pre-emption to certain lots on the lands of Perryburg, in the state of Ohio, which was twice read, and committed for to-morrow.

Mr. W. Cost Johnson, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported two bills, viz: A bill making temporary provision for lunatics in the District of Columbia; and

A bill to revive and continue the corporate existence of certain banks in the District of Columbia. These bills were severally twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. F. Thomas, from the committee on naval affairs, reported a bill concerning navy pensions and half pay.

Mr. Adams inquired if the bill contained an appropriation for the benefit of the navy pension fund. Mr. Thomas answered that it did; that there was an item in it appropriating upwards of $150,000 for the benefit of that fund; and that he contemplated calling up the bill for consideration at an early day.

The bill was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. Rives moved to take up the report of the committee on elections, made at the last session, on the contested election between Mr. Naylor and Mr. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of appointing a day for the consideration of that case, and proposed that to-morrow may be assigned for that purpose.

After some conversation between Messrs. Rives, Crabb, Fish, and Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Rives varied his motion to the first Tuesday in January, in which form the motion was agreed to.

The resolution moved by Mr. Kariden, on the 17th inst, directing the committee on public lands to inquire into the expediency of setting aside $300,000 of the proceeds of the public lands for the continuation of the Cumberland road in Ohio to its western termination, came up in its order for consideration. When this question was under consideration the committee on the proceedings of that bill on the table, and that question being put by yeas and nays, it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 105, ayes 82.

Mr. Davis, of Indiana, moved the following resolution, which was laid over, under the rule, for one day:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the geological report made at the last session of congress by the commissioner of the general land office, or printed, and the maps properly engraved, for the use of the members of this house.

Mr. Preffelt, of Indiana, moved the following: Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing for the expenditure of $100,000 in each of the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, during the year 1841, on the following subjects:

Mr. Preffelt would say a word or two, he said, as it might possibly have a good effect upon this house, and upon the portion of country which he in part represented. In Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, the public implements, steamboats and instruments, employed in the construction of the public works, had been ordered to be sold under instructions from the general government. He saw, also, that, on the like sale in Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, the public implements, steamboats and instruments had also been directed to be sold by the authority of the United States. He did not wish to create any excitement, prejudice or sectional feeling; he called on the house, and he wished to take notice of what he said, that the time would soon come, unless a different course of proceeding were adopted, when the eight states and territories of the west, in spite of all their efforts to keep out sectional feelings, would be constrained to make their weight felt on this floor. They had asked a fair distribution of the expenditures and proceeds of the general government. During the last year, not one dollar had been expended in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Arkansas, Iowa or Wisconsin. Every day something was heard about southern rights, feelings and interests. He saw, also, by the records, that appropriations had been made for the Berwick branch of the Piscataqua river. — He asked, why was it that the western states, which were in peril in itself, was to be trampled in a river? Here, a deliberate vote had been given that this great work of the Cumberland Road should be abandoned. The weight of the west had already been felt—in a matter of no great importance, 15,000 from another, and 13,000 from a third state in the next presidential contest, gentlemen would see half a million of votes poured down to decide these matters. And, if something was not done, he would see some states of his people whether they would not forego both sections of country to do justice to them.

Mr. P. alluded, among other things, to the forty thousand Indian warriors congregated on the borders of Arkansas, and to the absence of posts of defence. It might become necessary for a great western convention to assemble at some central point, in order to compel justice to be done to them. Would the house force such a step upon the west? Whenever the south had asked an appropriation of the public land, the west had come boldly forward and voted for it. So with the north; and yet the west might ask in vain.

One prediction he would make, and he assured gentlemen they would see it verified. They would see a majority of the western states, and a majority on the part of the west, which no power on this floor could resist.

Mr. P. alluded to the increased representation which the western states would have under the new

Mr. Jones answered, upwards of seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. Jones, from the same committee, then reported a bill making appropriations for the navy for the year 1841; which was twice read and committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

On motion of Mr. McClellan, it was

Resolved, That the committee on the public buildings and grounds be instructed to inquire whether the failure of the chamber in the well at the house was caused by a defect in workmanship and construction; and also whether any money has been paid by the State, and, if not, whether any ought to be paid, to the contractor of the chamber.

On motion of Mr. Weller, it was Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be required to report to this house, whether and, if any, what, part or surplus of additional sections, or parts of sections, (lying along and adjoining and within the line of alternate sections, on the Miami canal, in the state of Ohio, and withheld from sale at the same time), have been sold since January 1, 1830, to January 1, 1836; also, that the state to whom said lands were sold, at that office, at what time, and at what price; and that he furnish copies of all instructions given to the different commissioners of the general land office, from time to time, to withholding from sale lands on the route of said Miami canal, in the state of Ohio, as alternate sections on said canal.

Mr. John Quincy Adams moved that the bill of the last session, No. 100, reported from the committee on manufactures from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams), "to ensure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports," and which passed both houses, and was lost for the want of the action of this house on the amendments of the committee on manufactures, be amended to the senate, to the committee on manufactures.

Mr. Pickens said that if the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) asked to introduce this bill by general consent, he (Mr. P.) should object, because he was opposed to the policy and the expediency of the bill, and he objected, therefore, to give it any precedence on the calendar.

Mr. Stanly moved that the rules be suspended to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) to submit his motion. He (Mr. S.) believed that false alarms had gone forth in relation to the bill. He had himself felt some opposition to it at the last session, but since he had seen the amendments of some of the friends of the bill (and others) he thought it highly necessary that some such measure should be adopted in order to put a stop to frauds on the revenue.

Mr. Wise rose to inquire whether the bill in reference to which the question had been made was the revenue bill, as it was called?

Mr. Adams. Yes.

Mr. Wise was understood to inquire whether the gentleman proposed to introduce the new tariff bill of thirteen or fourteen sections.

Mr. Adams said his proposition was to refer the bill, as it passed both houses of congress at the last session by a majority of at least two to one, and which was defeated on one of the last days of the session, to the committee on manufactures, to be reported to the committee on manufactures to pass upon a small amendment that was pending between the two houses. His motion was to refer the bill in the state in which it was at the expiration of the last session, to the committee on manufactures. It was not his purpose to refer the bill, with a view to report the whole of the same bill. And, as the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) had made the inquiry, he (Mr. A.) would state that, as he was concerned, he did not propose to report that part of the bill which was rejected by the senate to the original bill which went from this house. That bill contained, in point of fact, two bills founded upon two different states of circumstances; the first founded upon a report from the treasury department recommending provisions of that kind, and founded, also, upon a great multitude of petitions from the manufacturers of the country, for the purpose of suppressing frauds on the revenue. That was the bill, the subject matter of which was referred to the committee on manufactures, and reported to this house.

As to the other subject which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) was pleased to call a bill of thirteen or fourteen sections of new tariff, that was a bill founded upon complaints on the part of the administration here, and particularly of the collector of customs in New York, against certain constructions which had been given to the act of 1834, by the courts of the United States, and correcting those constructions by the committee on legislative construction in the same bill. The latter bill was not referred to the committee on manufactures, but to the committee of ways and means; though, he believed, the committee of ways and means never acted upon it at all. At all events, they made no report; and he did not know that they had ever considered the subject at all. But when the other bill for the suppression of frauds on the revenue went from this house to the senate, it was there referred to the committee on finance, to which same committee was also referred the other subject which, in this house, had been referred to the committee of ways and means. In consequence of the reference of both subjects to the committee on finance of the senate, that committee reported the bill which went from this house for the suppression of frauds with certain amendments, and then reported as additional bill, which was the bill that the gentleman from Virginia had characterized as a bill containing thirteen or fourteen sections of new tariff. And the bill, having been thus amended and added to by the senate, was returned to this house, where the whole bill, as it came from the senate, was passed with certain small amendments. Those amendments went back to the senate, and were again sent back to this house with some small amendments; and it was in this state that the bill, at the close of the session, laid simply for want of time; it failed on a motion made by himself that the house take it up at once. There was a large majority in favor of about 80 to 60—in favor of the motion; but not two-thirds, as required by the rule, and the bill could not therefore be taken up. Now, his motion was to refer the bill, to that state, to the committee on manufactures, and it would be referred to the committee to report it, in whole or in part, as they might think proper.

It was not his wish, so far as his vote went, to report a revenue bill, or a tariff bill, as the gentleman said, but he wished to call it into question for the suppression of frauds; and, in stating this to be his motive, he wished that the committee on manufactures might have the whole subject before them, and they would decide whether they would report the bill to the state in which it was, or only a part of it.

His object further was to lay before the committee and this house what were called the proceedings of the merchants of New York, and to which he desired the attention of the friends of New York in his eye. It was called a meeting of the merchants of New York; and who were they? They were three or four—[Here Mr. Wise rose to make an inquiry of Mr. Adams, who desired that he might not be interrupted].

Mr. A. continued. This meeting will give some little information to the house about their own proceedings, and it will tell them in the way that they are conducted. It will show the proceedings of the merchants (so called) of New York treat this house—in what manner they say this house is to be managed, with money and champagne, to decide bills of this kind. The proceedings of that meeting have been reported in the newspapers, and the newspapers will show what is the estimation in which this house stands with that class of the merchants of New York. I believe there is not a native of New York among them; they are the very people in view of whom the bill to prevent frauds on the revenue was passed. They are the allies of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens), and I congratulate him on the character of his allies. Mr. Adams continued, and Mr. Wise having taken the floor, the question was raised as to the order of this debate.

The speaker said the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams) had proceeded by general consent, and the gentleman from Virginia could only present his question.

After a few moments' delay—Mr. Wise, having obtained the indulgence of the house, said that he was not in his place for five or six months of the last session, and he did not, therefore, know that he was correct in even alluding to this matter, though he thought he was as to the facts generally. Mr. W. proceeded to say that when this bill came originally, it came up as a bill professing to prevent frauds upon the revenue by the introduction of the tariff question, and that with the compromise act—but a bill to prevent frauds—to enforce the existing tariff. As such a bill, it had passed this house. It was discussed here, and although he was opposed to it in that aspect, as being in many of its provisions altogether commercial, yet he made no particular opposition to it at the time; and he believed it received little or none. The bill passed the house, and went to the senate; and there, under the auspicious title of a bill to prevent frauds on the revenue, a bill of some fifty or sixty sections was swelled out into thirty or forty or three; and when southern gentlemen came to look at the last session, they found that duties had been laid upon linen, worsted, silks, and articles in which they felt an interest; and that the senate, without giving particular attention to the bill, had laid on a new tariff in fact, disturbing the compromise, as he contended, and increasing the duties from nothing to fifty per cent. in some instances—and from a nominal amount to 25 per cent. in others. He said that the information which he had, this bill, with the sections providing a new tariff, never did pass this house. If he was wrong, the gentleman from Massachusetts would correct him.

Some further interruption here took place on a point of order, but being permitted to proceed—Mr. Wise continued. He arranged this administration for this new tariff brought forward by the chairman of the committee on finance (Mr. Wright); and although many of our whig senators voted for it, yet he (Mr. W.) forgave them because he believed they knew not what they did. This was all he had to say except to repeat the declaration (though not then present in his seat) that the bill containing thirteen sections never did pass the house. If it had come up, there was one eye that would have watched it, one vote that would have opposed it, one member of the house that would have resisted it pugna et ceteris. He had at the time spoken to a colleague who had just returned from the committee who had assured him that he might make himself easy, for that, with the sections appended to it by the senate, the bill would never kick again.

The proceedings of the meeting of the New York merchants, and the proceedings of the committee of the senate, (Mr. Adams) had referred, were caricatured, as he (Mr. W.) was told, in the New York "Herald," &c., and in that paper Mr. Jeffray was said to have arranged congress for neglect or dereliction of duty, for want of champagne, and the business of the country, and to have said that money was required for an agent to represent any interest at the seat of government. Mr. W. here adverted to the fact that a letter had been written by Mr. Jeffray denying the truth of this report in the "Herald," &c.

He (Mr. W.) could not see the object of raising a tariff discussion now; nor of the assertion of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) that gentlemen of the south were the allies of those who were disposed to slander the members of this house. Such men were not the allies of the south on this subject. The south stood alone upon its own strength. All they ask was, to leave the question to the south, or to the prevention of the question was raised, as it must shortly be, let it be brought out boldly, and not be insidiously sneaked into a bill professing, by its title, to be a bill to prevent frauds on the revenue.

This bill will be reported at the last session, and he believed that, by the rule, it died with the session, and must be introduced de novo; and he, therefore, added his objection to that of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens) either to the introduction of the bill, or to the prevention of the bill on the revenue in the manner in which that bill proposed.

Mr. Monroe rose and, after some comment, obtained the general consent of the house to say a few words.

He was not so fortunate, he said, as to be in his seat when the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) first rose to make his motion in relation to this memorable bill of the last session of congress. He (Mr. M.) was not present at the time when such came in contact with that gentleman at any time. My respects for him (continued Mr. M.) would alone induce me to refrain from answering him in this house whenever I can consistently do so. But I present myself to you at a meeting which is such to be the peculiar prerogative of some gentleman on this floor to assail—the high-minded and honorable merchants of the city of New York.

I do not rise, Mr. Speaker, to make an address to this house in behalf of those who may fall justly under the denunciation of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts; but I do not desire to have connected with that class the whole commercial community of the great emporium of this land. The gentleman tells you of a meeting which has been held by the merchants of New York. It is true such a meeting was held, and it was attended by some gentlemen who are as high-minded and honorable as the gentleman himself; and if he knew them, he would respect as I, and who also knows them, do respect them. I admit there was a certain newspaper which undertook to publish a mere caricature of the proceedings of that meeting—a publication which has been deeply mortifying to the merchants of New York, and that meeting with honest views and for honest purposes.

It is known to the members of this house, that I have seldom taken the floor, or occupied its time in debate. I will, therefore, ask the indulgence of the house to read this letter from Mr. Jeffray.

The letter was then read (by the clerk) as follows:
New York, Dec. 21, 1840.

My dear sir: It was not till last Friday that I learned, for the first time, that a ridiculous article in the "Herald," ascribed to me, had caused much hostility against me at Washington; and I immediately proceeded to contradict it in the same paper, of which I sent a copy to every member of congress. It was a complete luncheon-piece, as I like what I said as a monkey is like a man. He it was viewed in this light; laughed at for a day, and forgot, as usual with the jokes of that paper; and I and others were surprised when we found that it had been received as gospel at Washington. When it appeared, I was amused by it; but, at the same time, I asked a good many of my friends if I ought to reply to it. With one accord they dissuaded me from doing so, from the well known character of the paper in turning every thing to ridicule, which, they said, was as well known at Washington as it is here. I thought so, too, and dismissed the matter from my mind. Few things, in my long life, have grieved me so much. The object of what I said was diametrically the reverse. It was to convince the meeting that an agency at Washington was perfectly honorable, and had not, and could not have, any sinister object, but was usual in all countries which had legislative bodies. You know as well as I do the peculiar talent of the editor of that paper for caricature, which furnishes so much amusement to all this city, and has long done so. My respect for congress was greatly increased by my visit last July, and this has been the subject of my daily conversation ever since that time. And I had been so much gratified, that I had intended to repeat my visit every winter, and it would be most painful to me to be precluded from doing so by so foolish a thing as this ludicrous travesty.

As I have not time to write to every one, I request that you will show this letter to the members from this city, and to any other gentlemen whom you may think it best to have the honor to be yours, respectfully. ROBERT JAFFRAY.

The hon. James Monroe, Washington.
Mr. Cushing inquired of Mr. Monroe whether the writer of the letter was an American or a foreigner. If he was a British subject, he said, the house would stand him by, he wished to know the fact whether we were to have British influence here.

Mr. Monroe replied that the writer was, he believed, a Scotchman by birth, but that his character was very high in the estimation of all one of our most respectable importing merchants. He (Mr. M.) had never seen the gentleman till he had met him here at the last session, and had only seen him once or twice since. But, as the house to be was, that if there should grow up to the city of New York an alien merchant—a foreigner, or a Virginian or Georgian—and his character should not prove such as it ought to be, that isolated instances of unworthiness should not be permitted to detract from the character of the great community of merchants there.

In reply to the remark which had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. Wise), that there had been no discussion on the bill, I will here declare (said Mr. M.) that the only decent and parliamentary discussion which I have heard in this house in the whole seven or eight months during which I have had the honor of a seat, was on that very bill. It was discussed three days without introduction of party politics, but with reference simply to its merits and demerits. If political considerations were brought in at all, it was only in a momentary allusion to my belief that, as one of the gentlemen from Massachusetts who seemed to think he might gain strength to his argument in the eyes of one party, by intimating that we had no reason to oppose the bill except that we were politically opposed to the administration.

I wish this bill to be referred. Let us have an open, bona fide, statesmanlike plan proposed to us of protecting the revenue from fraud, and I will go for it honestly and heartily. But I will not go to a baiting of the bill for the sake of men. And I hope that when a bill does come up we shall have nothing to do with Mr. Jaffray, or any other individual, or merchant, but that we shall take it up as the representatives of freemen, and adopt or reject it according to its merits, this is the only course worthy of this house.

Mr. Pickens here explained that if the object of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) was simply to refer the bill to the committee on manufactures, that they might report such parts as they thought proper, without giving it any precedence, he (Mr. P.) would make no objection.

Mr. Adams explained that he had expressly stated such to be his object.

Mr. A. then corrected an error into which he said he had fallen, in stating that the second bill had actually passed the house. It was considered in the committee on manufactures, and was reported, with two or three small amendments only, by a majority of five yeas and four nays. It was upon those amendments that the bill failed, on his motion to take it up as before stated.

After a few words from Messrs. Wise and Staley, The question on the motion to suspend the rules was taken, and decided in the affirmative: yeas 131, nays 45.

Two thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rule was suspended, and Mr. Adams' motion to refer the bill, with the amendments of the senate to the committee on manufactures, was then fully before the house.

Mr. Wise moved that the matter be referred to the committee of ways and means.

The question on reference to the committee on manufactures taking precedence, the yeas and nays were called for, and ordered.

Mr. Pickens called for the reading of the title of the bill; which having been read—

Mr. Wise called for the reading of the whole bill, but subsequently modified his call so as to read that part only which was added by the senate, containing, principally, a new tariff of duties on sundry species or classes of merchandise.

Mr. Tilgham then directed the reference of the bill to the committee on manufactures. The petitions against frauds which had first roused the attention of congress and produced the bill, came from the manufacturing interest. It was an old maxim in finance, that two and two did not in all cases make four. An operation might evade the full payment of duties, and yet that very operation, by leading to a great increase of importations, might not, on the whole, injuriously affect the revenue; and, therefore, the chief evil to be remedied by the bill was not so much an impairing of the revenue (though he believed such to have been the actual result) as the injuring of the industry of the country. An enormous and regularly organized system of fraud had been discovered commencing on one side of the Atlantic and completed on the other; and, as the practical result of it was the injury of the manufacturing interest, the house had been of opinion that the subject belonged to the committee on manufactures; to which committee he hoped it would go.

Mr. Wise replied, that whatever might be the original shape or object of the bill, in its present form, it went, in effect, to increase the tariff by the direct raising of the rate of duty to be raised; but by providing such an interpretation of existing laws as would practically increase the duties, in some cases 15 and 50 per cent. It went to augment duties on linens, silks, and certain worsted goods; therefore belonged to the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Morgan demanded the previous question, which motion was seconded, put, and carried.

And the main question being on Mr. Adams' motion to refer the bill to the committee on manufactures, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 109, nays 60.

An error having occurred in raising the committee on steamboat explosions, it was, on motion of Mr. Underwood, discharged and a new committee was ordered to be constructed by the speaker, whose names we will hereafter give.

On motion of Mr. McKay, the report of the postmaster general, received this morning in relation to mail communications, was referred to the committee on the post office and post roads.

And then, it being late in the day, the house adjourned until to-morrow.

Thursday, Dec. 24. The speaker laid before the house the following message from the president of the United States:

To the house of representatives of the United States: Herewith I transmit a communication from the secretary of the treasury; and also, copies of certain papers accompanying it, which are believed to embrace the information contemplated by a resolution of the house of representatives on the 17th instant. M. VAN BUREN.

Washington, Dec. 23, 1840.

This is in answer to a call moved by Mr. Gerrit Davis, calling for a statement of appropriations made at the last session, the expenditure of which has been suspended by order of the president. The secretary states that no appropriation has been suspended since the postponement, which terminated on the 6th of November last. The message was read, laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the secretary of the treasury, in answer to the call of the 17th last, for the correspondence between him and the treasurer of the U. States, and between the treasurer and any of his clerks, relative to the actual operation of the sub-treasury bill as it passed the senate." Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from the postmaster general, in answer to an inquiry whether Ralph Jackson is a contractor for carrying the mail. The answer states that Ralph Jackson is not a contractor for carrying the mail. The letter was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The speaker laid before the house the following report from the clerk of the house:

Office of the clerk of the house of reps. Dec. 24, 1840. Sir: Referring to my report of December 23, 1839, on the subject of the sale of damaged and useless paper, I beg leave further to report that, desirous of obtaining better prices for the 1,892 reams remaining unsold, I placed them in the hands of Jno. Seymour & Son, of New York, to be disposed of at private sale, but soon found that the sales did not equal the expenses of storage, insurance and labor. (See account A.) I then replaced the balances of the paper in the hands of Messrs. Binger, Richards & Platt, who sold the whole August 24, 1840, at the trade sale in New York. The net amount of sales was $3,317 34, (see account B), which I have placed in the contingent fund of the house of representatives of the United States. All which is respectfully submitted.

HUGH A. GARLAND, Clerk of house of reps. United States.

The bills received from the senate yesterday were severally twice read and referred, as follows: The bill supplementary to an act to abolish imprisonment for debt; to the committee on the judiciary.

The bill to relinquish to Alabama the two negroes released by that act for her admission into the union; to the committee on the public lands.

The bill to establish an additional land district in Alabama; to the committee on the public lands.

The bill for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands who were deprived of township lots of the pre-emption law of June 19, 1834; to the committee on the public lands.

The bill to grant other lands to inhabitants of townships deprived of sixteen sections by Indian wars; to the committee on the public lands.

The bill to relinquish the interest of the United States to a certain tract of land in the state of Alabama; to the committee on public lands.

The bill to amend the act of the 19th of March, 1837, to divide the territory of Arkansas into fractional township lots south of, and range one half, in the state of Arkansas, to enter one-half section of land for school purposes; to the committee on public lands. The bill to authorize the inhabitants of township eight north, range thirty-two west, in the state of Arkansas, to enter a section of land in lieu of the sixteenth section, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes; to the committee on public lands.

The bill to settle the title to certain tracts of land in the state of Arkansas; to the committee on public lands.

The memorial presented yesterday by Mr. Reynolds from the legislature of the state of Illinois, praying a reduction in the price of the public lands, came up in its order for consideration.

When Mr. Reynolds presented this memorial he moved the reference to the committee on the public lands, and instructed the committee to bill to grant pre-emptive pre-emptive to actual settlers, and to reduce the price to settlers, according to the value of the land.

Mr. Reynolds advocated his motion at some length and dwelt upon the injustice done to the oaks states by the present land system.

Mr. Pickens regretted, he said, that his friend from Illinois, (Mr. Reynolds), had moved these instructions at this time. We were in the commencement of a short session. The subject matter of the instructions was of vast interest to nine states of the confederacy; and from what he had heard the other day from a gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Proffitt), and from the manifestations he had seen in all quarters of the house, there was no question which was to be brought before congress, in the future time, of deeper or more agitating interest than that of the disposition of the public lands. In legislation on these subjects, as well as on all others, he could say to his friend from Illinois, that he (Mr. P.) would legislate not for the tenants of log cabins on the one hand, nor of princely palaces on the other, but for the people and the land of his country and his government. He repeated that he regretted the gentleman had moved these instructions at this short session. The next congress would bring here a new set of representatives. This question of the public lands, the question of the tariff, and other great questions, were then to be brought up for consideration; and there would then be time to mature some measure which might do justice alike to individuals and to the states. He confessed that, looking to the prospects of the next census, this question of the public lands assumed a different aspect from what it had done twenty or thirty years ago. Congress was now to legislate for nine states. The states were interested now, not and a mere band of enterprising speculators, who, as it was thirty years ago, were seeking a home in the wilderness of the west. The fact was, then, that this was a question of government or colonial system; and he was free to confess that, when the subject came up, he would be found in favor of redeeming and setting free our colonies. He did not desire to see them placed in the miserable position they had occupied for ten years past, as annual mendicants before this house, asking one year for a pre-emption bill and the next for a graduation bill. He wanted some fixed system, and he looked at this not as a mere revenue or money question, but as a question involving considerations of the deepest interest to the independence and the freedom of the west. If we were to have a graduation bill or a pre-emption bill, he should expect that the system be fixed in advance; that they should not legislate by hatches and might arise; but that there should be a general law passed in advance, instead of making laws every two or three years to suit cases as they might arise. Such legislation was unjust as well as unwise; and that was the reason he had hitherto opposed the pre-emption bill and the graduation bill. No system of legislation could be wise which held out so strong temptations to injustice and partiality. He asked a question, and he would expect an answer; and the question should come up for adjustment at the next session of congress, upon broad and liberal principles—upon principles which, whilst they did credit to the government, would also do justice to the citizenry concerned. He would not have any man who might be forced to do; but he would say that if the threats of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Proffit) were to be verified, if the west were to come here and demand what they pleased to call justice, he (Mr. P.) would consider well whether he would not do his duty to the old states of the confederacy as well as to the new.

Mr. P. was then understood to urge the impracticability of congress legislating for the peculiar local wants of so many states. He said that the interests congress could have only a very superficial knowledge. Give the system to the states, and let them manage it. It was at war with the genius of the government that congress should be required to legislate upon so many local interests. How was he to become acquainted with the local wants and interests of the constituents of the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. Proffit), or the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. Reynolds)? It was impossible. And he was moreover anxious to stop off what he considered of corrupt executive patronage which had been exercised for the last ten or fifteen years connected with the public land system. If we were to have any law on the subject, he repeated, he preferred that we should wait till the next session. He would not say that he would go for a pre-emption system; but he believed that a graduation system might be necessary and essential so far as regards all those lands which had been twenty years in market. He thought such a measure due to justice, and right towards the states; but he was in favor of a general system based upon enlightened and statesmanlike views, such as would do justice to all. At present he could not vote for these instructions; he regarded the pre-emption and graduation bills as a mere expedient. He desired that the whole subject might be left to the wisdom, prudence, caution and patience of the next congress.

Mr. W. C. Johnson called for the reading of the memorial and instructions which had been read. Mr. J. proceeded to address the house at considerable length on the subject of the instructions, and in reply to the course of remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. Reynolds). He said, he could hardly know whether to express pleasure or regret that the proposition had been brought forward by the gentleman from Illinois, or that suggestions had been thrown out in relation to it by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Pickens). He (Mr. J.) hardly knew whether to express pleasure that the subject of the public domain had been introduced this session, or regret that it had not been deferred until the meeting of the next congress. It was, however, one of those questions on which his own opinion was not determined, and upon which he was ready to act now as he should be at any time. He believed it to be a question which required profound deliberation, and cautious and wise legislation. He had listened to the language of the gentleman from the west; he had heard them implore his house to be kind and generous towards them; he had heard them make appeals as if they were in the most dejected and impoverished condition. If the state of Illinois had suffered, as the gentleman who had addressed them this morning would have the house believe, from the oppressive legislation of congress, let him tell the house how it was that that state had increased in population in a ratio beyond that of any other state of this confederacy—why it was that notwithstanding its population had doubled here—why it was that that state was greater in its empire in the west. When gentlemen approached the house in this way, they ceased to be either generous or just to themselves, their people, or this house.

Mr. J. then referred to the history of the western states, and proceeded to demonstrate the fallacy of certain positions assumed by the gentleman from Illinois, (Mr. Reynolds), especially with regard to the alleged injustice of the federal government towards those states. In illustration of what he said that there was a certain gentleman who had thirteen sons, towards all of whom he cherished the kindest regard and the tenderest affection, and, as often happened, the youngest child became the greatest favorite. The parent got his youngest child a little will for him, in which he gave him homestead and stock—in short, all his real and personal estate, to this youngest son, and the rest of the estate to be divided equally among the other twelve. (Much laughter.) So it was with these young states. After they had seized upon the whole public domain, after they had grown up amidst the liberal policy of the general government, they came here and taunted the house with the power and address which they had just used to obtain the homestead and stock—that justice no longer had a habitation in their bosoms; but that they came here armed with power, and that they would teach the old states, not only that they will have their own property, but that, by the way, they would teach the men who would rob his neighbor for his own immediate benefit. He believed that gentlemen who uttered this language were not speaking the sentiments of a magnanimous and high minded constituency. If the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. Proffit) were on his knees—if they wished that their avenues to the marts of commerce should be laid open—let them vote for the amendment he should offer, and get their distributive share of the proceeds of the public domain; but that they should move with increased stride towards importance and wealth.

Mr. J. then entered into a minute examination of the policy of his amendment in its operation upon the states. He expressed his concurrence in the opinion expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Pickens) that he did not view this as a revenue question. He also expressed the belief that it was not the intention of the executive to bring forward any general plan of revenue at the present session; that that was to be thrown upon a new congress, and that this congress was to do nothing. The public was to be left to look to the future. It was, therefore, more incumbent on gentlemen who, like himself, were in the minority in this house, to propose measures. And in this he found an additional motive to offer this amendment. He designated also, as another motive, the war upon state credits which had been commenced at the other end of the capital; and he expressed the belief that the measure would be relieved; whilst the whole discussion as to the tariff, &c. might be left to the next congress.

Mr. Johnson moved to amend the instructions of Mr. Reynolds, by striking out all after the word "and" and to insert "and to insert 'and to have the proceeds of the sales of the public domain divided among the states in an equitable ratio, to be used by the states for internal improvements, education or any other purpose, as may be deemed wise by the states receiving the same.'"

Mr. Hubbard took the floor to reply to some of the statements of Mr. Johnson; and, in so doing, proposed to illustrate the accuracy of his own position by reference to statistical facts, having reference to the value of waste lands in Alabama.

Mr. H. had not proceeded far, when he said that this was a most important subject—that the discussion had been sprung up suddenly on the house—and that it should take time for consideration—and that if he had more time he would move an adjournment he would yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, then moved that when the house adjourns, it will adjourn over to Monday; which was agreed to.

As the state of the mind was then moved, and the question was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative: yeas 59, nays 94.

Mr. Carr Johnson moved to postpone the subject until the second Tuesday in January next; which he afterwards withdrew.

And another motion was made to adjourn, which prevailed. And the house adjourned until Monday, Monday, Dec. 31. Mr. Graves, of Kentucky, and Mr. Black, of Georgia, appeared in their seats today.

Mr. Smith, of Maine, presented a petition from citizens of New York for a bankruptcy law; referred to the committee on the subject.

Sundry bills from the senate, received their first and second reading and were referred.

The house resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. Reynolds, to refer the memorial of the legislature of the state to the committee on public lands, with instructions.

The question pending when the subject was laid before the house was the amendment of Mr. W. C. Johnson, of Maryland. Mr. Briggs offered the following as an amendment to the amendment, "and that the said committee report by the first day of February next."

After some conversation on points of order, Mr. J. moved that the whole subject be laid on the table; or, to be paid out of any and nays, were asked and taken, and decided in the negative: yeas 88, nays 111, when the further consideration of the subject, on motion of Mr. Thomas, was postponed to Wednesday week.

On motion of Mr. F. Thomas, the house, by unanimous consent, resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. McKay, of North Carolina, in the chair), on the following bill:

A bill concerning navy pensions and half pay. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the sum of one hundred and fifty-one thousand three hundred and fifty-two dollars and thirty-nine cents be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any and nays, the treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions and half pay chargeable on the navy pension fund.

The bill having been read, Mr. T. sent to the clerk's table the following letter from the secretary of the navy; which was read:

"Navy department, Dec. 1, 1840.

"Sir: I have the honor to state that the whole amount of money now on hand, to pay navy pensioners, is $18,647 61; and that there will be required in addition to fund on a deposit of $100,000, of existing year, 1841, the sum of $151,352 89; of which the sum of $51,476 73 will be wanted to meet claims for pensions becoming due on the 1st day of January next.

"The stock at present owned by the navy pension fund are:

City of Cincinnati 5 per cent.	$100,000
City of Washington 5 per cent.	33,329
Bank of Washington	11,000
Union Bank of Georgetown	14,400

Nominal value $158,729

"All these stocks have greatly depreciated in value, and some of them are now altogether unsaleable. The stock of the city of Cincinnati, standing highest, has been advertised to be sold at public auction on the 10th of this month, (December), for the purpose, in the first place, of reimbursing the Bank of America the sum of fifty thousand dollars advanced to it on a deposit of $100,000, for the purpose to meet the payment of pensions which became due on the 1st of July last, and afterwards to meet, as far as it may suffice, the payments falling due on the 1st of January next.

"To liquidate these and other claims becoming due in the year 1841, and at the same time to prevent the great sacrifice which must ensue if the stocks belonging to the fund be sold at this time, I have the honor to request that you will be pleased to call the attention of congress to the expediency of the commencement of its approaching session, and to recommend an immediate appropriation of the above named sum of $151,352 89 in aid of the fund; the deficiency in the means of satisfying the just claims of pensioners, which by an act of congress of 25th of April, 1840, the public faith was pledged to supply, having occurred. I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant."

J. K. PAULING.

"To the president of the United States. Mr. Thomas then briefly explained and urged the passage of the bill. After which Mr. Adams rose and addressed the committee at great length on several important subjects connected with the financial policy of the present and late administrations; making no mention of the subject of the passage of the bill, but strenuously urging the maintenance of the public faith in relation.

No amendment having been offered, the committee rose and reported the bill to the house.

And the question being on ordering the bill to a third reading—Mr. Shepard, of North Carolina, moved to amend the bill by adding the following section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act of March 3, 1837, entitled "an act for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund," be repealed.

After some debate on this amendment—Mr. Peck moved the previous question; which was ordered. And the question was put on the amendment of Mr. Shepard, and carried, yeas 81, nays 70.

This bill, as amended, was then ordered to a third reading; was read the third time forthwith, passed and sent to the senate for concurrence. And then the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Dec. 29. The journal of yesterday being read, Mr. Giddings moved that the house do reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which it agreed to the amendment moved by Mr. Shepard, of North Carolina, to the navy pension bill. "That the act of March 3, 1837, for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund, be repealed."

Mr. Reed said, if the motion to reconsider prevailed, he should move to amend it so as to incorporate the substance of the bill which was ordered. At the last and at former sessions, the better to regulate the subject of navy pensions; but he would now move that the subject be postponed till Tuesday next, and that, in the mean time, the bill and the documents connected with it printed.

Mr. Thomas, chairman of the navy committee, opposed the postponement, on the ground of the urgent necessity of an immediate appropriation for the relief of the fund; that if it were not made within a few days, the claimants belonging to it must be sacrificed by a forced sale.

Mr. J. Q. Adams was glad that the motion to reconsider had been made; and he said that nothing but the respect he entertained for the speaker, and the strong assurance that no appeal he (Mr. A.) might make would have been successful, prevented him from appealing from the decision of the speaker which admitted the amendment respecting the pension law of 1837. He believed the objection was entirely correct; but he said that there was an inconsistency between the provisions for which the bill was reported and the section which repealed that law. He had come here this morning intending to make the remark; but he said that he would not, as the committee, with instructions to strike out the section which had passed so rapidly, being under the impression that the bill had not finally passed. He made a strong appeal to the house not to waver, vengeance upon widows and orphans because congress had wasted the property to which they had a right.

Mr. Reed was urged to withdraw his motion, but declined to do it.

Mr. Tillinghast advocated the reconsideration, and spoke of the favor with which the act of 1837 was regarded by all classes in the navy; he also argued that it ought to have been excluded by the rules which prohibit a proposition different from that under consideration being received under color of amendment.

Mr. Thomas and Mr. Pickens both opposed the reconsideration and the postponement, and advocated the immediate passage of the bill and the repeal of the act of 1837.

Mr. Salmon advocated the reconsideration, and was opposed to the total repeal of the act of 1837. He went into a history of the navy pension fund, showing its institution; the various changes it had undergone since it was first established; and the claims of pensioners which had been provided for out of it since its original institution in 1800.

Mr. Shepard commenced a defence of his amendment; but before he had reached its merits, a message was received from the senate, by Mr. Dickens, its secretary, notifying the house of the death of the hon. Felix Grundy, a senator of the United States for the state of Tennessee, and of the proceedings had in this senate on that melancholy occurrence.

The proceedings of the senate were, at the request of Mr. Wheat, read by the clerk; after which Mr. Arton P. Brown, one of the representatives from Tennessee, rose and addressed the house as follows: Mr. Speaker: The painful announcement which we have just heard, make it proper that I should submit to the house the resolutions which I now send to you table.

It is true that the deceased, at the time of his death, was not a member of this house, but he was once a member of it; and the deep and irrefragable impression of his talents and patriotism, whilst he was here, the lapse of nearly thirty years has not been able to efface. What record in our archives does not tell of his great and invaluable services, in 1812, '13 and '14, when we declined and prosecuted with success "the second war of independence" against the proudest and strongest nation in the world? The bold and thrilling eloquence with which he urged this body to declare that war, and the readiness with which he voted for all the supplies, both of men and money, necessary to its prosecution, identified Mr. Grundy with the most illustrious patriots of that eventful period.

Were there only services, a nation's gratitude might still challenge at our hands, as well as from the body of which he was a member, some tribute of respects to the memory of one who was, at that period, so wise in council and so eminent in debate. His public career commenced more than forty years ago, in the convention for revising the constitution of Kentucky. He was then but twenty-one or two years of age, but exhibited, during the deliberations of that body, unerring evidence of his future usefulness and eminence.

He was afterwards, for six years, a distinguished and useful member of the legislature of that state; losing nothing by comparison with any of those eminent lawyers and statesmen of which Kentucky has so long been so prolific.

In 1806, he was elected one of the judges of the supreme court of that state, and was soon after appointed its chief justice, and discharged its duties with industry, impartiality and distinguished ability.

In the winter of 1807-'8 he removed to Tennessee, and for several years devoted himself exclusively to the practice of his profession, in which he had but few equals, and certainly no superiors. To his public career, who came in for some collision with such men as John Dickinson, Judge Haywood, Jenkin Whiteide, Judge Overton, and in later years with Judge Crabb and William L. Brown, is no ordinary praise. In criminal jurisprudence, even these claimed no superiority over him; but he stood out in advance of all others, unrivalled as an able, eloquent and successful advocate.

He served in the legislature of Tennessee, beginning in 1819, about the same length of time he had done in that of Kentucky—eliciting on his statute-book some of her most valuable laws, and giving to her legislation, by his precepts and example, much of that moral tone and liberality of principle which now distinguishes it.

In 1826, Mr. Grundy was elected to the United States senate, and commenced his labors in the body with the administration of gen. Jackson.—What his services to the country have been since then, either as a senator or attorney general, is too fresh in the recollection of all to need to be repeated on the present occasion. But the future history of this country (when that history can be written unbiased by the party prejudices of the day) cannot fail to award to Mr. Grundy the highest merit that has ever been ascribed to a senator, councillor, and eloquent and efficient senator, and an undoubted patriot.

The loss of such a man, at any time, must be felt by the nation. At such a moment as the present, when America stands in need of all the talents and all the patriotism of all her most gifted sons, his loss must be deeply felt and deeply mourned. To his own state, that he so dearly loved—which had honored him so often, and whose recent confidence he so justly was anxious to retain, he had devoted zeal and fidelity—to Tennessee, his loss must be almost irreparable. But, O God! what must it be to his bereaved family! To her, who was the wife of his bosom from youth to old age—whose life he was anxious to spend in the enjoyment of fame—to her, whom we (looking toward Mr. Turney) so lately saw watching by his side, with such conjugal affection and such Christian hope—that to her must be his loss! What to his children! But I forget that we have no right to complain of this house of mourning, whose agonized inmates must look to no earthly source for consolation in this sad hour of their bereavement and sorrow.

The following are the resolutions moved by Mr. Brown.

Resolved unanimously, That as a testimony of respect for the memory of the hon. FELIX GRUNDY, late a member of the senate of the United States, the house will go into mourning, and wear crepe for thirty days.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, this house do now adjourn, Monday, the 30th inst., until the house adjourned until to-morrow, 12 o'clock.

METEOROLOGICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We insert to-day some interesting tables of meteorological observations, with which we have been furnished from the registers of the Academy of Sciences in this city.

It appears to be the general opinion among the scientific men of the present day, that in the extension and accuracy which have been given to the mathematical theories of several branches of science, too much minuteness and refinement cannot be employed in making the observations, upon which those theories are put to the test. With this view, we saw the hourly magnetic observations, suggested by Mr. GAUSS, carried on in many points in Europe, and at Philadelphia, in the United States; and it was in the same spirit that Mr. JOSEPH F. W. HENNESSY, in 1835, was believed (then at the Cape of Good Hope) proposed that at certain convenient periods of the year, simultaneous observations should be made, at as many points on the earth as possible, of the indications and changes of the atmosphere; so as to afford the opportunity, afforded thus in a suite of extended records, of determining how far the great and sudden changes, which are of frequent and manifest occurrence, are to be attributed to local causes, and how far they may be combined with, or accounted for in the movements and perturbations of that general system, one of whose members is our earth. The days which he proposed, and which have been adopted by observers in several places, were the beginnings of the year, so called, or the equinoxes, and the equinoctial and solstitial epochs: unless those days should happen upon Sunday, in which case the observations are to be deferred until the next day. By the adoption of these thirty-six consecutive hours, which are taken, there is no danger but that the precise period in each of those remarkable stations of the earth's movement will be included; and also, there may be observations made at the same time, in all the points distant half the circumference of the globe.

In so majestic an inquiry we are glad to see our own citizens taking part; and we willingly bear ours in furnishing the temporary vehicle of conveying to the public their results, which, when in sufficient accumulation, will be of such immense interest.

The second of the tables contains (what is somewhat new to us, we must confess) the practical development of the mere arbitrary indications which are registered by the thermometer, and the aneroid, showing the actual influences upon the matter of the atmosphere, in weight, &c. of those apparently trifling movements which we continually observe in our barometers and thermometers. The explanation of the nature of the observations, and the data given in the words of a member of the academy, who has been good enough to write them out for us.

"The amount of vapor in the atmosphere is determined, by observing the temperature of a liquid of any kind, such as this air, and contained in a polished metallic or glass vessel, in which a deposit of moisture first takes place on the outside of such vessel—as, for instance, a glass tumbler in which, in summer, ice is placed. Such are the observations in the first and last columns of dew point, headed Dewfall and Observed. The former was with Daniell's hygrometer; the latter with a cooling mixture in a silver vase.

"But as this is a troublesome method sometimes, there are also means of arriving at a result in an inverse manner—by observing the fall in a thermometer, round whose bulb a wetted rag has been fixed. The comparison of this with the stand of a common thermometer, noted at the same time, gives the quantity of evaporation; which is manifestly in proportion to the quantity of water existing in the air. Several rules, or formulae, have been given by different philosophers, by which the relations of the point of deposition of dew are to be calculated; and three such formulae have been applied in the present instance. The first was that given by the American Philosophical society of Philadelphia, the second, by Dr. Anderson, of Edinburgh, a good mathematician and acute observer, and the last is one devised by the meteorological committee of the academy. The simplicity of this last one, as well as its coincidence with actual observations, has entitled it to an introduction. For the present, into the tables of the academy. It is, that the dew point is always a third proportional to the stand of the dry thermometer, and the dew point."—

We are sure that when our readers consider what an important and near connection there is between the meteorology of the atmosphere and the statistics of agricultural products and commercial effects, which our journal is intended mainly to register, they will not wonder that we used so much of that space which we have devoted to this subject; and which we propose to leave in future for similar tables, as well as for a regular monthly meteorological record, which, through the kindness of the academy, we have reason to believe we can promise hereafter.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The London correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer writes on the 3d December: "The intelligence from the United States has given the highest satisfaction in this country; the certainty of the election of general Harrison to the presidency being considered an event of extreme importance in the political and mercantile point of view. As general Harrison has not been in prominent political affairs as some of the better known transatlantic statesmen, there is rather more uncertainty as to the true prospects of the foreign policy of the United States under the new administration; but the few who are aware of the views of the new president, to those who have perused the enlightened, elegant and truly admirable speech, which was made by this gentleman at Cincinnati on the subject of the adopted constitution, know perfectly well that the government of general Harrison will be satisfactory towards all foreign nations—whilst those who do not happen to be sufficiently aware of the character of the new president, know that he is supported by Messrs. Webster and Clay, and therefore all parties have at least a vague opinion that this great change in the politics of America, is destined to be favorable to the relations between England and the U. States.

The general appearance of European affairs has been perfectly tranquil since 1830; but accounts from England and France. The eastern question has been friendly settled—for the fortress of St. Jean d'Acre fell into the hands of the allied powers after a bombardment of only a few hours; and intelligence since then received of the formal intervention of Mehemet Ali to the affairs of the majority of Egypt alone.

"In the French chamber of deputies, the debate on the address to the throne has lasted upwards of nine days; all the principal speakers exhausting their eloquence on the recent events—the summary of which however is, that Mehemet Thiers has sunk into the most perfect contempt, and that a overwhelming majority is firmly attached to the administration. Senot and Guizot, Thiers, Odillon, Barrot and Barrot have raved in vain about the insulted honor of France, for the chamber applauded with reverence the expressions of Guizot—"that the time of violence and conquest was gone by—France, wealthy, prosperous and free, should endeavor to preserve the blessings of power and adopt for her motto—peace forever—peace every where."

"The conclusion of the difficulty of the eastern question, has caused no extensive improvement in English monetary and mercantile affairs. The commercial exchange having become as sluggish favorable, and the exportation of bullion having almost entirely ceased within the last ten days. In consequence of the improving position of the Bank of England, the directors have given notice, that bills of exchange can be now discounted of the date of six months, a measure of relaxation from their recent practice of only discounting bills of ninety days; and although the rate of discount has not been yet reduced, yet the merchants and bankers appear very generally to be of opinion, that the general difficulties of trade have now been overcome—and that the improved condition of foreign commerce, and of the foreign exchanges, with the continued decline in the value of grain and advancing duties in foreign corn; all leads to the prospect of a rapid improvement in general affairs. The accounts from Liverpool and Manchester are better dated yesterday and to-day than for months past, if not for years; and though the close of the year is usually the duller of all pursuits in monetary affairs—there is in the present month of December, a revival of speculative business, and business, and falling prices of the French property in shares, and in several of the foreign funds.

"Since the arrival of the President steamship the business in American securities has been rather more animated, but the improvement in the quantity has not yet been material, the market having been prevented from assuming a more prosperous appearance by recent circumstances, particularly the stoppage of the great banking house of Wighams & Co. of New York, which firm has been reeling since the 1st of September. Their affairs have yet been obtained respecting the state of the effects of the house, or what amount of American stocks they may have been in possession of at the time of the failure of the bank."

EASTERN.

The following graphic and spirited sketch of the attack upon St. Jean d'Acre is given by the Davenport Gazette from the letter of an officer of her majesty's steam frigate Gorgon:

"On the 1st of October, when the British fleet, which firm was last of September were despatched from Beyrout, with three steamers under our command, to bombard this devoted place for three days before the general attack was made, which we commenced on the 1st of October, by standing in within range and firing till we had killed and wounded, and returning two for one. They fell around us like hail, but, strange to say, not a shot struck us; our bombardment was not very successful, as more than half the shells burst before they reached the shore, owing to the fuses being badly bored, and all the shells from the steamers failed alike, a circumstance not very creditable to those who made them, and sadly disappointing to us. It is not likely they were ever tried at such a distance before, 4,000 yards.

"At half past 4 o'clock, (how shall I describe this), as if by one consent, all firing ceased, and oh, heaven! what a sight! The whole town appeared as if it was in the air; so awfully grand a sight no one can describe. We saw nothing but one devilish cloud extending thousands of yards into the air, and on all sides, and then we felt an awful shock which gave the line of battle ships a heave of two degrees, so that you may judge from the moment of the explosion, all firing from the town ceased. The Turkish admiral Walker Bey, was boarded by one of our shells bursting in the main magazine of powder, by which, to speak within bounds, 2,000 souls were blown to atoms, besides beasts of burden of every description. In all the loss of the Egyptians is computed at 3,000 killed and wounded. At daylight what a sight was exposed to our view! The stupendous fortification, that only twelve hours before could boast of being among the strongest in the world, was so reduced, we could not find a square foot of wall that was not a ruin."

"On the morning of the 4th I went aboard to witness the devastation; the sight beggared all description. The bastions were strewn with dead, the guns dismantled, and all sorts of havoc. I then came to the spot where the explosion took place; it has laid a space of two acres quite bare, and hollowed it out as if a quarry had been worked there for years. And oh heavens, what a sight! It makes my blood run cold to write of it. Mangled human bodies of both sexes, strewn in all directions, women searching for their husbands and relatives, leaving their hair, beating their breasts, and howling and crying most piteously; God forbid I should ever see the like again."

The attack commenced a few minutes before two o'clock on the 3d inst.

The carnage appears to have been dreadful, but the loss of the British seamen and marines was, as we have already said, very trifling.

Israhim pasha was at Zebie, with from 15,000 to 20,000; but it is expected he will retire in moderation, without so much as attempting to stand against the allied force.

The base lies circulated by the Paris papers of the betrayal of St. Jean d'Acre into the hands of the besiegers for British gold, received from the above account abundant refutation.

One of the letters describes the state of the town thus: "On landing, the place known to be strong was found even still more so than what was conceived, and thanks may be returned to the Almighty, that this strong hold of the enemy has not cost the allies a greater loss of life. The town is one mass of ruins; the batteries and most of the houses are literally riddled all over; the killed and wounded lying about in all directions, lifeless trunks cut asunder, some without heads, others without legs and arms. Hundreds dying from the blood flowing from their wounds, and no one near to help them. The scene is truly awful."

A long account of the bombardment concludes in these words—"Such is the account of the taking of Acre, written twenty-four hours after the attack began, a city which baffled Bonaparte and a French army, and has undergone, both in ancient and modern history, the most calamitous and desperate sieges than any other city in the world."

The following is a list of the naval forces employed at St. Jean d'Acre:

Princess Charlotte 104, flag ship of admiral, the lion, 1st St. Jean d'Acre (commander-in-chief), captain: Fawcett; Powerful 84, (broad pennant), commodore Napier; Thunderer 84, capt. Berkeley; Bellphor 80, captain Austin; Revenge 76, capt. Walgrave; Benbow 72, captain St.uart; Edinburgh 72, captain Henderson; Custer, frigate, 36, capt. Collier; Pique, frigate, 56, captain Boxer; Carysfort, frigate, 26, (heavy 32 II. S.) capt. Martin; Talbot, frigate, 28, (cannon, 32 II. S.) captain Codrington; Hazard, sloop, 18, commander Hon. C. Elliot; Wasp, brig, 16, commander Mancel Gorgon, steam frigate, 2 and 4, commander Henterson; Platanix, steam frigate, 2 and 2, commander R. Stopford; Stroniboul, steam frigate, 2 and 4, commander W. Williams; Veuveus, steam frigate, 2 and 4, commander Henderson.

Lurkin, 100, rear admiral Walker; small cutter (captured), 8.

Austrian flag ship 60, admiral R. Bandieri; Austrian frigate 46, has royal highness archduke Frederick; Corvette 20.

The London Times of the 3d instant says: The Paris papers have arrived by our ordinary express. They are exclusively occupied with the eastern question, and the debate on the address in the chamber of deputies, which may be regarded as a branch of it.

The most important fact connected with this subject, alluded to in these journals, and confirmed by our private letters, is that the French government had received positive intelligence from Mehemet Ali had accepted the terms offered him by the allies; that Ibrahim had, in consequence, been recalled into Egypt with orders, to avoid all possible collision with the forces of the allies, and that the preparations for the restoration of the Turkish empire had actually commenced. "Nothing more remains to be done," observes a correspondent, "but to obtain from the allied powers some concessions which will enable France to recoup with honor from the position in which the treaty of the 16th July, and its execution, have placed her."

To obtain such concession was, it is now unquestionable, the object of M. Mounier's mission to London, and this I state with a perfect knowledge of the detail given to the statement that his visit to the British capital had a political object. What the concession sought for may be I know not, but something must be done to set at naught the cause, and to break her wounded armor propre, in order that she may not assume a proposition to disarm that will assuredly issue from the congress to be held in Vienna next spring." [Otago Herald.]

WELLAND CANAL. It appears by the Canadian papers that the British government have directed the purchase of the stock held by individuals in the Welland canal, and authorized the enlargement of the work to a larger scale. This movement will be of vast importance to Oswego, and presents the highest inducements for opening the rail road communication between this place and Syracuse. Steamboats running from here to all the ports on the upper lakes will secure to this route the whole western freights, and the completion of the rail road to Syracuse, will concentrate to this point the business and travel of the whole country bordering on Lake Ontario and the river St. Lawrence. A favorable charter has been obtained for the construction of this road, and the attention of our citizens should now be turned to the speedy prosecution of the work.—There is no difficulty in satisfying capitalists that the stock in this road will not only be profitable but secure to them in the state. [Otago Herald.]

The St. Johns (New Brunswick) Herald attributes general Harrison's success to the fact that he lives on "hard cider," and occupies a "log cabin" in "Providence" and says that "Van Buren has been 'de-throned' because he dined off silver plate, and drove his own carriage and four, and kept liveried servants." "The former," continues the Herald, "is an unknown and obscure person: the latter a thorough business gentleman, remarkable for his talents, extreme foresight and political sagacity. One has never been placed in any situation either to do much harm or much good; the other has, for the last four years, held the president's office at a time when it required all the management to manage, all the judgment of politics, and all the mind of Martin Van Buren to endeavor to set matters in a proper train. Should he live, Martin Van Buren will be president of the United States in 1845—that is if he will take the office."

EXCESS OF EXPORTS. There have been five years in our history since 1815 in which our exports have exceeded our imports. These years are 1820, 1823, 1827, 1828, 1840. The excess of exports over imports in 1840 is $26,766,069. This is quite remarkable. It is owing, doubtless, to our great indebtedness abroad. And since we are largely indebted, the above indication may be regarded as a correct one, though probably 12 to 15,000,000 dollars of it have gone to pay interest. [Nationist.]

THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.—The following are the documents transmitted to the house of representatives by the president of the United States, in answer to a call for copies of any correspondence between the governments of the two countries concerning the burning of the steamboat Caroline, &c.

Department of state,
Washington, Dec. 28, 1840.

Sir: The secretary of state, to whom has been referred the resolution of the house of representatives, dated the 21st instant, requesting the president "to communicate to that house (if it not in his opinion inconsistent with the public interest) all the correspondence between this government and that of Great Britain, or the officers or agents of either, or the officers and agents of this government with the president of the United States, touching the burning of the Caroline," has the honor to inform you that he has the pleasure to communicate to this house, on the subject of the outrage of burning the Caroline on the Niagara frontier; and whether there is any prospect of compensation being made to the owner of said boat for the loss thereof; and also, whether any communications have been made to this government in regard to the arrest and imprisonment of —McLeod, by the authorities of the state of New York, for being concerned in said outrage; and if so, that he communicates a copy thereof to that house," has the honor to report to the president, in answer to that resolution, the accompanying papers. Respectfully submitted, JOHN FORSYTH.
To the president of the U. States of America.

Mr. Stevenson to Mr. Forsyth.
Legation of the United States,
London, July 2, 1839.

I regret to say that no answer has yet been given to my note in the case of the "Caroline." I have not deemed it proper under the circumstances to press the subject without further instructions from your department. It is in the wish of the government that I should do so, I pray to be informed of it, and the degree of urgency that I am to adopt.

Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Stevenson.—Extract.
Department of state,
Washington, 11th September, 1839.

With reference to the closing paragraph of your communication to the department, dated the 2d of July last, (No. 74), it is proper to inform you that no instructions are at present required for again bringing forward the question of the "Caroline." I have had frequent conversations with Mr. Fox in regard to this subject—one of very recent date—and from its tone, the president expects the British government will answer your application in the case without much farther delay.

Mr. Fox to Mr. Forsyth.
Washington, Dec. 13, 1840.

Sir: I am informed by his excellency the Lieutenant-governor of the province of Upper Canada, that Mr. Alexander McLeod, a British subject, and late deputy sheriff of the Niagara district in Upper Canada, was arrested at Lewiston, in the state of New York, on the 12th of last month, on a pretended charge of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the piratical steamboat "Caroline," in the month of December, 1837. After a tedious and vexatious examination, Mr. McLeod was committed for trial, and he is now imprisoned in Lockport jail.

I feel it my duty to draw upon the government of the United States to take prompt and effectual steps for the liberation of Mr. McLeod. It is well known that the destruction of the steamboat "Caroline" was a public act of persons to her majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities.—That act, therefore, according to the usages of nations, can only be the subject of discussion between the two national governments; it cannot justly be made the ground of legal proceedings in the United States against the individuals concerned, who were bound to obey the authorities appointed by their own government.

I may add that I believe it is quite unnecessary that Mr. McLeod should be one of the parties engaged in the destruction of the steamboat "Caroline," and that the pretence charge upon which he has been imprisoned rests only upon the perjured testimony of certain Canadian outlaws and their abettors, who, unfortunately for them, are the subjects of the present communication. That act was the public act of persons obeying the constituted authorities of her majesty's province. The national government of the United States should themselves be upon to remonstrate against it, and a remonstrance which the president did accordingly address to her majesty's government is still, I believe, a pending subject of diplomatic discussion between her majesty's government and the United States legation in London. I feel, therefore, justified in expecting that the president's government will see the justice and the necessity of causing the present immediate release of Mr. McLeod, as well as of taking such steps as may be necessary for preventing further subjects from being persecuted or molested in the United States in a similar manner for the future.

It appears that Mr. McLeod was arrested on the 12th ult. that he was the examination of witnesses, he was committed to the custody of the British authorities, and in confinement in the jail of Lockport, awaiting the answer, which will be held there in February next. As the case is naturally occasioning a great degree of excitement and indignation within the British frontier, I earnestly hope that it may be in your power to give me an early and satisfactory answer to the present remonstrance.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration,
I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
H. S. FOX.

Hon. John Forsyth, &c.
Mr. Forsyth to Mr. Fox.

Department of state,
Washington, December 28, 1840.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge, and have laid before the president, your letter of the 13th inst. touching the arrest and imprisonment of Alexander McLeod, a British subject, and late deputy sheriff of the Niagara district in Upper Canada, who was charged of murder and arson, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the steamboat "Caroline," in the month of December, 1837, in respect to which you state that you feel it your duty to call upon the government of the United States to take prompt and effectual steps for the liberation of Mr. McLeod, and to prevent others of the subjects of her majesty the queen of Great Britain from being persecuted or molested in a similar manner for the future.

This demand, with the grounds upon which it is made, has been duly considered by the president, with a sincere desire to give to it such a reply as will not only be a proper regard for the rights of the subject, but also, at the same time, tend to preserve the amicable relations which, so advantageously for both, subsist between this country and England. Of the reality of this disposition, and the promptness with which it has been given in the many delicate and difficult questions which have arisen between the two countries in the last few years, no one can be more convinced than yourself. It is then with undiminished regard that the president finds himself unable to recognize the validity of a demand, a compliance with which you deem so material to the preservation of the good understanding which has been hitherto manifested between the two countries.

The jurisdiction of the several states which constitute the union is, within its appropriate sphere, perfectly independent of the federal government.—The offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged was committed within the territory, and against the laws and citizens of the state of New York, and is one that comes clearly within the competency of her tribunals. It does not, therefore, present an occasion where, under the constitution and laws of the union, the interference of the federal government, or for which a warrant can be found in the powers with which the federal executive is invested. Nor would the circumstances to which you have referred, or the reasons you have urged, justify the exercise of such a power, if it existed. The transaction out of which the question arises, presents the case of a most unjustifiable invasion, in time of peace, of a portion of the territory of the United States, by a band of armed men from the adjacent territory of Canada, the forcible capture by them within our own waters, and the subsequent destruction of a steamboat, the property of a citizen of the United States, and the murder of one or more American citizens arrested at the time, the offenders might unquestionably have brought to justice by the judicial authorities of the state within whose acknowledged territory these crimes were committed; and their subsequent voluntary entrance within the territory of another state, would not constitute an offence. The president is not aware of any principle of international law, or, indeed, of reason or justice, which entitles such offenders to impunity before the legal tribunals, when coming voluntarily within their jurisdiction and under their jurisdiction, and who have acted in obedience to their superior authorities, or because their acts have become the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two governments.—These methods of redress, the legal prosecution of the offenders, and the application of the law to the agent for satisfaction, are independent of each other, and may be separately and simultaneously pursued. The avowal or justification of the outrages by the British authorities might be a ground of complaint with the government of the United States, but arising from the violation of the territory and laws of the state of New York. The application of the government of the union to that of Great Britain, for the redress of an authority in violation of the peace, dignity and rights of the United States, and the violation of the state of New York of her undoubted right of vindicating, through the exercise of her judicial power, the property and lives of her citizens. You have properly remarked that the alleged offence of Mr. McLeod from the scene of the crime, at the time when it was committed, as not material to the decision of the present question. That is a matter to be decided by legal evidence; and the sincere dependence of the president on the justice of the law, as established. If the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her majesty's service, obeying the order of their superior authorities, this fact has not been communicated to the government of the United States by the American authorities to make the admission; and it will be for the court which has taken cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, to decide upon its validity when legally established before it.

The president deems it to be a proper occasion to remind the government of her Britannic majesty that the case of the "Caroline" has been long since brought to the attention of her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, who, up to this day, has not communicated any decision thereon. It is hoped that the government of her majesty will perceive the importance of no longer leaving the government of the United States uninformed of its views and proceedings upon a subject which has naturally produced much uneasiness, and which has led to such grave consequences. I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration. JOHN FORSYTH.

St. Paul, reg. &c. &c.
The New York correspondence of the National Intelligencer, of January 4, says: The Hamilton (U. C.) Journal states that Sir Allan Macnab was knighted in consequence of the Caroline affair, and was awarded a pension in representing the rebellion. This paper also adds, "the legal proceedings against the Caroline in American waters has not been yet pronounced upon by the British government." It is also said that when Macnab issued orders for the attack upon the Caroline, he supposed the vessel would be found upon Navy Island, and that he never contemplated an attack upon our shore. During the last session of the Imperial parliament, adds the Hamilton Journal, Lord John Russell was asked the question whether it was the intention of ministers to recommend her majesty to bestow any reward upon captain Drew (who commanded the party attacking) and officers engaged in that affair, to which Lord Russell replied, "rewards had been resolved upon, and as the question involved a subject of a very delicate nature, he must decline to answer it further. All this, if it turn out correct, and it looks so, throws a new light upon affairs recently discussed in Washington, and makes the prospect of an amicable settlement very bright."

THE SILENT TRIGGERS. Another seizure by the British. By the brig Cipher, just arrived from N. W. coast of Africa, we learn that another American vessel, a Salem brig, has been seized by a British cruiser, on the groundless suspicion of being engaged in the slave trade. The particulars so far as we have been able to gather, are these: The brig Tigris, capt. Fyfe, of Salem, while lying at Amherst, having her return cargo on board, and about to sail for home, was boarded and taken possession of, by order of the commander of the British cruiser Water Witch, and put to charge of a prize matter. The alleged pretence for the seizure was the fact that a black boy, a native of the coast, was in the service of capt. Fyfe, on board the brig, probably in the capacity of cabin boy; nothing was said of the fact that the boy was a native of that coast to employ the natives on board their vessels. The Tigris had been ordered to N. York in charge of the prize matter, and would sail soon—the captain and crew remaining in the brig. The cargo was disturbed. She had on board about 20,000 lbs. of ivory and a quantity of coffee.

The T. is owned by Robert Brookhouse, esq. one of our most active merchants, who has been extensively engaged in the African trade for many years. Capt. Fyfe is a young man, native of Salem, who formerly resided on the coast some years; and was on his first voyage as master. These practices manifestations of the British cruisers seem to indicate an intention to drive the American traders from the coast, and demand the immediate outlet of our government. Instances of petty insolence on the part of John Bull's armed vessels towards the Americans, have been frequent on that coast; if every state that is to be made the ground for a forcible seizure and detention, it will lead to serious trouble. STATES OF THE UNION.

LEGISLATURES OF THE RESPECTIVE STATES.
The following is the political character of the several states of the union.

Whig—18 states.

Van Buren—7 states.

Vermont,	Maryland,	New Hampshire,
Maine,	Virginia,	South Carolina,
New Brunswick,	N. Carolina,	Alabama,
Rhode Island,	Georgia,	Arkansas,
Massachusetts,	Indiana,	Missouri,
Connecticut,	New York,	Kentucky,
New Jersey,	Louisiana,	Illinois,
Pennsylvania,	Ohio,	Doubtful.
Delaware,	Michigan,	Mississippi.

The legislatures of all these states are, or will be, in session during the present winter, except those of New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Tennessee and Mississippi.

MAINE.

Congressional elect. Mr. Lowell, (V. B.) has, at last, been elected to congress in the Washington and Hancock district, by a majority of four votes. The entire vote stood as follows:

MARYLAND.

Message of the governor. Since your last session, no material change has taken place in the financial affairs of the state. As they were then fully explained, and as additional details will be found in the annual report of the treasurer, it is only necessary for me to give a general statement of their present condition.

The debt of the state is now fifteen millions one hundred and nine thousand dollars; but when the stock, authorized by existing laws, shall have been all issued, it will amount to fifteen millions three hundred and forty-six thousand.

The sinking fund, which last year, was one million thirteen thousand three hundred and seventy-two dollars, has been increased to one million, seventy-six thousand five hundred and thirty-three dollars.

For the year, ending the first day of the present month, the revenue, exclusive of sums received from internal improvement companies, and of those from the state deposits, amounted to $250,675; and the disbursements, exclusive of payments to these companies, and of the interest on the public debt, to $259,168; and this statement shows the amount of the ordinary revenue and expenditures.

The whole receipts of that year amounted to $342,237; and all the expenditures to $345,288, which sum includes the payment of $355,819, on account of the interest of the public debt.

According to the estimate of the treasurer, the demands on the treasury, for the present year, will amount to $927,000, and the receipts to $306,905; which will leave a deficiency of rather more than $620,000. The surplus revenue, now remaining on deposit at $148,000, which, being deducted from the estimated deficiency, will leave a balance to be provided for, of about $470,000; and after the present year, the annual deficiency will be upwards of six hundred thousand dollars.

This being the condition of the treasury, it is easier to perceive the necessity of making some provision to support the credit of the state, than to suggest such measures as will accomplish that object without being oppressive to the people.

In some of the states, a disposition has been manifested to rely upon the general government for the payment of their debts; and to claim for that purpose, the proceeds of the public lands. It is contended, that the federal government, as the national government, to be applied to for payment of the national debt; and that the debt having been paid, the states are now entitled to the revenues arising from that source.

A statement of the principal facts, connected with this question, will show, that the states have no just claim to the revenue arising from the sale of the public lands, and that they would derive but little benefit from it, if they had.

At the commencement of the revolutionary war, Virginia, New York, Massachusetts, South and North Carolina, Georgia and Connecticut, severally claimed such portions of the western country, as were included within their respective limits; and subsequently ceded the same to the United States for the common benefit of the union. Previous to the cession, congress had given a pledge, "that the unappropriated lands, which might be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular state, should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican states."

The cession was accordingly made; and it was stipulated in the conditions, that the land ceded, "should be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, according to their usual respective proportions in the general representation of the union; and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

The deeds from North Carolina and Georgia contained the same conditions as that of Virginia; while the other states relinquished their titles, in more general terms, for the common benefit of the union. When the cession was made by Virginia, congress had no power "to lay and collect taxes, duties and imposts," but was obliged to depend upon the state governments, for "their respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure." The public lands, in yielding a revenue to the general government, relieved the states, to the same extent, from any respective burden of taxation; and formed a common fund for the benefit of all the members of the confederation, according to the obvious meaning of the Virginia deed.

To consider the United States as having no other right to the western territory, because the title was derived from the deeds of cession, is to place the subject in a point of view, the most favorable to the claims recently set up in behalf of the states. But to understand the question properly, it is necessary to consider the prior claims of the crown to the States; and also the circumstances, under which Virginia and other states relinquished their titles. From the earliest settlement of the colonies, controversies existed among them, respecting their territorial limits, which interfered with each other on the Atlantic coast, and with the pretensions of France and Spain, in running westwardly to the Mississippi river and the South sea. By the treaty of 1763, the western claims of Great Britain were limited to the Mississippi; and the extensive territory, claimed by France to the eastward of that river, was ceded to the British crown. After the declaration of independence, it was contended by some of the states, particularly Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, that the crown lands, "if wrested from the common enemy by blood and treasure of the thirteen states, ought to be deemed a common property, subject to the disposition of congress, for the general good."

Maryland protested against the exclusive claims of the large states, and insisted "that the country, unseparated at the commencement of the war, claimed by the British crown, and ceded to it by the treaty of Paris, should be considered a common property, subject to be parcelled out by congress into free, convenient, and independent states."

The large states differed among themselves, as to their respective claims. Some claimed a larger portion of territory than the rest were willing to allow. The claims of the union were derived from the conquest of the disputed territory by means of the common force, and from the treaty of peace, under which all the rights of Great Britain, both in the soil and jurisdiction, passed to the United States.

This subject was a source of constant irritation, and threatened a dissolution of the federal alliance. At length Virginia, New York, and the other states, which claimed the western lands, successively relinquished their titles for the common benefit of the union.

Whatever might have been the uncertainty of these conflicting claims, there can be no doubt, that, after the relinquishment of the state titles, they were all vested in the United States, on the conditions expressed in the deeds of cession; which, having accepted of the cession, and in return the general government and the states. The ceding states relinquished a portion of disputed territory, which they could not have retained without dissolving the union, nor defended with their separate force. All the states secured the benefit of having a common fund provided, for discharging the debts and defraying the expenses of the general government; and for relieving themselves, to the extent of that fund, from "their respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure."

The United States were bound to indemnify the states for expenses previously incurred; and were obliged to purchase the Indian title, and make large preliminary expenditures, before the lands could be sold; and, if they were not entitled to the proceeds of sales, they assumed all the burdens of the compact, without deriving a single advantage from it. The states, however, evidently intended that the territory, and the revenue arising from it, should be surrendered to the United States, and common funds for paying the general charge and expenditure, or, in other words, for discharging the debts and defraying the expenses of the general government. In none of the deeds of cession is there to be found, a reservation of the United States, and common funds, to the different members of the union; or any stipulation, that it should be applied exclusively to the payment of the public debts; or the slightest intimation, that it was to be distributed among the states for any purpose whatever.

The fourth article of the constitution recognizes the territory as belonging to the United States.

Mr. Madison, in the 39th number of the Federalist, alludes to this territory "as a mine of vast wealth to the United States," and remarks, that "a very large portion of this fund has already been surrendered by the states." He then expresses the hope that the remaining states will give similar proofs of their equity and generosity, and that the whole territory will soon become "a national stock." The remaining states subsequently relinquished their claims, and the whole fund was surrendered to the union.

Judge Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court in the case of Johnson v. McIntosh, declares, that "the states ceded that territory, generally, to the United States, on conditions expressed in the deeds of cession, which demonstrate the opinion, that they ceded the soil as well as jurisdiction, and, that in doing so, they intended a productive fund to the government-out of the union."

It was granted, when the states were bound by the articles of confederation, to levy taxes for their respective proportions of "all charges of war, and all other expenses, to which the union was bound, for the general welfare." Whether those taxes were laid by congress or the states, they were to be paid by the people of the states; and it was equally important, in either case, to convert the public lands into a permanent fund for paying the debts and expenses of the union; which must otherwise have been provided for by oppressive taxes and imposts.

They were ceded by the states, and accepted by the United States, for that purpose; and it is difficult to conjecture, upon what authority they can be applied to any other use or purpose whatever.

It was, indeed, apprehended, that a dissolution of the union might revive the territorial question, and create other disputes on the same subject. The 7th number of the Federalist, it is urged as a reason for adopting the constitution, that if the union were at an end, "the states which have made cessions, on a principle of federal compromise, would be apt, when the motive of the grant had ceased, to reclaim the lands as a reversion. The other states would no doubt stand on a position, by right of prescription. Their argument would be, that a grant once made, could not be revoked; and that the justice of the concession in territory acquired or secured, by the joint efforts of the confederacy, remained undiminished. It is contrary to probability, that it should be admitted by all the states, that each had a right to a share of this common stock, there would still be a difficulty as to a proper rule of apportionment. Different principles would be set up by the different states, for the purpose, and as they would affect the opposite interests of the parties, they might not easily be susceptible of a pacific adjustment."

It is remarkable that the difficulties, anticipated, in the subject, and on a basis of the compact of the union, are likely to arise from the operation of the scheme to distribute the proceeds of the public lands. The old states contend for a share, according to representation; the new states insist upon one of the states of them are disposed to contend all the unold states within their limits. The southern states might claim an interest in proportion to their whole population; while the ceding states might expect a retrocession, on the ground, that the territory was no longer wanted for the purposes of the grant.

The land bill, passed by congress in 1833 and vetoed by general Jackson, provided for a distribution of the proceeds of the whole public domain, whether situated in the ceding or the non-ceding states of the United States, or in the coasts of Louisiana and the Floridas. It proposed "to set apart for the benefit of the new states, twelve and a half per cent. out of the aggregate proceeds, before any division look upon the states generally." The new and old states were then to receive their proportions of the residue, and to "apply the amount received, either to the purposes of education, or the colonization of free people of color, or for internal improvements, or for debts, or for other purposes authorized by the states for internal improvements."

The bill proposed to distribute among the states, for state purposes, a fund which had been surrendered to the general government for national purposes, and which was to be divided among the states for the separate use of the states, from that in which it was intended to be used for the common benefit of the union. It proposed to appropriate the public lands, purchased from France and Spain, to the support of state schools; to which objects, the revenue expended in that purchase could not have been applied. It will hardly be contended, that the general government has power over these subjects; to that congress has authority to place the public money under the control of the state legislatures, to be expended in the exercise of powers reserved to the states.

This bill, which was in violation of the constitution of the United States, and of the compact between the general government and the states, was perhaps as free from objections as any other that could be passed for a similar object. The principle of distributing the revenue of the United States, in the manner proposed, can never be established, without disturbing the constitutional relations between the general government and the states, and finally destroying the limits, which were intended to separate their functions and powers. Congress has no authority to regulate the revenues of the states to their respective constituents; and there will always be some cloak upon their extravagance, while they know, that each must provide the means of paying its own debts and expenses. But if the states are to be bound by the debts and expenses of the states to expend, every restraint will be removed, and congress, under the influence of state claims and state creditors, will become the humble instrument for laying new taxes and heavier imposts on the people, to be used for the redemption of the public lands, and for the redemption of the common defence of the United States," but to redeem stocks, issued for the use of internal improvement companies, and which would increase, in proportion to the facility of their redemption.

If the public lands had become a mine of wealth, as expected by Mr. Madison, and the revenue from that and other sources, had produced an unavailing surplus beyond the expenditures of the general government, there would be a strong incitement for amending the constitution, so as to authorize the application of it to the relief of the states. But the expenses incurred on account of the public lands, including the cost of purchase, have been greater than the receipts; and the whole revenue of the ceding states and non-ceding states, has been expended. Therefore, what ever portion of it is taken away, must be replaced by additional taxes on the people. The deficiency would be supplied by an increase of the tariff; and, as the duties on imported articles form a part of their cost, they are increased in proportion to the profits of the importers and retail till the finally paid by the consumer, is twice as much as the revenue paid into the treasury. Increased duties on wine, silk and other luxuries, would not affect the great body of the people; but the policy of protection strikes into every article of the domestic trade. The tariff system, as it is called, is best supported by taxes on the implements of trade and husbandry, on the materials for building and equipping ships, on clothing, blankets, sugar, salt and other necessities of life.

The people could derive no benefit from the distribution of any part of the public revenue, unless they were paying at the same time, from the nation, the taxes for a sum far exceeding it. But when the advocates of this scheme speak of returning money to the pockets of the people, they mean that it is to be transferred from their representatives in congress, to their representatives in the different states, that, instead of being used for the common benefit of the union, it ought to be applied to the separate use of twenty-six states. Under such a plan of distribution, the proceeds of the public lands would be at as great a distance from the people, as the proceeds of the tariff; and whether this portion of the public revenue be claimed for the people or the states, it is well for both to reflect, that while they are appealing to the advocates of state rights, they are really contending for the rights of the states. The revenue may be extended to every object that requires the expenditure of money.

The assumption of state debts would probably follow, as a consequence of the distribution of the public revenue, and would only be an application of the same principle to a different object. It has already been contended, that the general government has the power to assume the debts of the states, not because it was granted, but because it has been exercised. The proceeds of the tariff, is the act of 1790, by which congress assumed debts, in certain proportions, to the amount of twenty-one millions five hundred thousand dollars. But payment was not to be made in state credits, if the states were to be relieved of their debts, the proceeds of the tariff were issued for any other purpose than for services or supplies towards the prosecution of the war.—The holders of these certificates were considered creditors of the United States, because the debts, of the states, were assumed by the act of congress, by the states in the common struggle for independence. If an argument can be drawn from this act, to prove that the general government has the power to assume state debts contracted for canals, rail roads, or other improvements, the same power would be settled, if continued appropriations were made by congress to aid the states in the construction of such works. Constitutional objections being once removed, the only obstacle to a general assumption would be found, in the difficulty of apportioning among the states, the benefit of shifting their burdens and responsibilities upon the union. The debt of Maryland is fifteen millions, and taking that as the scale of assumption, it would be necessary to create a national debt of at least five hundred million of dollars to relieve her from her present liabilities. The government stock, issued for this purpose, would pass into the possession of the states and their creditors, and form a fund for new enterprises, and for the redemption of the public debt, in kind, which, in the course of a few years, would produce the necessity for another assumption.

The public lands have been so often made the subject of executive assumption, that it is difficult to conceive of an opinion, without appearing to concur in the sentiments of others, nor express them without examining the question at greater length than is consistent with the proper limits of a message. It is for congress however, to decide, and carefully consider every circumstance connected with the debt and finances of the state, and will adopt such measures as they may deem necessary, to preserve the public credit, and provide for every just claim on the treasury.

The revenue of the state consists of various kinds of property, issued by banks under authority of their charters, by other corporations without authority, and by private associations and individuals, under the pretext of supplying their neighbors with change. These private issues will probably cease when specie payments are resumed, but specie banks, the savings institutions, and other corporations, which have issued notes or certificates for small sums, will no doubt continue to exercise that privilege as long as it is found to be profitable. The small currency issued by these corporations, though preferable in some respects to the notes of individuals, is more injurious to the public; because it is issued in a much larger amount, and has a more permanent effect in preventing the circulation of specie. If the people prefer the use of specie for change, and for dealings of trading amount, they certainly ought to have their choice; and this they never can have, while small notes of every description are permitted to circulate through the state.

Many persons are under the impression that all the evils of a devalued currency have been produced by the measures of the general government; and that, under the administration of general Harrison, they will be removed without the aid of state legislation.

Without intending to discuss the general question of the currency, I will briefly state my reasons for believing, that too much is expected from general government's administration, and that it will not be in his power to correct the evils, of which so many complain.

The currency, which has been so much devalued, is the currency of the different states; and consists of paper of every kind, issued by state authority, or by the permission, of the state legislatures. If too much of this paper was put in circulation, it was the fault of the corporations that issued it; and if there were too many banks it was the fault of the state legislatures. It is impossible to suppose that the United States bank regulated the state banks, and prevented them from increasing in number. But it could only restrain the operations of other banks, by first receiving their notes, and then drawing upon them every week or month, until the balances due. It had no control over weak and discredited banks, because it would not take their notes; and could only regulate those, which were in high credit, and which could regulate each other, by the same process of frequent settlements. It was defective too, as a regulator, in this particular, that, when other banks discounted too freely and stood in need of restraints, it labored under the same difficulty, and required to be checked in its own movements; for the state banks were not its competitors, but its business, unless the national bank first set the example. Whenever it enlarged its discounts, they did the same; and then it was rather a situation of affairs, than a source of relief to the public. But if instead of being off, it had managed its affairs so prudently as to be always a creditor of other banks, there was nothing to prevent it from sustaining institutions, that were unsteady and injurious, and that were a source of public confidence; and nothing to prevent it from giving the banks and merchants of a commercial city, great advantages over those of rival cities.

The national bank, however, might be prudent, vigilant and impartial, and still be inefficient as a regulator, because the state banks could always escape from its control, by refusing to pay specie, or by otherwise discrediting their notes; and thus place themselves out of reach of the regulating power, at the very time they stood most in need of it.

The condition of the currency in the several states, during different periods, furnishes the proof, that its value depends on state legislation, and not on the influence of a national bank.

The United States bank went into operation in 1817, and from that period to the year 1825, its influence was not perceptible in any of the states except Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana and Illinois, as much depreciated, during the greatest portion of that period, as that of Mississippi is now; and was gradually restored to a sound state by the operation of the new laws, and by the determination of the people of those states, to rid themselves of paper money which had lost its value. The process, by which the people of Kentucky were relieved from their depreciated paper, is described in the following paragraphs, published in Niles' Register, in February, 1823.

"More good news.—Bills of the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, to an amount of seven hundred thousand dollars, were burnt at Frankfort on the 26th ultimo. A few more good fires like this, and we shall begin to expect remittances from our friends in Kentucky."

"Kentucky is going on nobly in the work of burning paper money. There was lately another great destruction of the currency by fire; 1,400,000 dollars, in notes of the Bank of Kentucky, besides the confiscation of the paper of the Bank of the Commonwealth, have been committed to the flames."

The U. States bank had then been in operation six years, without being able to equalize the exchanges between the western states and the eastern cities, or to restrain excessive banking, or to correct the evils of a depreciated currency. During that period, the notes of many of the banks in specie paying states, were at as great a discount as the currency of any western state; and throughout the whole country, it was continued to multiply in prodigious amount, as no national bank had been employed in regulating their movements.

Some of the New England banks were able to continue specie payments during the last war, and were consequently able to keep their paper counts were in proportion to their means. If the eastern states had cherished too many banks, or permitted them to run into every kind of excess, no national bank, no administration of the general government, could have prevented the depreciation of their currency.

The framers of the constitution of the U. States had no conception, that a national bank or any incidental power of the general government, could regulate the currency of the paper currency of the states, and therefore expressly prohibited them from emitting bills of credit. This restriction has been rendered nearly ineffectual by the agency of banks; and the states after giving birth to a numerous progeny of corporations, whose business it is to issue paper money, insist upon the necessity of a regulator to give their different currencies a uniform value.

The state have ample power over their own corporations, and their own paper money; and there is no necessity of making use of a fiscal agent of the general government for the management of either. If it be desirable to suppress the circulation of small notes, to prevent the increase of banks, to limit their issues, and to compel the payment of specie, the state legislatures can accomplish these objects, without the aid of a national bank.

Reports have been received from the Baltimore and Ohio rail road company, the Baltimore and Susquehanna rail road company, and the Annapolis and Washington rail road company, that bills submitted with other papers in a few days. No report has yet been received from the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company. The only information I have, in relation to these companies, is already given; and the public or is contained in their annual reports.

The Annapolis rail road is finished to its intersection with the Washington branch of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, but is now open for the convenience of passengers and passengers.

The Baltimore and Susquehanna rail road has been in constant operation since last spring, and now forms the long desired connection between the city of Baltimore and the canals and rail roads of Pennsylvania.

The Tide Water canal has also been completed within the present year, and has already been the means of bringing a large trade to the city of Baltimore. The state has no interest in this work as a stockholder, and no pecuniary connection with it, except as a creditor; but, in proportion to its extent, there is perhaps no other public work that will contribute so largely to the trade and prosperity of this nation, as the completion of this canal. It is not the less gratifying to our citizens, on account of the equal advantages which the people of Pennsylvania will derive from it, in securing, for their various products, a convenient outlet, and a choice of markets.

The affairs of the Eastern Shore rail road company have been settled, in pursuance of the act of the last session, chapter 322.

The commissioners appointed for that purpose, were seriously engaged for a considerable time, in examining accounts, ascertaining damages and adjusting claims against the company; and in disposing of the materials and effects which remained in the possession of its officers and agents. The books, of this nature, belonging to it, were deposited in the land office, as directed by the act of assembly; and the final report of the commissioners will be transmitted to you, with other papers on the same subject.

Supposing the Eastern Shore rail road to be abandoned, the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, and the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, are the only works which now remain unfinished. The rail road company will not probably require further aid from the state, for three years, and three years, and the interest on their portion of the public debt to fall on the treasury.

The canal is not only unfinished, but the company are without the means of continuing their operations. The debt, contracted for their use, is a dead weight on the state, and so it will remain till the whole line of canal is opened to Cumberland. While every one perceives the necessity of doing something, it is difficult to devise any practicable scheme for continuing the work. The state is without the means of raising money for that purpose, and it would appear to be a desperate experiment, to send a new set of bonds into the European market.

I have received two letters from the governor of Virginia, with a copy of the proceedings of the legislature of that state, in relation to the refusal of the governor of New York to receive fugitives from justice. These communications relate to a subject of deep interest to the people of Maryland and are intended to call the attention of the slaveholding states, to the necessity of the concert of action, if New York or other states should notwithstanding the constitution, in disregarding their constitutional rights. In giving to this subject the serious consideration to which it is entitled, you will, no doubt perceive the importance of the question, and the action upon it, till the decision of the supreme court shall have been given in the case of Nathan Bemis and others. It will be recollected, that this case involves nearly every question that can arise respecting the constitution of the states, and the validity of such state laws as have the effect of obstructing the exercise of those rights.—The southern states are indebted to the justice and liberality of Pennsylvania, for an opportunity of bringing these questions to a decision in the supreme court. Mr. Meredith and Mr. Nelson, who have been employed as counsel to represent this state, have informed me that the case is now ready for trial; and there is very little doubt, that it will be brought to a termination before the adjournment of the legislature.

I consider it my duty to call your attention to an ordinance of the city of Baltimore, which is odious and oppressive to a numerous and numerous class of our citizens; I mean the ordinance, passed on the 12th of last March, and entitled: "A further supplement to an ordinance to preserve the navigation of the harbor of Baltimore."

Under the provisions of this ordinance, duties are levied under the title of wharfage, on all articles "landed on the public wharves, from on board any vessels lying at said wharves, or placed thereon for the purpose of shipment or exposure for sale."—Goods, when landed on the wharves, are levied on the public wharves, or taken on board, are taxed with wharfage, "to be paid by the owner or consignee, or in the event of there being none, by the master of the vessel." If the articles are not landed on the wharves, but are landed on the wharves, or taken to another, the wharfage is half price. I have been informed that the same kind of wharfage is collected by the owners of private wharves, and that no vessel can escape from it, unless she can find room to land or take to. For the purpose of wharf belonging to the state. No one complains of the regular wharfage, which has always been charged upon every vessel, in proportion to her tonnage. The grievance is, that vessels lying at a wharf and paying wharfage, can nevertheless be taken to another wharf, and pay a duty on every thing that is landed or taken on board. The articles, carried by the boatmen of the Chesapeake bay, never have an owner when this tax is to be paid; and the whole burden of it falls on the master or owner of the vessel.

Within a few days past, my attention has been directed to the proceedings of the convention of tobacco planters, landed to the city of Washington city—an article of the resolution directing the members of the several states, engaged in the cultivation of tobacco, to call the attention of the legislatures of their several states, to the subject of the American tobacco trade with foreign countries.

Having no time to devote to a detailed report, or to consider the tendency of the measures recommended, I can only comply with the request of the convention, by calling your attention to their proceedings.

Penitentiary. The report of the directors of this institution, made to the executive, shows as follows:

Abstract of prisoners received into the penitentiary from the 1st December, 1839, to the 30th of November, 1840. Total, 1,000. For the following crimes:—stealing 61, felony 17, larceny 5, grand larceny 1, house breaking 1, receiving stolen goods 3, obtaining goods under false pretences 1, cutting down with intent to steal trees 1, passing counterfeit notes 1, passing counterfeit money 1, assaulting and stabbing 1, assault and attempt to commit rape 1, assault with intent to kill 1, assault and battery with intent to kill 1, manslaughter 1, murder in the second degree 1, murder 3, arson 1, breaking the conditions of bail 1, robbing the mail 1—Total 104.—Americans 87, foreigners 17.

Prisoners discharged, their term of service having expired 66, paroled 29, died 14, escaped 1—total 103.

Prisoners remaining on the 30th November, 1839, 328, received from the 1st December, 1839, to the 30th November, 1840, 104—total 432—discharged 103.

Prisoners remaining on the 30th Nov. 1840, 329.

Population. The following is the official statement of the number of inhabitants in each of the counties of this state, and the city of Baltimore, according to the late census, compared with that for 1830:

Total, 467,467 447,040
There are 157,926 white males, 157,615 white females; 29,114 free black males, 32,825 free black females; 45,970 male slaves, 43,749 female slaves. The total white population is 315,571, and the black 157,656. The federal population is 411,164.

The total population in 1835 was 417,040—and the increase in the last ten years has only been 20,527—out of the city of Baltimore the population of the state has decreased.

The new apportionment of members of congress is to be made under the new census. It is not supposed the ratio will be less than 60,000 federal population for each member, and if so, Maryland will only be entitled to seven members. Any increase on that ratio will reduce her representation to six.

Interesting fact. A very interesting trial is now going on in the circuit court of this district, in which Wm. B. Stokes, Lucius W. Stockton, and Daniel Moore, surviving partners of Richard C. Stockton, are plaintiffs, and Anson Kendall, late postmaster general, is the defendant. The celebrated mandamus case, with the accompanying circumstances, must be fresh in the memory of our readers, and it disclosed the cause of original dispute. Of the present trial, we find the following report in the National Intelligencer.

The action came on for trial on Monday 28th December, and has occupied the court and jury ever since. The declaration, claiming damages 100,000 dollars, contains three counts. The first sets forth, in substance, that the plaintiffs and their deceased partner were contractors, under and in the name of Richard C. Stockton, for carrying the mail, and besides performing the duties stipulated in their contracts, performed certain extra services, for which extra services the then postmaster general, (maj. Barry), in conformity with the law and usage of the department, caused credits to be entered on the books of the department, in favor of the plaintiffs, to the amount of $122,000; that the defendant was subsequently appointed postmaster general, and "wrongfully, oppressively," &c. caused the said credits, upon which payments had been made, to be suspended on the books, and recharged to the plaintiffs, so that it was unfairly, unlawfully and oppressively made to appear on the said books that the plaintiffs were indebted to the department in the said sum of $122,000, whereby they were unable to obtain large sums of money legally earned by them as contractors for other services, and were subjected to great expenses, delays, injuries and embarrassments, and were greatly injured in their credit and business, and suffered great losses in complying with their contracts with the department, &c. &c.

The second count is for omitting, neglecting and refusing, for a long space of time—viz: two years—to pay to the plaintiffs, &c. contrary to the duties and obligations of his office.

The third count sets out the act of congress of the 1st July, 1836, by which the solicitor of the treasury was authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claims of the plaintiffs for the said extra services, and directing the postmaster general to give credit for the amount which should be found by the auditor.

That the award was made for $161,568.80; whereby it became the duty of the postmaster general to give credit, &c. that he refused, &c.

The case was opened by Mr. R. C. Cox for the plaintiffs, with a clear and forcible detail of the grievance complained of, embracing a long and systematic course of alleged acts of oppression, and obstinate disregard of the requirements of law and the obligations of office, overwhelming the plaintiffs with difficulties and embarrassments, under which one of the partners (Mr. R. C. Stockton) had sunk into an untimely grave. He recapitulated the various circumstances of aggravation characterizing the case—the re-opening of matters settled by the unanimous decision of the circuit court; the sudden charging of such an immense sum; the application of moneys earned from time to time afterwards, upon other contracts, to the satisfaction of this fictitious balance; the premonitory refusal of the defendant to be governed by congress in the act of July, 1836; by the solicitor, who had been clothed with full powers, and who made his award; by the judiciary committee of the senate; by the nonimposed vote of the senate; by the unanimous decision of the circuit court in the mandamus case; and, finally, the reluctant and tardy submission to the unanimous judgment of the supreme court—unanimous as to the condemnation of the defendant's act.

Mr. Dent opened the case for the defendant, who proposed to show that the plaintiffs were contractors with the department; that no such award was made, as alleged; and that the defendant had done nothing more than his duty.

The evidence, principally documentary, has not yet been considered by the jury. The case is before the Court for the plaintiffs, Messrs. R. C. Cox, M. St. C. Claikie and J. H. Eaton. For the defendant, Gen. Jones and Mr. Dent.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Extract from the speech of Gov. Dudley, on the opening of the late session of the legislature.

As it is the part of wisdom to profit by experience, it is necessary and proper to refer to the causes of the revolution, and particularly where connected with our peculiar interests, the better to enable us to avoid the evil and emulate the good.

The Bank of the United States, which grew out of the necessities of the country, at two periods of great distress, (and which would seem almost to give credence to its existence), and which answered every purpose required of it by our business friends, or anticipated by the public, was doomed to executive hostility, because it would not yield political obedience. It was rechartered by congress, but vetoed by the president. The public money was then removed from its lawful place of deposit, in the Bank of the United States, to the local banks, by the president, under the plea that it was unsafe. This ground, taken by the president, was disproved by a report from a committee of congress.

The removal of the United States became alarmed at these indications of violence and usurpation, and declared the removal of the deposits unconstitutional. The president appealed to the people, against both the bank and the removal of the deposits. He declared that the removal of the deposits was dangerous to the liberties of the country—a monster of foreign materials; and that a better currency could be given by the local banks, without the danger; and that the removal had done him gross injustice. The removal of the deposits was an act of unconstitutional violence, and he declared that he would remove the deposits, or to resign their seats to more unscrupulous hands; and it was done. Some yielded to the service act, in defacing the journals of the senate, and others, through a mistaken notion, mistaken abstraction, abandoned their posts; which has impaired, and, if continued, will destroy the most stable and valuable part of our constitution, and, in all probability, the government itself.

The honest representation could not but feel the influence of the will of the people concentrated in the executive. His power was tremendous enough to intoxicate the brain of a less philosophical chief. The fate of the bank was decided. The deposits of the United States were retained. Nothing was to be loaned out. Banks increased rapidly, and discounted freely. The disbursements of the government increased some fifty per cent. or about twelve millions of dollars annually. Property and labor of all kinds were depressed. Commerce was suspended, and some completed, of vast magnitude; and general prosperity reigned, not only in this country but in Europe. Up to 1834, under the operation of the "bill of abatements," the payment of the public debt, mostly due to European nations, a great country with money seeking investments; a great deal of which was taken by our states, banks, rail roads, canals and manufacturing companies, and returned to this country at a rate of interest higher than had been given by the government. Whether designed or not, this command and disbursement of large amounts of money, completely, at the time, covered the consequences of the destruction of the Bank of the United States, and gave to the country a hollow and fictitious prosperity.

Notwithstanding the great increase of expenditures, some forty millions of surplus had accumulated in the vaults of the local banks. Upon a previous occasion, in 1831, when the legislature met, and after a fierce struggle in congress, an act was passed directing it to be deposited with the states; and although his views had subsequently undergone a change, he reluctantly approved the measure.

Foreign capitalists, used to us and conversant, watched the operations of our government with a vision true to their interests; and, taking alarm at the attack of the president on foreign capital, his revolutionary spirit and daring notions, and the drain of his funds, in time, to a point of safety. The banks commenced circulating, to meet the provisions of the distribution act. But it was soon discovered that it could not, with other demands, be met; and a suspension of the currency was necessary. The banks, in every branch of business took place; and credit and confidence was shaken to the centre. Money became scarce in both branches; it seemed, indeed, in Ireland, Ireland rose, and with difficult negotiations could be effected on any terms. Instead of coolly investigating the causes, and applying such relief as his elevated and powerful position might command, to save thousands from ruin and distress, he proceeded to denounce the banks as worthless and faithless—pursued them with an inveterate rancor—and turned upon them the full tide property is intended to secure to the bank. Another bill is before the senate, and has been ordered to a third reading, empowering the several boards of directors to compound and compromise with debtors, like property &c. at the discretion of the directors. The bill also provides for the appointment of bank marshals in the several counties of this state. It is the most important measure of the session, in my humble opinion; and one indispensably called for by the urgency of the times, and the condition of the banks. It will certainly pass the senate, as it has already been ordered to a third reading (a test question) by a decided majority.—I think there is no doubt of its passage also in the house, without any material alteration or amendment."

Insurrection. The Mobile Journal says, there have been sundry rumors in town for some days of an intended insurrection, in Sumpter county, which has been detected and suppressed. Other counties were mentioned as the scenes of like events, among which we name Montgomery and Clarke. The causes for apprehending a servile rising are stated to have been many, but the principal among them was the statement of a Choctaw chief, "Little Lender," as having projected a rising of the negroes and Indians against the whites, and confessing himself to have been employed as an agent. The Indians, chief and many slaves were consequently arrested, and the country put into a state of military defence. The arrest amounted to twenty or thirty. The examination of these parties occupied several days, when the Indians were discharged—no evidence appearing against them.

We copy the subjoined paragraph from one of the Alabama newspapers, being a confirmation of a report which we had seen before, but which, from its apparent improbability we at first rejected as untrue. If it be true, there was certainly very extraordinary negligence on the part of the electors, who, if perchance ignorant of the express requisitions of the constitution, ought at least, after travelling to the seat of government to give their votes, to have consulted, in the process of their journey, the copy of the instrument from which they derived their authority to vote at all. We can scarcely believe the report. We yet trust, indeed, that the report is all a mistake, rather than that the electors of the state of Alabama should have undertaken so gross an error, to vitiate their votes by their own giving them.

[Not. Ind.]

Electional vote of Alabama. It seems that, by informality in conducting the proceedings in the electoral college of that state, the vote of the president and vice president will be lost. The constitution of the United States provides that the mode of voting in the electoral colleges for president and vice president shall be by ballot. It is further provided that the electors shall be voted for by distinct ballots—and that these facts shall appear on the face of the certificate of election. According to the order of proceeding in the electoral college of that state, as given in our last paper, from the Tusculum Monitor, the electors did not vote by ballot, and distinctly for each officer, but by visa voce—each elector rising when his name was called and responding—"Martin Van Buren, of New York, for president of the United States, and Richard M. Johnson, of Virginia, for vice president." Of course this departure from the plan expressly laid down in the constitution of the United States will be effectually nullify and abrogate the vote of the state, when the certificates come to be opened and the ballots counted in Washington, would the adoption of the visa voce system by an individual in our state elections destroy his vote. It was a strange oversight or culpable ignorance in the electors to conduct the proceedings as they did, but, under the circumstances of the great difference between the votes for general Harrison and Mr. Van Buren, one which will be attended by no worse consequences than the loss of Alabama's seven votes to Mr. Van Buren and his party in this state. Had the two candidates, however, been either equal, or the difference of the consequences might have been no less than the success of a man as president, without a majority of suffrages.

Small notes. We learn that the resolution repealing the act which prohibits the Ohio banks from issuing small notes, has passed both branches of the legislature of that state, and only requires the signature of the governor to become a law.

INDIANA.

Governor Wallace's message. We are indebted to an intelligent correspondent for the following notice of the message of the governor to the legislature of the state of Indiana. [Not. Ind.]

I have been favored with a copy of the message of governor Wallace to the present general assembly of Indiana. I have carefully perused it, and with the utmost satisfaction. It touches with singular ability the various subjects worthy of legislative action. His recommendations evince a thorough knowledge of the peculiar condition of that young and growing state, and are marked with a provident and comprehensive forecast. It is well known that the state of Indiana has been the theatre of some of our country has arrested the prosecution of those schemes of internal improvement in almost every portion of the union which, a few years since, were commenced under such flattering auspices. Governor Wallace recommends that a few of the leading works, which have been partially prosecuted, be completed, and his views will commend themselves to the judgment of every unprejudiced reader. He recommends a reduction of the number of senators and representatives in the general assembly. He thinks it will materially lessen the public burdens, while a diminished number will discharge all the duties of a deliberative assembly with equal efficiency. I was gratified with the wisdom and reasonableness of the suggestions.

"Restricting our observations to the narrower sphere of our own state, we find, even through the surrounding gloom which has gathered over the pecuniary condition of our citizens, enough to claim for us and to recommend to us in the general assembly. We have received from the Divine hand the choicest tokens of its favor. The teeming earth has rewarded the tiller of its soil. No desolating pestilence has invaded our limits, and filled our fields with lamentation and woe. The reviving spirit of enterprise has awakened in its laborers, and cheerful industry has resumed its gainful pursuits. The means of education, moral improvement, and religious culture have been extended to every class, and their auspicious effects are seen even in the general diffusion of intelligence as in the elevated character of the people. The sovereignty of the laws has been respected; a jealous observance of the pure peace has eminently distinguished the conduct of our citizens. No feuds, no quarrels, no closed one of the most heated and exciting contests recorded in our history, yet they in no instance, as far as my knowledge extends, have permitted riot or bloodshed to disgrace, or intemperance to degrade any of their frequent and numerous assemblies."

Governor Wallace recommends to the legislature the propriety of adopting resolutions instructing the members of congress representing the representatives in congress from that state to use their exertions to procure the passage of a bill distributing the proceeds of the public lands among the several states. His views are worthy of consideration. He remarks as follows:

"With a view to relieve the people from the oppressive taxation which we see otherwise awaits them, I, on a former occasion, urged the propriety of claiming our distributive share of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands. The singular course pursued by some of the distinguished leaders of the present administration in congress renders it more imperative than ever upon the states to contend for the strict letter of their right. I speak at least for the states which have not been able to do so, directly or indirectly, intimated an intention of asking the general government to assume the payment of her debts, nor, to my knowledge, have any of the states; yet, we have witnessed a most disreputable effort, in a certain quarter, to discredit the good faith and resources of the states, upon the gratuitous assumption that there was an intended movement on their part to accomplish that purpose through the agency of the national legislature. By the deeds of cession and the subsequent sale of the lands, the proceeds of the sale were designed as a compensation for the use and benefit of all the states then admitted, or that might afterwards be admitted, into the union. The general government was created a trustee, with power and duty clearly defined. Its authority over the national domain evidently consists in faithfully carrying into effect the beneficent object of the ceding states, and its obligation to do so is solemn and imposing. From 1822 to September the 30th, 1838, the federal government has received from the public lands amounted to $62,443,308, and the same since made have largely increased it. Have we not, therefore, a right to demand of this trustee our share of the fund, and especially of that portion of it which has accrued from the sale of the public land? According to the distributive principle of the act of Clay's land bill, Indiana would be entitled to about $3,000,000. The fate of that bill is known to the nation and is a subject of poignant regret. Congress having, by appropriate legislation, given utterance to the public will, in the only form in which it could be authoritatively expressed, that will was countenanced and defeated by the arbitrary and unprecedented action of the executive branch of the government. The aggravated injustice of that act of the late president is equalled only by the presumptuous insolence of friends of the president's executive in congress, in impeaching the honor of the sovereign states which form our glorious union, and denouncing them as bankrupt in fortune and in fame. We are cheered, however, by the auspicious prospect of the future. We trust that the constitutional limitations of the government will be respected, whilst its powers are exercised wisely for the good of the whole people, and that the public will, the only legitimate foundation of republican institutions, will be obeyed by the public servant. I beg to suggest to you the propriety of instructing our senators and requesting our representatives in congress to demand, as a matter of right on the part of Indiana, her distributive share of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. With this request, your disposal, you can exempt the people in a measure from taxation, promote the cause of education, prosecute our system of internal improvement, and greatly increase the wealth and prosperity of the state."

The governor makes the following pointed observations in relation to the legislation of congress over the District of Columbia:

"It affords me pleasure to comply with the request of the citizens of the city and county of Washington and the county of the city of Washington, by presenting to you a copy of the address of their delegates in convention assembled, to the people of the United States and to their several legislatures. No adequate motive can be assigned for the extraordinary legislation which forms the ground of complaint, other than the fixed determination of the majority in congress to punish the frank and unreserved expression of opinion on the part of the people of the District. This inoffensive breach of justice and good faith, pertaining to the sacred guardianship of the nation's honor and the people's constitution, should create a sensation reaching to the remotest limits of our wide spread country. It is in keeping with the conduct of those who disfranchised a sovereign people, and who, in the exercise of their right of the people to select their representatives, with a view of carrying into effect the repudiated policy of their chief. With such, right and might are anonymous terms. The withdrawal of the charter of the city of Washington, and the carrying out the policy of government in reference to the currency. So wide is the variation, however, between the profession and the practice of the men who laid their ruthless hands upon those institutions, that it is in vain to expect the wisdom of the measures that led to the destruction of the fiscal agencies deemed necessary in the District for the protection of commerce and industry. The change in its municipal character, relative to the elective franchise, in defiance of the wishes of the inhabitants, was an indefensible exercise of power."

"It is of incalculable importance to every community that the safeguards and peculiar institutions which it deems necessary to the efficient preservation of the peace, good order and safety of society should be maintained. The District of Columbia, being no representative, congress should exert a protecting care over her interests, and faithfully reflect her views in relation to her own domestic polity. An enlightened nation will not silently acquiesce in the usurpation of rights of the people, or the encroachment upon the District, and to lamper with her most precious interests, against the known and expressed will of her people. Referring you to the masterly and eloquent address for detailed information, I premise that we have to do with a government, and such resolutions as the scene of justice and the promptings of sympathy may suggest."

ILLINOIS.

Capitol. The house of representatives of Illinois has passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to inquire into the expediency of repealing all laws providing for the removal of the seat of government from Vandalia to Springfield, and to provide for the removal of the seat of government back to Vandalia until the state debt is paid; and that their report be made to the next session of the legislature. A writer from Springfield remarks: The object of it is to cut off all further appropriations to complete the state house until the state debt is paid, which cannot possibly be done for the next forty years, and to force the removal of the seat of government to a place of that length of time and upward; and yet it is this economical representative from Bond can succeed in his plan, the state house, upon which over 200,000 has been expended, would remain unfinished, and suffered to go to ruin, as another avowal of the instability, folly and uncertainty of Illinois legislation.

We published yesterday a letter from Springfield, Illinois, giving an account of the rejection by the legislature of the bill to provide for the payment of the interest on the state debt. The Louisville Journal received yesterday, says:

"We now learn from a gentleman direct from Springfield, that afterwards, on Monday the 14th, a resolution passed the house, and subsequently the senate, providing for the hypothecation, in the Year of bonds to the amount of $200,000 for the payment of the interest due in January. The fund commissioner was to proceed forthwith to New York to arrange the matter. The difficulties in the way of general arrangement for meeting the state liabilities are, that the loco focus desire to exclude from such arrangement all bonds, even in the hands of innocent holders, where the consideration for them has not actually been received by the state; and that they are not willing to place the resources of the state to meet the interest of the bonds issued and to be issued."

MISCELL.

The St. Louis Evening Gazette gives the annexed abstract of the message of governor Boggs, submitted to the legislature of that state at the opening of its present session.

It will be seen that the governor sets his face against most of the projected improvements. The Missouri rail road, making slack water in the Marano; making a canal from the Marano; slack the water in Salt river; would all do some good, but they cost too much money. The Osage river and Grand river however are exceptions; and so the friends of internal improvement, rather than get too broad, must content themselves with half a loaf.

This state it will be seen is not much in debt, and has got a surplus in the treasury.

The currency bill of the last legislature is abandoned by governor Boggs, who thinks it right enough to let the people swap big dogs for puppies, in their private transactions, and not to be troubling a man with legislative pains and penalties, because he is willing to take a dog for a pig, or leaves for smoked ham, both parties having their eyes open.

He says that since the settlement of difficulties and agreement upon a "truce" between the council of war and the county court of Clark county (which however he did not approve, there has been no disturbance on that frontier. He urges that Missouri should insist upon the boundary she has been contending for and go before congress with a memorial to that effect.

The state university will next year be opened for pupils.

The superintendent of schools may be expected to report. Meanwhile the governor recommends that the proceeds arising from the sales of 16th section be deposited in the state bank for the benefit of the several townships interested. The governor thinks that the money will be safer there than in the several counties and we agree with him. The whole amount of this fund is supposed to exceed $300,000.

The anti-Mormon forces have received in payment for their services only a hundred thousand dollars or one-half as much as anticipated. This was owing to the fact that the money could not be borrowed.

The state has got a bad name, says the governor, by reason of the Mormon difficulty; and the governor wishes the evidence in the case published, as it is to retrieve her reputation. For our part, we think gov. Boggs, by his indirect management of that affair, has contributed to the very evil of which he complains. But we doubt not the world at large can discriminate between a gang of marauders and the good people of this state.

FLORIDA.

Late Indian news. The steamer St. Matthews, capt. Van Vleeten, arrived at St. Marks on Friday last, after a short voyage from Tampa Bay.

Captain Van Vleeten brings letters of a recent date from the U. S. officers in that neighborhood, which together with the verbal information brought, are of a very gratifying character. It is the prevailing impression of all at Tampa Bay, that the Indians are anxious for peace; and although they are crafty and treacherous themselves, and suspicious of craft and treachery from others, yet that they are heartily tired of the war, and that means will be used to produce an arrangement satisfactory to them and the whites. We hope it may turn out.

Tiger Tail, with his warriors, was still at Fort No. 4, and lively hopes were entertained by officers and men, that our Indian difficulties might soon be closed.

[Tallahassee Star, Dec. 22.]

We learn from Jacksonville that several families have been murdered in Columbia county, within a few days, and great consternation exists among the inhabitants.

Orange crop. The St. Augustine Herald contradicts the report that the orange crop of Florida would yield an increase of $200,000, that year over last; and adds, the largest crop yet known here was two millions of oranges, which at 75 cents per hundred would amount to $15,000. In 1835, all the trees were destroyed, and the young trees have produced some-where upwards 100,000 oranges, worth about $1,000—that's all.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—2d SESSION. SENATE.

December 30. The bill to establish a board of commissioners to examine and decide upon claims against the United States was taken up; and, having been read a third time, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. Calhoun rose, and assailed the measure as one of the most pernicious character. He had, however, often expressed his views on the subject; and now only desired to record his vote against the principles of the bill. He asked for the yeas and nays. Mr. Mangum rose in earnest desire to give a more careful examination to the measure. It went to change the fundamental policy of the government regarding claims against the United States; and he hoped the senate would consent to let the bill lie on the table for a short time, that the members who have recently taken their seats might have an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. Hubbard expressed his assent to the proposition; but urged the necessity of early and favorable action on the bill. If it should be passed or it had been reported, it would greatly relieve the business of congress.

Mr. Henderson objected to the bill on the general grounds of its conferring too large a discretion upon the board, and as not being well calculated to affect any benefit to the claimants.

Mr. Linn made an earnest and animated appeal to the senate, in favor of the measure. He was surprised that the senator from South Carolina, in opposition to it, did not present some substitute; for certainly the system now pursued by congress in reference to these claims was as bad as possible.

Mr. Calhoun said that the land bill he had introduced, would be a substitute, in some respects; for it would take away from the largest class of claimants and hand them over to the states. He then spoke strongly against the bill, as bestowing far too much discretion and power on the commissioners.

Mr. Hubbard said he had heard the arguments of the senator from South Carolina; and ever again every session since the bill was first introduced; and yet the bill had been passed three times by the senate.

Mr. Sevier, of Arkansas, assailed the bill with great vehemence. He regarded it, as in fact, a sweeping away department of the government; and if it should pass, congress might as well be abolished. It would be only a useless body, not worth keeping up.

After some further conversation, in which Mr. Huntington expressed his concurrence in the general wish for time to consider the character of the bill, it was ordered to lie on the table for the present.

Mr. Crittenden, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill establishing a uniform bankrupt system throughout the United States.

Mr. Crittenden took occasion to say that in all important features, it was an exact copy of the bill which passed the senate of the last session. There were some slight alterations; but there were no material, and did not affect the principle of the measure.

On motion it was made the special order for Thursday next.

The bill to authorize the secretary of the treasury to procure steam vessels for the revenue service was finally passed, and sent to the house for concurrence. The acote then adjourned.

December 31. The vice president laid before the senate a letter from the war department, covering the report of the chief engineer in the ordnance department, showing the most eligible situation for fortifications on Lake Champlain, near Lower Canada.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

Mr. Charles B. Rogers, of the president of the Norristown and Valley Forge rail road company, asking for an extension of the bonds given for payment of duties on rail road iron.

By Mr. Ruggles, two memorials, each signed by forty odd individuals, citizens of Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the fishing bounty.

Mr. Fiske asked permission to employ a clerk to the committee on pensions on the ground of the onerous duties imposed, and the necessity that existed for frequent conference with the departments. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Norwell, from the committee on commerce reported with amendments, the bill authorizing the erection of light houses and light boats, and the establishment of certain boya and beacon lights.

Mr. Merrick, from the committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill authorizing the issuing of letter-testamentary and of administration to heirs in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Nicholas, on leave introduced a bill to authorize experiments to be made of the application of steam power for harbor defense.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. Tallmadge, was taken up and adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury report to the senate a list of the drafts drawn by the treasury department, or by its order, between the 29th of February, 1830, and the 4th of July last, and also since the 4th day of July last, that have been protested for non-payment, or that have been presented for payment and not paid, or protested for non-payment, or that have been exhibited, in a regular form, the date of such drafts, the names of the payees, the names and office of the drawers, and the place where payable, the time when payable, the amount, the time when presented, and the time when protested.

The bill to create an additional land office in the state of Michigan, and for other purposes, was taken up; and, after being read a second time, Mr. Norwell, and opposed by Mr. Porter, the question on engrossment was taken, by yeas and nays, when there appeared for it 16, against it 22.

Mr. Merrick moved to take up the bill to revive and continue the existence of the banks of the District of Columbia, with a view to make it the special order for Monday next.

Mr. Benton said there were a great many other orders set for that day.

Mr. Tappan did not see the necessity of any hurry on the subject; it mattered little whether the banks were chartered or not this session, as they still continued to do business as usual, as well without their charters as with them.

Mr. Merrick said he would not contradict the assertion of the senator from Ohio, that he supposed that his information was very different. The banks could do no business—they could not receive a dollar on deposit, save from a member of congress.

Mr. Tappan asked if the senator had not read in the newspapers of the day their advertisements?

Mr. Merrick said those advertisements related to matters incident to the privileges granted by the act of the last session. Was a matter of great moment to the people of this District that this matter should be speedily disposed of. Ever since the 4th of July last, the inhabitants of this District have been deprived, by an act of congress, of those privileges that were extended to the citizens of the circumjacent states. Why was this? Why should they not be placed on the same footing as the inhabitants of Maryland and Virginia? He hoped that justice at least would be extended. The object he had in naming Tappan for discussion was with a view to obtain an extension of the bill, and to secure compliance with the anxious wishes of the citizens.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, suggested that it would be better to fix the day for Thursday next; which Mr. M. having acceded to, that day was fixed for the discussion.

The bill to confirm to the state of Indiana the lands selected by her for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal which lies between the mouth of the Tippecanoe river and Terre Haute, was taken up as in the order of the day, and, after a debate by Mr. Tappan against the bill, and Mr. S. of Indiana, in support of the claim of that state, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by a large majority.

On motion of Mr. Buckman, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after spending some time therein,

The senate adjourned till Monday next.

January 4. The senate, to day, was occupied chiefly with the consideration of the bill introduced by Mr. Tappan, on the following title:

"A bill to establish a permanent pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands who should inhabit and cultivate the same, and raise a log cabin thereon."

Mr. Charles B. Rogers, of the president of the Norristown and Valley Forge rail road company, asking for an extension of the bonds given for payment of duties on rail road iron.

Mr. Penitas, of Vermont, opposed the measure in a clear and forcible speech.

Mr. Mangum called upon the authors and leading supporters of the measure to give a more explicit exposition of its character, and of the meaning of its provisions than they had yet vouchsafed. He then proceeded to express his decided hostility to the whole system which they wished to establish. He thought it unfair and unjust, and calculated to operate for the benefit exclusively of the border population, and against the interests of the old states.

At the suggestion of Mr. Mangum, the phraseology of the bill was modified so as to limit the benefits of the bill to free white persons. He also moved to amend the bill so as to limit its benefits to citizens of the United States.

Mr. Calhoun asked what were the regulations of the new states themselves, as to aliens holding land; and intimated that he would, by his vote, conform to their practice.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said that, so far as he knew, aliens were permitted to hold land in all the new states, and no inconvenience had resulted from the practice.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, suggested the propriety of postponing the further discussion of the bill for the present: so as to allow time for more deliberate consideration. He stated his impression to be, though he did not speak from certain knowledge, that the laws of Indiana do not allow aliens to hold land.

Mr. Buchanan avowed his readiness to meet the proposition of Mr. Mangum with a decided negative. The question, he said, had been raised in 1838, and after discussion, was decided against imposing any such limitation, so as to exclude foreigners.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, spoke with great animation and earnestness, in favor of the proposition to limit the peculiar and extraordinary privilege conferred by the bill to citizens of the United States. He also avowed his readiness to cast his vote now as he did in 1838.

After a few remarks from Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Benton, and Mr. Clay, of Alabama, the question was put and decided in the negative; and it, accordingly, so the amendment proposed by Mr. Mangum was rejected. The bill was then laid over till tomorrow.

Numerous petitions and memorials asking for the passage of a law establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, were presented to-day.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, called up the bill introduced by him providing for the reduction and graduation of the price of the public lands.

But it was passed over at the suggestion of Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, who said, before discussion should be begun, he wished the information which he had called for by resolution, relating to the public lands, to be before the senate.

Mr. Smith from the committee on the judiciary made an unfavorable report on the memorial from the territory of Iowa, asking for a certain change in its fundamental laws.

The bill to confirm to the state of Indiana the land secured by her, for that portion of the Wabash and Erie canal which lies between the mouth of Terre Haute and Tippecanoe river, and for other purposes, was passed, and sent to the house for concurrence.

Numerous petitions and memorials were presented and appropriately referred. The senate adjourned.

January 5. The vice president submitted a communication from the governor of the state of Missouri, transmitting a copy of a law of that state for the settlement of the boundary between Missouri and Iowa.

On motion of Mr. Benton, the bill was ordered to be printed, and referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Also, a communication from the treasurer of the United States with a statement of the contingent expenses of the post office department; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also, a communication from the navy department, transmitting sixty copies of the Navy Register for 1840; which was laid on the table.

A number of petitions were presented.

Mr. Urbahn, in pursuance of previous notice, called and obtained leave to introduce a bill to cause monuments to be erected to the memory of brigadier general Francis Pickens and brigadier general William Davidson; which was read twice and referred to the committee on revolutionary claims.

Mr. Norrell submitted the following resolution, which was considered and agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of war communicate to the senate such additional reports as have been received since those formerly submitted, in reference to the construction of the Potomac aqueduct; and also, such further information as he may have in reference to the leasing of the timber for the use of said aqueduct.

Mr. Porter submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be requested to inform the senate in what cases the payment of undisputed claims, arising under the treaty between the United States and the Stockbridge and Munsee Indian tribes on the 16th May, 1840, has, on payment at the treasury, been suspended or delayed, and the cause or causes of such suspension or delay, and particularly such cases as have caused delay, in respect to two claims, of $675 each, in favor of Mead, Kellogg & Co. of Detroit, Michigan, assignees in part of Robert Konkopack and John T. Hendricks.

Several private bills were then read a third time and passed.

The bill making compensation to the state of New Hampshire for the services of her militia, coming up on its third reading—was announced, discussion arose, to which Messrs. Parce, Crittenden and Hubbard participated.

Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, would like to have some further opportunity to examine this case. There is a peculiar question suggested by the bill, which heaves to his mind: whether there had been an actual invasion of this territory by a foreign power; was one; and if not, was there a threatened invasion, or imminent danger of an invasion? And two questions of general interest suggested themselves: whether there had been an actual invasion, was there time to apply to the general government to repel this threatened invasion? to the general government belonged the decision whether there should be peace or war.

It was proper to ascertain all these facts; had there been a military invasion? had there been a threatened invasion? and if so, what had New Hampshire done under the circumstances? Would it not be extending to the state authorities the power of the general government, if there was time to communicate with the general government, if, without the concurrence of the general government, they undertook to engage in a conflict with another power? All these matters were worthy of inquiry.

And therefore, he would suggest the propriety of laying the bill for the present on the table. Mr. Hubbard, in the meantime, would refer senators for information to a report made by Mr. Howard, chairman of the committee on foreign relations, in the house in January, 1839.

Mr. Clay said he would take an opportunity to examine it. The bill was then laid on the table.

The bill making compensation to the state of Maine for the services of her militia, was read a third time and passed.

The bill to establish a permanent prospective pre-emption system in favor of settlers on the public lands who shall locate and cultivate the same, was taken up in committee of the whole, and occupied the remainder of this day's session.

The senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Friday, Jan. 30. After calling the roll of the journal, Mr. Adams asked leave to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the investment in the stocks of the several states of the united states, of funds held by the government of the United States, in trust, in or for the use of the sums so invested, and of the interest thereon, an assumption by the United States of the debts of the said several states, to the extent of their failure punctually to pay the same.

Resolved, That the purchase, by authority of any executive department of the United States, of the bonds of any of the states of this union, at the nominal value, or with a premium thereon, and the subsequent sale of the said bonds at a discount, is an unwarrantable and unauthorized use of the public funds.

Resolved, That it is the duty of the executive government of the United States to require of the government of each and every state of this union, (on whose stocks, bonds, or other securities the public funds are invested by the government of the United States) that they be made, punctual payment in specie or its equivalent, of the interest and stipulated in said stocks, and repayment of the principal as soon as possible by the terms of the contracts, upon which such stocks have severally been issued.

Resolved, That the further investment of any public funds of the United States in stocks of the several states ought forthwith to be prohibited by law, and that the committee of ways and means be instructed to report on this subject.

Mr. Adams moved a suspension of the rules of the house for the purpose of considering the resolution.

Mr. Care Johnson objecting, the resolutions were laid over, under the ruins of the house, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Sumner asked leave to offer a resolution requiring the secretary of war to report to the house the state of our affairs in relation to the Choctaw Indians, &c. &c.

Mr. Goldings moved to suspend the rule of the house for the consideration of this resolution; which motion failed, and the resolution was laid on the table.

The motion before the house, being to reconsider the vote on the appropriation bill and its amendments—Mr. Shepherd spoke at some length in support of the amendment as passed, and vindicating his conduct, as a member of the committee on naval affairs, in offering it.

The gentleman from Massachusetts had taken it on himself to say that there was something unfair in the amendment he had moved—something of a trick. He asked the speaker if it was in order—He did not seize a sly opportunity to thrust it on the house and he hid on this occasion behind the speaker's decision. The gentleman thinks otherwise—he did not doubt his skill in parliamentary rules, nor the dignified manner in which he urged them on the house.

He would briefly state some reasons in favor of his amendment. This was the first time (continued Mr. S.) in which we had been called on to appropriate money for this navy pension fund. It was a new bill—not an ordinary appropriation bill to carry into effect a particular law. The passage of the act of the house previously, at least, therefore, it was strictly in order to consider all the acts relative to that fund. He agreed with the speaker on this point of order.

But if it was out of order, it was too late to make any objections on this point. If the gentleman did make his objection day before yesterday, it was a poor argument now for the reconsideration of the vote.

Another objection to this act was, that it was too hasty. Who makes this objection? Why, a gentleman from Massachusetts, and another from a third. Do they want time to consider this act? If a young member had told them he wanted time to consider it, it might be proper; but his surprise was that old members should tell them so. The subject had been before the house previously, at least, and it was to be supposed that they had examined it. He had been told by a distinguished officer this morning, that the amendment was proper. But what was the act of '37? That was a deliberate consideration of the act. If he understood it, he sneaked through at the last day of the session. He had looked for the yeas and nays on that vote, but had not been able to find them. The gentleman from Massachusetts, furthermore said, yesterday, that the second section of the bill was inconsistent with the first. That the first section ordered the secretary to pay certain sums of money, and the second section repeats the law under which the payment was required.

Why does not the honorable gentleman (continued Mr. S.) see that there were several laws requiring the payment of this money—the law of 1800; and this money is needed for previous laws; so the gentleman's opposition on that score is obviated.—The gentleman also said that he had mistaken the act of '37. What was that? That the law of the pension laws, there was one general plan: That those who should receive pensions who had suffered in the cause of the country; and also that the second section referred to the time in which pension disbursements were to be made to the pensioners. He found in the National Intelligencer, this morning, a report of his remarks, which stated precisely what he did say? This report of his remarks would show that he was right, and the honorable gentleman wrong. It was a common practice (he said) to take up false issues. He hoped the day would not be spent in this measure. What is the question before us? Whether the act of '37 is right or wrong? Whether we are called on to repeal it or not? It is not given his opinion in a few words. In 1800 the navy was in its infancy.

The act of 1800 was to encourage the navy—to induce persons to enter into it, and it was necessary at that time. The object of congress was to hold out inducements to recruits to enter into it. He showed that it was for the support of the navy.—What is the navy pension fund? The proceeds of prizes were laid aside to be given to seamen, marines, &c. who had been disabled in the service of the country. The act of '37, which was the act actually to the act of 1800 many acts passed. That the pension fund should go to those who had suffered in the service of their country, was the feature of all the acts prior to '37. If any officer, seaman or marine, died, leaving a widow, or children, they should receive half-pay from the time of their death. This is not different from that those who had been disabled or fought gallantly—but those who died they might have been drunkards, or cowards—but if they died, their children were entitled to this very pension fund. It was not carrying out the act of 1830. It was a violation of the pledged faith of the country—and the congress that passed that act acted in violation of their faith. This act did rank injustice to the gallant soldier; and this is the act about which you have heard such lamentations before this house.

In six months of the very first year of its passage it had taken from the navy fund upward of $29,000 dollars. Can any man wonder that the fund is gone? As to the purchase and sale of stocks, on which the gentleman had commented with so much severity, what better could have been done? (asked Mr. S.) We had more money than we wanted at that time, the stocks of the states were on a par. If we had not purchased, there would have been a hue and cry about discrediting the states. He admitted that some money had been lost, but the secretary or nobody else was to blame.

The effect of his bill would be to east off this drain from the fund, which, for the last four years, had amounted to $200,000 annually. The true rule on this subject was laid down in the law of 1840, that those who have suffered in the country should be remunerated for it. The act of 1840 made a distinction between the brave and cowardly—the act of 1840 had destroyed the distinction.

He noted another objection. That the widows had made their calculations on receiving this fund—that on this, the children had been sent to school, &c. But this was no argument that they should continue to receive the $48,000, which they had received annually for four years. He was not mistaken, Mr. Adams, yesterday, used the word discommodious, in connection with this matter. He understood it was applied to the house, but a friend had suggested that it was applied to him, (Mr. S.) Mr. Adams said he had said no such thing—that the gentleman himself did not understand it thus, but it was on the subject of the pension.

Mr. Shepard was very far from wishing to do injustice to the gentleman. The honorable gentleman had done him injustice—all he would say was, that he wished that the honorable gentleman would be more charitable. That no one in the house could do more good than could Mr. Adams; if in case of excitement, he would seize the opportunity of coming up as a mediator—as a link between Washington and the present generation.

Mr. Thomas wished to give a little information on this subject. He had a letter in his hand from the navy department, saying that the Cincinnati stock had been sold, (he was inquired of how they had sold). The secretary did not say whether at par or not.

Mr. Anderson had been informed that they sold for $62 per $100 of stock.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, spoke at some length, in opposition to the act of '37. His appropriations were unjust. He was opposed to the reconsideration of the bill.

Mr. Anderson inquired whether the bill the gentleman from Massachusetts designed to offer, was the bill approved by the committee.

Mr. Reed answered that it was, with the exception of the last section.

Mr. Anderson said that if the act of '37 was repealed, it would revive the act of '34, and that was of the same nature. He hoped that the house would take the first opportunity to look into this bill, which has been reported by the committee on naval affairs. He hoped the amendment would not be reconsidered.

Mr. Monroe was decidedly in favor of the repeal of the law of '37; yet he had voted against the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, because it was not proper nor sound legislation to amend an appropriation bill by repealing a law of the same moment of the money. He was in favor of paying what is now due to pensioners; and that we should bring up a law properly digested and pass on it as we ought. He hoped that they would reconsider this bill and pass the appropriation bill, and act on the necessary bill, which might be reported by the committee.

Mr. Everett dwelt at some length on the subject, which was imperfectly heard, and which we are not able to give.

Mr. Reed had been reported somewhat erroneously as to his debate on the subject. He did not mean to denounce with so much severity the act of '37. But it was indiscreet and unwise. He opposed paying pensions according to the act of 1837.—He spoke of his constituents—they had done more fighting the battles of the country than any other, and they had never come here to ask for pensions. He hoped the house would reconsider this bill, leaving out the amendments, and take up the bill brought forward by him and adopt it.

Mr. Naylor was in favor of bringing the discussion to an end. He thought the vote respecting the law of '37 hearty and timely.

That all laws when originated were imperfect, and it was by the amendment of experience that the most perfect laws were formed.

That, part of the law of '37 was defective, and ought to be repealed, leaving that which was sound. He hoped that the motion would be reconsidered—that the appropriation bill would be passed, and that some bill would be brought forward obviating the defects of the law of '37.

Mr. Johnson moved the previous question.

Mr. Tursey moved that the house adjourn, which was carried; and the house adjourned.

Thursday, Dec. 31. The speaker laid before the house the following communications:

1. From the president of the United States, transmitting a report from the secretary of state, in compliance with a resolution of the house of the 23d inst. calling upon him to communicate, "if compatible with the public interest, copies of all the correspondence of the United States with the government of Great Britain, relative to any proceeding on the part of that government which may have a tendency to interrupt our commerce with China."

2. From the secretary of state, in compliance with the provision of the act of March, 1799, communicating "an abstract of all the returns made to that department by the collectors of the customs, pursuant to the act of the 28th of May, 1778, for the relief and protection of American seamen, showing, so far as said returns have been received, the number of seamen registered in each port of entry in the United States, during the year commencing on the 1st of October of the last, and ending on the 30th of September of the present year."

3. From the treasury department, in reply to the resolution of the house of the 17th inst. respecting the condition of the custom house buildings at Philadelphia.

4. From the president of the United States, transmitting a report from the secretary of state with accompanying papers, in answer to a resolution of the house, calling for information relative to the burning of the steamboat Caroline. [For which see page 287.]

The above communications were severally referred and ordered to be printed.

Also, the following letter from John C. Rives, on the subject of the printing:

Washington, Dec. 30, 1840.

Sir: It is known to you, and to the other members of the house of representatives, that Francis P. Blair and myself were elected printers to the house in January last. Under this election, I fear, has been the printing for the house during the twenty-sixth congress, would be sent to us to execute; and as I superintend that branch of our business, I engaged men, and provided materials sufficient to do with at least the customary despatch. I was informed yesterday that the clerk of the house had sent a very large report to the stationer of the house to be printed by him, and that the stationer was actually printing it, or having it printed. At all other times when there has been no failure to the clerk's account of the expenditure of the contingent fund for the last year, where I find that he has paid other persons for printing which I think should have been executed by the printers to the house.

The persons engaged by me to work on congressional documents exclusively, have not had more than three or four days constant employment since the commencement of this session. There has been some work for them every day, but not enough to employ them the whole day. They are engaged by the week, and we have to pay them, whether they work or not. Now, if the clerk of the house has the power to have the congress printing executed at all other times when there has been no failure at our office in executing it promptly, I desire to know it as soon as possible, so that I may either reduce our force, or make some arrangement with the clerk to get enough of it to keep our hands employed.—The persons paid to us by the house of representatives are so low, that we must sink money, unless we can keep the hands which we have engaged to do the printing, constantly employed; and upon some kind of printing we sink money, even when the hands are employed upon congressional documents.

The clerk of the house and myself have had a controversy about the binding of the documents, which I wish to bring before the house.

Soon after the adjournment of congress, in July last, the clerk sent word to me to deliver the documents which we had printed for the house, to S. D. Langtree, to bind. I refused to do it. It has been the invariable custom, ever since, to become acquainted with the manner of executing the congressional printing, which is now thirteen years, for the printer to bind all the documents that he prints for congress. Whenever a printer has been elected, during that time, he has been immediately fitted up by a binder, as he has a printing office. He had purchased great quantities of the materials for the binding, and had engaged workmen to do it, and had folded a great quantity of the work, before the clerk sent me word that he wished the documents handed over to Mr. Langtree to be bound. The correspondence between the clerk and myself, which I presume he has on file, will fully explain our controversy about the binding. I wish congress to decide between us as soon as possible, as it is necessary that the binding should be forwarded. Respectfully,

JOHN C. RIVES.

Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, speaker house reps.

Mr. Adams said he would take that occasion to inquire whether a report of the committee on the printing of the house had been made at the last session; and if so, whether it had been printed.

Mr. Davis, of Indiana, said there were two reports on that subject, which had been laid before the house, but no order to be printed.

Mr. Adams said he had never been able to get a sight of the reports, although very anxious so to do. Neither himself nor other members could procure copies of them, which he desired to be printed at the last session, being more than five years ago. This letter, however, from Messrs. Blair & Rives, explained it, and it appeared that the delay was owing to this controversy between them and the clerk of the house.

Mr. Lewis Williams moved to refer the letter to the committee on accounts; but the motion was subsequently withdrawn.

Mr. J. W. Davis moved the following:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, and that the letter of J. C. Rives, just read, be referred to that committee.

Mr. Morgan offered an amendment instructing the committee to inquire as to whether the clerk was interested in the contract with Langtree & O'Sullivan for furnishing stationery to this house. Mr. Reed submitted an additional amendment instructing the committee to extend the inquiry to the lithography and engraving.

After some debate of a desultory character, the amendments were withdrawn. The resolution of Mr. Davis was then agreed to; and

On motion of Mr. Adams, the letter ordered to be printed.

Mr. Adams, on leave, reported a bill from the committee on manufactures, entitled, "a bill to insure the more faithful execution of the laws relating to the collection of duties on imports," which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Barnard asked the consent of the house to introduce a bill (of which intention he had given previous notice) on the subject of bankruptcy. Objection being made, leave was not granted.

The next business in order was the motion of Mr. Giddings to reconsider the vote by which the bill making appropriation for the payment of the navy pensions had been passed, containing an amendment to the report of the act of 1837.

The previous question, on the reconsideration, having been demanded by Mr. Jameson, Mr. Adams endeavored to prevail on him to withdraw it.

Mr. Jameson was willing to oblige the gentleman from New York as any member of the house, but could not, consistent with his duty, withdraw the call.

The call for the previous question was then seconded, and the main question, on the motion to reconsider, ordered to be put; and, being put, it was decided by yeas and nays, as follows: yeas 69, nays 108.

So the house refused to reconsider, and, as far as it is concerned, the act of 1837 is repealed.

Mr. Fillmore, in alluding to the great importance of the president's message in relation to the burning of the Caroline, moved that 5,000 extra copies of the same, with the accompanying documents, be printed.

Mr. Fillmore moved the motion of the gentleman from New York would prevail. The documents were of the highest importance.

The motion to print was then agreed to.

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings, Mr. Adams moved to reconsider the vote by which the above motion had been agreed to, and called for the reading of the documents, which were read accordingly.

Mr. Alfred said he was happy that he had moved the reconsideration, and that he was now satisfied, having heard the papers read, that they ought to be printed. He was satisfied that the answer of Mr. Forsyth was a good state rights paper, and he should be glad to think that the interests of justice were blunted by party spirit, if he were capable of doing injustice to that officer under any circumstances.—He (Mr. A.) hoped that the party spirit which had just passed had not blunted the instincts of justice of the great whig party of the United States, nor to the state rights party, of which he had lived an humble member, and of which he hoped to die a member. He was satisfied that the rights of the empire state of New York had been vindicated by the secretary of state in an able and dignified manner; and he was sorry to say that this was the only paper coming from that department that he could commend in that light.

As regarded his sympathy towards the northeastern territory, he, as a southern man, had more than he ought to have; but he did know that the lion of England had been growing for his prey on that northeastern boundary long ago. As an American citizen, he felt humbled at the reflection that, under the administration of Martin Van Buren, the eagle of his country had cowered under the lion of England; he felt humbled that a country which, even in the days of the revolution, was strong enough to defend its rights, and to permit the queen of England to deprive them of every thing. Aggression after aggression had been committed, and it would continue to be so as long as the head of the executive government of the United States declined to consider in this document. Mr. A. then withdrew the motion to reconsider.

Mr. Stansley received it.

Mr. Holmes, of South Carolina, said he was quite delighted with this debate; not, however, because of the incidental question of a vote right had been introduced, for that was about the same thing as the constitution, which every man construed according to his own taste. But he was delighted because the gentleman from Georgia had given his approval to at least one act of the administration. He was glad that one member of the opposite party had the generosity to acknowledge them in the right for once. The gentleman had, however, touched on the very important subject of the northeastern boundary. He had said that the lion of England had growled, while we paid no regard to it, &c. Now, he (Mr. H.) wished to know whether the remarks made by that gentleman were to be considered ominous of the future action of the new administration, or whether he did not judge, from the remarks made by one of his friends, that we were to be precipitated into a conflict with this mighty power, prepared and armed at every point, and that, too, for a line of demarcation? If they were to rush into conflict, if the south was to be prostrated, he was thankful that gentlemen had shown their hands, that the south might know that one of the results attending the triumph of this great party, was a question of territorial war.

Mr. Jifford replied to these remarks, and said that he had not spoken in behalf of the coming administration. He had it not in his eye or his mind at the time he spoke; he knew nothing of its secrets nor its intentions. He had no conference with its friends, nor had his advice ever been asked. He spoke for himself—he spoke the sentiments of his own heart, when he said that the lion of England had growled for his prey on the northeastern boundary. Whatever might be the opinion of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Holmes), he (Mr. A.) would express his belief that, if ever the issue of which the gentleman spoke did come, the state of South Carolina would be seen. We first came, gallantly defending the honor, and maintaining the rights of the nation. This much he could say—he being one of the first born of nullification out of South Carolina—that South Carolina would be the last to hide her head. If the country should ever be engaged in a war with Britain. His own wish was, that we never might have war with her on this or any other question, if it could be honorably avoided.

For the part which he had taken in the recent vicious struggle, he claimed no honor distinct from his colleagues and his country; and in characterizing as he had done the communication of Mr. Forsyth, he (Mr. A.) had done only that which a sense of justice dictated.

Mr. Cushing said the matters contained in the correspondence just read, were sufficiently grave in themselves; and they had acquired additional gravity incidentally from the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. Jifford), and of the gentlemen from South Carolina, (Mr. Holmes), and he (Mr. C.) had a few words to say on both points.

Mr. C. said that the correspondence contains the first distinct official avowal on the part of the British government, that the attack on the Caroline was authorized by the government. Mr. Fox says it is well known to have been so authorized. Mr. C. decried that. It was about two years since Mr. Stevenson addressed an earnest letter of remonstrance and demand of explanation to Lord Palmerston on the subject; to which Lord P. stood mute to this day, neither avowing nor answering, justifying nor refusing to justify the outrage. Mr. Forsyth was correct in his allusion to this part of Mr. Fox's letter as a novelty. It was true that the British government had indirectly sustained the act by honoring and commending its own minister, Mr. England, such as McNab and Drew; but no direct official declaration of the attack on the Caroline having been previously authorized by the British government had been made before this, to his knowledge.

Mr. C. said he concurred entirely with Mr. Forsyth in opinion of the inadmissibility of Mr. Fox's demand for the release of McLeod. He was arrested in New York, by the legal authorities, to be legally tried for an alleged act of murder and snoot committed in New York—let him be tried by the laws of New York to whom jurisdiction of the case belongs.

But, if col. Prince could murder in cold blood the prisoners he made in the frontier troubles—if the authorities of Upper Canada had a right to try, condemn and punish others of the prisoners—if Great Britain might promote Drew and knight McLeod, and if guilty hang him.

Mr. C. said these remarks were called for by the tenor of the correspondence laid before the house. But now for the other point.

On hearing these papers read, the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Jifford) avowed the sentiments of patriotism, which I (said Mr. C.) trust are felt not less warmly by the gentleman from S. Carolina, (Mr. Holmes) which I will burn unquenchably in the breast of every American. He spoke in the language of indignant truth of the acts of assentation and concession, on the part of the present administration, to acts of aggression on the United States committed by Great Britain. In saying this, the gentleman from Georgia frankly declared, that he was uttering his own individual sentiments, as sentiments only, and as the sentiments of an individual only. They are sentiments such as every citizen of this country should feel, and the gentleman from South Carolina would approve.

But the gentleman from South Carolina, looking beyond this, treats the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia as the avowal of a plan, on the part of the British government, to enter into power, a plan of settled hostility against Great Britain.

On hearing this charge, Mr. C. could not but revert to the incidents of the great public controversy which this country had just gone through, and the speeches he had listened to in congress and at the hustings, and to the press as it continues to speak down to this very moment, in its reproaches of him and his political friends. What is it that we hear again and again imputed to us, by the thousand voices of the orators and newspapers of administration? Why, that we forsake the allies of Britain; that Harrison, the gallant old hero of Tippecanoe and the Thosoms, that be and his friends come into power as the hirelings and instruments of England. Has not this been wrung in our ears day after day, and hour after hour, for the whole year back? Yes, sir. And now what is the complexion of these assurances, now when the country has passed judgment on the administration, and that we are the hiring allies, the tools of Britain, that we are taking power with a fixed purpose of enmity against her—and as if without cause, in the mere antagonism of hostility.

Mr. C. said that, like the gentleman from Georgia, he spoke not for the new administration, but for himself, and as an individual. He felt bound to make this distinction, because his individual sentiments on this question, between the United States and Great Britain were well known, having been expressed by him often heretofore, whether discreetly or not, yet with freedom which, as an individual, he had the right to use, in the honest expression of his own convictions.

Mr. C. said then, as to both these contradictory charges against the cooling administration, that he believed, for himself, say, he would go further and say, that he knew they were alike equally groundless. We who are about to enter into power care neither as allies or friends of Britain (in any exceptional sense) nor as enemies; but as Americans; Americans animated with the feelings which belong to our country, and at the same time anxious to maintain the rights of our country against any and every foreign power; never doubting that if, by the continued aggressions of Britain, even the most powerful of the governments of Europe, we be dragged into a third war, we shall fight that war gallantly and as triumphantly as we have already fought a first and a second war with Britain; we resolved, also, if we honorably may, to maintain the peace of this country, anxious to do it, and to promote the internal prosperity of the union and the harmony of the states by means of peace, and repelling the idea of any act of reprisal or retaliation.

I repeat (said Mr. C.) that so far as I know the objects of the friends of general Harrison, we undertake to set as Americans, and as Americans only, and we are not at all desirous that the States are about to have a president who is not professing to be a northern man with southern feelings—no, nor a southern man with northern feelings, but professing to be what he is, a western man with American feelings, and with the honor, the peace, and the interest of the United States, each equally dear to his soul.

Mr. Duncan demanded of the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Cushing) when and where the administration had charged the whigs with being the "tools of Great Britain." Let the member lay his finger upon the place where it had been asserted by any paper, or press, or if he could, any extracts to the house. The whig party had not been charged by the Van Buren administration with being the "tools of Great Britain; but they had been charged with being under the influence of the moneyed aristocracy of that country—and the influence of British gold upon the minds of the whig States are about to have a president who is not professing to be a northern man with southern feelings—no, nor a southern man with northern feelings, but professing to be what he is, a western man with American feelings, and with the honor, the peace, and the interest of the United States, each equally dear to his soul.

Mr. Duncan was perfectly willing to speak in order, but if he was out of order in showing the falsity of a charge against the administration, why was not the gentleman who made that charge called to order? Mr. D. said the charge against the democratic party having been made, and he having denied it, he was now asking the result; the result just was the denunciation of the country were governed and managed by the moneyed aristocracy of England.

After some conversation of a desultory character Mr. Stansley withdrew his motion to reconsider. So the question of the resolution was put, and carried.

A number of private bills from the senate were twice read and referred.

Mr. Mason, of Ohio, asked leave to move a resolution which was read at the clerk's table; and on objection being made, the resolution was introduced, and it was agreed to, and as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary if he be directed to report to this house in what manner that part of the 20th article of the treaty between the United States and the Choctaw nation, made at Dancing Rabbit Creek, and dated Sept. 27, 1830, has been executed, which stipulates that "for the benefit and advantage of the Choctaw people, and to improve their minds, there shall be educated under the direction of the president and at the expense of the United States, forty Choctaw youths for twenty years."

And that he communicate copies of all such regulations as may have been adopted, of orders issued, and correspondence had, relating to the execution, of this stipulation, and report the result of his inquiries, and the amount expended on account thereof; what agents or agents have been employed, their names, rank, and compensation; what is the accuracy of each school has been established for the education of the Choctaw youths, and at what time and place; whether teachers have been employed, and the names, rank, and compensation of each; the number of the Choctaw youths, or other persons, if any, have been received into, or educated at, such school, and at what cost; what scholars, if any, have been selected for the accommodation of such school, and at what cost; and what branches of learning have been taught here; and how many pupils have graduated, and in what term of time after their admission; and what is the present number of teachers and pupils belonging to the school.

And that he make a similar report and statement in regard to the execution of so much of the same article of said treaty as provides that fifty "thousand dollars, viz. twenty-five hundred dollars annually, shall be given in support of three teachers of schools for twenty years."

Mr. Adams presented a letter which he considered in the nature of a petition, from Mr. Atteece, of New York, who considered his character as a reporter and man to report and any other of the kind, in the house of representatives, by Mr. Monroe, of New York, of a letter from Mr. Jady of that the country; and the right of the citizens to have the wrong corrected, if wrong existed, was equally good. He should, therefore, vote against the reconsideration.

Mr. Briggs was understood to say that he thought the house had committed a great error, at the last session of congress, in refusing the members from New Jersey who claimed their seats an opportunity of being heard at the bar of the house. Now, here was a case from the state of Pennsylvania, in which Mr. Ingersoll claimed that the election of Mr. Naylor was effected by fraud, and that, if justice were done, the sitting member would be removed from his seat. He (Mr. B.) knew of no case within the last ten years in which a person claiming a seat had been heard before the house. He thought, therefore, it was the right of Mr. Ingersoll to be heard.—There was great propriety in his being heard upon the ground suggested by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fillmore). He (Mr. B.) thought that it would be not only expedient, but manifestly unjust, when a rational candidate came here to contest the right of a man who was in his seat, and who claimed that right—it would, he repeated, be most manifestly unjust not to hear him at the bar of the house. It was not that the election of Mr. Naylor should be heard. He (Mr. B.) hoped that the vote would not be reconsidered; and that the house would do that justice in this case which was refused to the gentleman from the state of New Jersey.

The speaker gave the floor to Mr. Mason of Ohio, who yielded it to enable Mr. Garret Davis to ask for his reading of the memorial of Mr. Ingersoll, (above referred to). The memorial not being at the moment on the clerk's table—

Mr. Mason commenced the resolution offered by his colleague (Mr. Medill) as a very proper one. He (Mr. Mason) had entertained the same opinion at the time the New Jersey case was before the house, and he thought the house offered a resolution of the same import as this; but that under the influences then prevailing, was rejected by an inexcusable majority, some of whom were at this present moment engaged in attempting to have the inexcusable privileges claimed restored to one of their own friends. Where then was the desire of these gentlemen that the parties coming here by virtue of documents emanating from the highest authority of the state should be permitted to plead their case at the bar of the house? He thought, however, to see a returning sense of justice, as indicated by the resolution now proposed. The unexampled outrage perpetrated in that case had reached the ears of the people, and they had responded to the promptings of their indignation. They had repudiated after the existence of the present congress. They were now, he hoped, about to return to the good old practices of the republican school, according to which, as he had read and understood them, it was the privilege of a citizen to be heard before returned to this house as a member, and of him who contested the validity of the return, or the truth of the election, to appear at the bar and be heard "by himself or his counsel," (to use the words of his colleague). He thought that the resolution should have been adopted, and he hoped that it would not be reconsidered.

It was proper, however, that the vote should be reconsidered, for purposes of explanation. He wished to know whether Mr. Ingersoll claimed a seat in this house by virtue of an election by the people of Pennsylvania. He (Mr. M.) supposed that it was with a view to that fact that he had in the reading of the memorial had been called for. For his own part, he would give counsel not only to the contesting member, but to the humblest of the constituency who had given a vote and who believed that the election had not been regularly achieved. He wished this house to be considered a great court of justice as well as the grand inquest of the nation; and that the great rules of right should not be turned aside to secure political objects or party purposes. None attempt to do this in the constitution and to the violated privileges of this house, and he hoped it would now be made, and that those who might hereafter be in a majority in this house would avow, as contamination, the precedent which had been set at the last session of congress.

Mr. Cushing said he was in favor of hearing the petitioner, according to the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. Medill). He (Mr. C.) was in favor of that resolution for the reasons submitted by other gentlemen, and for this further reason. On referring to the record, he found that all the proceedings in this case were based upon a petition of Mr. Ingersoll. The petition set forth that he was duly elected and he claimed the seat, to which he said he was duly elected, as against Mr.

Naylor—the returned and sitting member. That was the record. These proceedings were in continuation of that record. The question before the house was, what disposition should be made of that petition of Mr. Ingersoll. And upon that petition, recorded in the record, and upon the facts stated in it, he (Mr. C.) thought that Mr. Ingersoll was, in justice and in equity, entitled to be heard.

He objected, however, to the form of the resolution, and he asked the attention of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Medill) to it. It was inserted in its terms, and there was no expression to which he (Mr. C.) objected. The resolution was to the effect (he did not recollect the precise words) that Mr. Ingersoll should have leave to be heard as well as the sitting member. Now, Mr. Naylor was a member of this house, de facto at least, as the gentleman from Ohio admitted; he (Mr. C.) said, a member de jure; but, at all events, Mr. Naylor was a member de facto, and therefore, as such, he had much right to speak to the gentleman from Ohio or as he Mr. C. himself had, and it did not need a resolution of this house to give that right.

The very mention in this resolution of leave to speak was a denial of his right to speak. He would not assent to the resolution as it stood in its resolution. They were unusual, contrary to precedent, and, in words and in spirit, a denial of the unquestionable right of the sitting member.

Mr. Medill did not think that the resolution contained any thing that was objectionable. He thought the petitioner should be placed on the same footing with Mr. Naylor; and he did not, therefore, see the necessity of the modification suggested. He hoped Mr. Ingersoll would be permitted to go on.

He said much more, but that if he was objected to meant nothing, they were not needed there; and that, if they meant any thing, that meaning was a broad one. He must, therefore, vote in favor of the resolution, unless the words were struck out by general consent.

Mr. Lewis Williams rose to withdraw his motion to reconsider; but, before doing so, he said he thought that this proceeding had in many respects been irregular. When the members of the committee of elections to send for persons and papers, it adopted an unusual and unprecedented course. He believed that from the foundation of the government to this day, no committee of elections had been authorized to send for persons and papers, but that when the house possessed this power, it invested the committee with legislative power—it made it a prosector instead of a judge. How many drafts had been made on the constitution and the consequences of the power being given to the committee to send for persons and papers; a committee which, by the constitution and rules of the house, was solely and exclusively a judge.

He inquired in what capacity Mr. Ingersoll presented himself here to-day—whether as a claimant of the seat occupied by Mr. Naylor, or as the attorney and agent of the people who joined with him in the petition to this house. This was his chief object in making this motion to reconsider. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Medill, had stated he did not know how he, Mr. W. had come to the knowledge of the fact that Mr. Ingersoll did not claim the seat in his own behalf. Certainly he, Mr. W. had not spoken from the record. His attention had not been particularly drawn to that point; but what had been said by the gentleman from Ohio himself, Mr. Medill, appeared to him, Mr. W. to corroborate the opinion that Mr. Ingersoll was not here to claim the seat for himself, but that the motion was pretended was, that Mr. Naylor was not entitled to his seat; and the finding of the minority of the committee would be, at all events, a justification to him, Mr. W. for the opinion he had expressed. If he was not with intention to limit the right of speech here on these important subjects. He was disposed to bar Mr. Ingersoll, but he wished to know in what capacity he appeared. It was, he repeated, with this view that he made the motion to reconsider, as many as desired to do so, it was in the habit of acting seemed to be opposed to it, he would withdraw the motion.

Mr. Cushing renewed the motion, (solely he explained, for the purpose of affecting the modification of the resolution.)

Whereupon, by general consent, Mr. Medill modified his resolution by striking therefrom the words "as well as the sitting member."

And then Mr. Cushing withdrew the motion to reconsider.

Mr. Barnard renewed it.

He desired to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Medill. He, Mr. B. took it for granted that, having submitted the motion in relation to the seat of Mr. Ingersoll, that the gentleman from Ohio, he, Mr. Medill, would be acquainted with the fact whether it was the intention of that gentleman in addressing the house to do so in the way of a personal claim to a seat?

Mr. Medill (who was very imperfectly heard) was understood to disavow any greater familiarity with the result of Mr. Ingersoll than other gentlemen on this floor possessed; and to recommend that the gentleman from New York, Mr. Barnard, to address his inquiries to Mr. Ingersoll personally.

Mr. Barnard (having first called for the reading of the first resolution of the committee of the minority) proceeded to say, it was evident from the record that not one of the minority of the committee—not even, he presumed, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Medill, himself—had any idea of presenting to this house an issue which was to be decided by Mr. Ingersoll or was not entitled to be heard. He was sure that Mr. Ingersoll had petitioned for his seat. The subject was sent to a committee; that committee had examined it, and had come into this house with a unanimous report, in which, he presumed, that to say, that Mr. Ingersoll was not entitled to a seat. Was the house disposed to go behind that report?

A point of order as to the relevancy of these remarks was later raised by Mr. Turney; but the speaker having decided that they were not out of order—

Mr. B. proceeded. He took it for granted that Mr. Ingersoll did originally ask the house to consider his claim to a seat; but what he (Mr. B.) meant to say was, that the question before the house was the question presented by the minority of the committee—namely, whether the election should be declared utterly void, or should be sent back to the people to decide it. The question then was, whether the house was disposed to go behind the report of the committee, in respect, that it was to say, that Mr. Ingersoll was not entitled to a seat. Was the house disposed to go behind that report? A point of order as to the relevancy of these remarks was later raised by Mr. Turney; but the speaker having decided that they were not out of order—

Mr. B. offered the following as a substitute for Mr. Medill's resolution, in case the motion to reconsider should prevail:

"That Mr. Ingersoll have leave to be heard at the bar of this house in favor of his right to a seat in this house in place of Mr. Charles Naylor." Mr. Barnard's question, whether the motion contained in any legislation, as a general principle both gentlemen claiming had the right, by courtesy and parliamentary usage, to be heard. For what had Mr. Ingersoll petitioned? If for a seat for himself, he had a right to be heard, because he petitioned for something which he claimed as belonging to himself personally. As he (Mr. D.) understood the matter, Mr. Ingersoll insisted on his right to a seat, and in support of that claim he had a right to be heard; but in no other state of circumstances had he that right. If it were otherwise, every individual whose name was appended to the petition had a right to be heard.

Mr. Hubbard moved the previous question; but withdrew.

Mr. Alfrod who submitted a few remarks, the object of which was to show that an issue had been made up between Mr. Naylor and Mr. Ingersoll—the one having and the other claiming the seat—and that issue could no wise be decided by the action of the committee of elections, but was to be decided, one way or the other, by the house in a judicial capacity; that the issue had not been changed; and that Mr. Ingersoll had a right to be heard on the subject.

After some remarks from Messrs. Alfrod and Barnard, the previous question was called by Mr. Turney, (who met all appeals for its withdrawal with a negative), and there was a second in the call. The main question being on the motion to reconsider the vote on the resolution of Mr. Medill was ordered, and, being taken, was decided in the negative, yeas 41, nays 140.

The speaker then informed Mr. Ingersoll, (who appeared at the bar) that the house had passed a resolution that he should be heard, &c.

Mr. Ingersoll then rose and addressed the house in support of his claim, and had proceeded about an hour, when, without having concluded, he gave way for a speaker, to which, having been agreed to, the house adjourned.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

The packet ship England, capt. Waite, arrived on Wednesday evening from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 9th ult. She brings London dates to the evening of the 31st—two days later than our previous advices. The intelligence was favorable and interesting.

ENGLAND.

There is a decided improvement in the money market, caused in part by the favorable intelligence from China and the Mediterranean, but in part also by a general improvement in business. The export of specie to the continent had ceased; stocks had generally improved; wheat was at least firm at former prices, and cotton at Liverpool had slightly improved, and was in active demand. In short, things were looking decidedly better than for many weeks previous.

FRANCE.

The triumph of the king, the South-Gazette ministry and their pacific policy in complete. The ministerial address to the king was carried on the 4th by a vote of 247 yeas to 161 nays, after a stormy debate in which the personal integrity of the king was directly impugned, and a chaos of an hour ensued. The little Tall-yrand would seem to be factually prostrated.

By the packet ship La Duchesse d'Orléans, Havre papers of the 9th Dec. are received. The funeral of Napoleon was to take place on the 15th.

The remains of Napoleon, having been placed, at Cherbourg, on board a steamboat, the solemn train passed by Havre at six o'clock on the morning of the 8th. The steamer with the remains was painted black, with torches burning on the bow and stern and around the tomb. A long retinue of attendants followed. The shore was lined for a mile with national guards. In Paris a hundred thousand men were under arms. The excitement was very great among the people, but the strong military arrangements left no apprehensions of disorder.

The London Standard of the 12th December, received by the Garrick at New York, says: The restoration of the remains of Napoleon seems to have excited a feeling in Paris, of which no other part of France affords any symptom.

The body of Napoleon. The latest Parisian journals contain the official account of the disinterment of Napoleon's remains, and their removal on board the frigate Belle Poule, under the supervision of prince de Joinville, assisted by count Rohan Chabot and captain Alexander, commissary appointed, the one by France and the other by England, to superintend the exhumation.

The body appeared to have suffered little change in the twenty years which has passed since it was interred. The three coffins which the exterior one was mahogany, the second lead, and the third had mahogany—having been cut through, and the white satin sheet which covered the body removed, the form and features of the great man appeared as in the view of a group of his old and faithful followers who were permitted to be present, and of many who now gazed upon them for the first time. The features were so perfect, and retained so completely their original character, that several General Gourgaud, involuntarily exclaimed on beholding them, "Bon! tres bon!"

The process verbal, drawn up by Dr. Guillard, surgeon of the Belle Poule, after reciting the precautions used in opening the lids of the several coffins, continues thus:

"Something white, which appeared to have become detached from the lining, covered, as if with a thin gauze, all that the coffin contained. The cranium and forehead, which seemed strong to the touch, were particularly stained with it, but very little was seen on the lower part of the face, on the hands, or on the toes. The body of the emperor was in an easy position, as when it was placed in the coffin; the upper members were laid at the right, the left arm and hand resting on the left thigh; the lower limbs were slightly bent; the head a little raised, rested on a cushion. The voluminous skull, the high and broad forehead, presented themselves, covered with fine reticulated, close to the surface, and to them. Such appeared also the contour of the orbits, the upper edges of which were furnished with the eyebrows. Under the eyelids were to be distinguished the ocular globes, which had lost very little of their volume or color. The eyelids were completely closed, adhered to the subjacent parts, and were hard under the pressure of the finger. Some eyelashes were to be seen on their inner side, and the eyelids were very white, which covered them, were well preserved; the tubes and nostrils alone had suffered. The cheeks were full; the teguments of this part of the face were remarkable for their softness to the touch and their elasticity. The hair of the head was slightly bald, a tint they had borrowed from the beard, which had grown after death. The chin itself had undergone no change, and still preserved the peculiar type of the face of Napoleon."

The remains were parted, and three of the incisive teeth, very white, appeared under the upper lip, which was a little raised towards the left. The hands were perfect, not having undergone the least change. Although the joints were stiff, the skin preserved that reticulated color which is only to be found in the living man. The nails of the fingers were long and adherent and very white. The legs were in boots, but in consequence of the opening of the remains the last four toes were out on each side. The skin of these toes was of a dead white and furnished with nails. The anterior region of the thorax was much depressed in middle, and the sides of the belly hard and sunk. All the members covered by the clothing appeared to have preserved their shapes. I pressed the left arm, which I found to be hard and diminished in thickness. As to the clothes they appeared with their colors, so that the uniform of the horse chasseur of the old guard was to be seen; the dark green of the coat and the bright red facings. The grand cordon of the legion of honor was across the waistcoat, and the white breeches were partly covered by the bat, which was placed on the thighs. The epaulettes, the star and other decorations attached to the breast, had lost their brilliancy and turned black. The gold crown of the cross of officer of legion of honor had alone preserved its polish. Vases of silver appeared between the legs, one surmounted by an eagle which rose above the knees; they were foiled and closed. As there were adhesions between these vases and the parts they touched, I uncovered them a little, the king's commissioner not thinking it right that they should be removed for the purpose of closer examination."

The process verbal goes on to state that the above particulars might have been more full, but they were sufficient to show that the preservation of the body was more complete than circumstances of the nature and importance warranted an expectation of. It then proceeds:

"This is not the place to inquire into the causes which have to this extent arrested the progress of decomposition; but it is not to be denied that the extreme solidity of the masonry of the tomb, and the care taken in making a solid the coffin in metal, have powerfully contributed to this result. However this may be, I feared the effect of the atmosphere upon the remains, and was convinced that the best means of preserving them still longer was to exclude them from its action. I eagerly complied with the desire of the king's commissioner, that the coffin should be interred in its place, after having steeped it in creosote, and then caused all the wooden cases to be closely fastened as possible, and those of metal to be hermetically soldered. The remains of Napoleon are now in six coffins—one of tin, a second of mahogany, a third of lead, separated from that within by sawdust and wedges of wood, the fifth the sarcophagus of ebony, and the sixth the outer case of oak."

The process of opening the tomb commenced at half-past 12 o'clock on the 15th of October, but in consequence of the strength and solidity of the masonry it was 10 o'clock at night when the workmen arrived at the coffin.

The sarcophagus in which the body was deposited for transmission to France, and all the paraphernalia, were of the most magnificent and costly description, and the funeral apparatus in the Belle Poule was fitted up in a style of costly grandeur which must have given it a most imposing appearance. The pall which covered the sarcophagus was of heavy crimson velvet besprinkled with golden beads, freely bordered with gold embroidery and ermine, and had worked through the whole of its rich fabric a white cross of silver threads, to all appearance like lace. At each corner was an eagle surrounded with stars—all embroidered in gold.

LATER. The packet ship Oxford, Rothbom, brings London papers to the 13th Dec. There was great activity in the stock yards, indicating that foreign operations were anticipated, whether in the eastern or western hemisphere, their policy is evidently to prepare for contingencies.

Interment of Napoleon's remains in Paris. The great pageant of interring the remains of Napoleon in the Invalides took place on Tuesday, 15th December. The line of the procession from the banks of the Seine to the Hotel des Invalides was adorned on both sides with military trophies, and a more magnificent pageant, all the accounts agree in saying, has rarely been witnessed, even in Paris. From four in the morning, undeterred by the coldest day that has been experienced, during the present winter in France, thousands proceeded to the several advantageous positions which different localities presented for the viewing of the procession.

At nine o'clock the first gun was fired, on the bank of the Seine, at Courbevoie, where a park of artillery was stationed. This became the signal for the commencement of the proceedings of the day. From the temple, erected on the left bank of the river, the Abbe Coqueroux and a numerous clergy, in full canonicals, then issued and proceeded towards the steamer La Dorade, which had been brought close up to a wooden quay, forming a communication between the shore and its deck. His royal highness the prince de Joinville met them as they approached between two lines of troops, and, after the exchange of salutations turned towards the vessel lined by the sailors from La Belle Poule, a body of whom proceeded to raise the coffin, and transported it to the temple, the priests going before, chanting, according to the usage of the Catholic church.

The remains of the emperor were deposited there for two hours, the religious rites which were performed, having lasted thus long. The immense concourse of people who were assembled at the spot, viewed this portion of the proceedings in solemn silence, the roar of artillery alone sounding through the atmosphere.

SPAIN.

There is nothing of interest from the peninsula, except that tranquillity is maintained under the regency of Espartero.

There is a general calm on the continent.

EGYPT.

The pasha knocks under. He has had an interview with com. Napier at Alexandria, and offered to relinquish the pasha's office, the Ottoman fleet and abandon all pretensions on the single condition the warriors, who was spared to act as a guide, promised to conduct him."

The following is a letter from judge Marvin to the editors of the Tallahassee Floridian, giving some additional particulars of the expedition of Col. Harney:

On board the brig Waculla,
St. Mark's, Dec. 31, 1840.

DEAR SIR: News had arrived at Key West before my leaving there, that Col. Harney, of the U. S. A. about the 15th instant, had a rencontre with the Indians in the interior of the everglades. With a force of about ninety men he entered the everglades in canoes, guided by John, a negro who was captured by the Indians in 1838, from his master, Dr. Grews, and who escaped and came into the camp at Cape Florida a few months since. The negro conducted the column through the everglades to the Indian town, and to several Indians, and then, killing one or two Indians, and taking thirty-eight prisoners. In the assault the chief of the band, Chai-ki-ka, escaped, but was pursued several miles by one of the dragons, and overtaken and shot.—Among the prisoners taken were ten warriors, nine of whom were hung; the life of the tenth being saved for a future guide. The rest of the prisoners were women and children, and were all spared and taken to the post at Cape Florida.

This band of Indians is said to be the Spanish band, and the same who murdered Mr. Cooley's family and several others at Cape Florida, and captain Walton of the light ship, and Dr. Cries. They are the same Indians, too, who surprised Col. Harney a year since, at Col. Macomber's, by a treaty of peace; and the same who recently burned and destroyed the settlements on Indian Key, killing men, women and children, and mutilating their bodies in a most barbarous manner. This band of Indians, with this same Chai-ki-ka at their head, have been the terror of the south for years, and have probably drank as much white blood as any in the territory.

The colony captured thirteen or fourteen of Col's rifles, taken from him at Caloosahatchie by the Indians, and about two thousand dollars worth of goods carried off by the Indians from Indian Key. This affair of Colonel Harney's will do more to strike terror into the hearts of the Indians, and to make peace, than any thing that has occurred for a long time. The everglade is no longer the refuge of the Indians. His own fastnesses are penetrated by the white man.

Colonel Harney is about again to penetrate the everglades, in pursuit of Sam Jones—the now having a guide to conduct him to his town. He is to be joined by several officers in the navy, and a company of marines, who are now upon the coast.—Every like this will soon be put to rest, and with less loss of life than temporizing measures.

The Floridian also contains the following extract of a letter from Tampa Bay in reference to the pacification of the Indians:

Tampa, Dec. 22, 1840. "Tiger Tail's son and brother, with several others, have come into Fort King, and surrendered themselves. Tiger Tail himself is daily expected. On his arrival, the party will be sent to Tampa under an escort, which is required as a security against interruption from the Miccasukies. Among the delegation is a nephew of Ebo-omathia, the principal chief of the Tallahassee. This man was sent out to bring in the chief, and has returned with him, and with eight others, who will now go to Fort 4, near Cape Keys. The son has gone out again to bring in his father's brother, but has not yet returned. So far, then, as the Tallahassee tribe is concerned, the prospects are certainly fair. A portion of the delegation are now in the neighborhood of Peas Creek, collecting their brethren, the Seminoles proper. Seventy or eighty of these had, some time since, already collected, and were on their way in, but were unfortunately alarmed and dispersed, on seeing an armed boat's crew, who were out scouting. Such assurances have been sent to them, and explanations made, as to leave little doubt of their coming in now; and they are expected at Charlotte's harbor in about a week. A portion of the party met by their chief, Hootoochee, (the principal chief of the delegation), who has promised to bring them from Tampa there in a steamboat.

"The delegation (from Arkansas) has also sent to Coacoochee, one of the most active and formidable of the Miccasukie chiefs, by one of his people, (who lately came in with a flag of truce and surrendered himself), in the hope to induce him to come in. This Coacoochee has an uncle in the delegation, who has sent urgent entreaties to him to come and listen to what he has to say."

Later. Lieut. Colonel Harney has started again, in connection with a detachment of officers and sailors from lieutenant MacLaughlin's command, and a party of marines, under lieutenants Sloan and Wilson, for Sam Jones' camp. They are accompanied by the negro John, who was wounded in the former expedition, and an Indian prisoner.

Captain W. B. Davidson, the 3d artillery, died of the disease contracted in the everglades.

THE NAVY.

The United States sloop Concord, commander Borden, bound for the coast of Africa, was dropped down to Hampton Roads yesterday morning, and will sail first wind.

[Norfolk Beacon, December 25.]

The United States frigate Constitution and the United States schooner Shark left Gayaquil on the 3d October, all well.

The United States sloop St. Louis at Callio, all well.

The United States frigate Macedonian, commander Isaac Wilkinson, arrived at Pensacola on the 21st ult. one month from Norfolk. Subsequently she exchanged salutes with the French corvette Sabine.

The United States brig Consort lieutenant commander Powell, arrived at Pensacola on the 23d, from St. Joseph, having completed the survey of that harbor, and of Apalachicola.

The United States steamer Missouri was launched at New York on the 7th ult. in handsome style.

The New York American states that a court martial was convened at the navy yard on Monday, for the trial of three midshipmen. The court is composed of captains Renshaw, Perry, Cooper, Salmon, Commodore Fawcett, Williams, McClintock, and McClellan and Sands. John McKen, judge advocate.

STATES OF THE UNION.

"THE FAITH OF THE STATES." In a paragraph on this subject the Cincinnati Republican utters the following commendable sentiments:

"We feel an honest pride at the noble stand which our countrymen have taken on this subject. The purpose is fixed all over the land never to violate the faith of the states. A few bold and unprincipled men, reckless of obligation, and regardless of duty, have dared to defend an opposite action. But such conduct has been repudiated by the nation. In an hour of distress and darkness, when no aid was looked for, and hardly a hope of relief was felt, the states, as one man, have declared that their faith should remain unbroken. Let all doubts on this subject be forever dispelled, by the nation's voice. The states will always prove their fidelity by meeting fully and promptly whatever engagements they may make. Not one of them will forfeit its word, or disavow its name.

That portion of the union, which is bounded west by the Mississippi, north by the Great Lakes, east by the Allegheny river, and south by the river Ohio, contains at present nearly four millions of inhabitants. The remainder of the great valley of the Mississippi, is believed to contain about four millions more.

MAINE.

According to the official account, the vote at the late congressional election in Oxford district was as follows:—Long, (W.) 3,687; Littlefield, (V. B.) 4,399, scattering, 752. The 19th inst. is appointed for another trial.

Governor. The legislature of Maine are examining the returns: the contest is very close between the two governors. Keel, it is understood, according to the Boston papers, leads Fairbank's a few votes, but there being about 100 scattering votes no choice may have been made. In that case the legislature will select a governor who will assuredly be Edward Kent.

VERMONT.

Fugitive slaves in Vermont. The legislature of Vermont, has passed an act regulating the proceedings on claims for runaway slaves. Its most important provisions are, says the Boston Traveller, that the claim must, in all cases, be passed upon by a jury; that if the decision is against the claimant, the alleged slave shall or may again be molested upon the same claim, and any subsequent arrest, or removal of the alleged slave out of the state, under any process whatever, shall be punished as kidnapping;—that the state's attorney shall appear for the alleged slave, receiving his compensation from the state—thats the alleged slave shall be entitled to subpena without charge—that the claimant, before his claim is ascertained, shall give a bond to the state, in the penal sum of $1,000, conditioned to pay all costs and expenses of the trial, and to be liable upon him, two dollars a week for the support of the alleged slave while in custody, and one hundred dollars to the alleged slave, besides his damages, if the claim is not sustained—and finally, that any attempt to remove any alleged slave without the authority of law shall be punished with a fine of $500 to the party aggrieved, and imprisonment in the next prison for not more than ten years. [Paid.]

MASSACHUSETTS.

The legislature of this state assembled Wednesday morning in the state house, at Boston. This house of representatives is the first to organize at 11 o'clock. A. M. by Isaac P. Davis, the senior member from Boston. George Ashman, of Springfield, was elected speaker, on the second ballot, and Luther S. Cushing re-elected clerk. The senate was organized by the re-election of Daniel V. King, as president, and Charles Colburn, clerk, without opposition.

Election. Tenth congressional district. No member of congress having been chosen in this district at the late elections, a special trial took place Monday, which resulted in the choice of Nathaniel B. Borden, whig, over Henry Williams, V. B. the present incumbent, by the following vote: Borden 4,320; Williams 3,750; scattering 202.

Mr. Borden's plurality over Mr. Williams, it will be seen, is 560—his majority over every thing is 288. The majority against Williams is 792.

Mr. Permenier, of Middlesex district, is the only Van Buren member in the Massachusetts delegation to the next congress.

Mr. Borden was a member of the last or 25th congress, and constituted one of those who have been called conservatives.

This vote had stood thus on the first ballot: Borden 4,091; Williams 4,000; scattering 75.

NEW YORK.

Legislature. The legislature of New York met at Albany on Tuesday. P. B. Porter, jr. (W.) of Niagara county, was elected speaker of the house, and the senior governor Bradish took the chair in the senate.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The legislature met at Harrisburg on the 5th inst. In the senate there was but one election, on the call to order, at 3 o'clock, P. M. On motion of Mr. Strohm, the senate proceeded to the election of a speaker, when Charles B. Penrose, of Cumberland, (whig) was elected on the first ballot. The vote of the senate was as follows: Penrose, 17; Satterly, 3; scattering 4. On being conducted to the chair by Messrs. Kingbury and Snyder, Mr. Penrose made a feeling and eloquent address.

In the house, also, every member was present except Messrs. B. and C. On account of indisposition. After the roll had been called, the house, on motion of Mr. Crab, proceeded to the election of a speaker. On the first ballot, the vote was for Mr. Middleton, (W.) 49; Richard Broadhead, (V. B.) 45; scattering 10. A second ballot was immediately held, which resulted as follows:—Middlehead, (W.) 48; Flenniken, (V. B.) 48; scattering 3. No one having a majority of the whole number, a third ballot was had, which resulted in the choice of William A. Crab, (W.) of Philadelphia, as the speaker. The vote was, for Crab, 53; Middleton 44; scattering 2. The V. B. members to the number of 45 supported Mr. Crab in a body, and with the aid of few whigs, that gentleman appears to have been elected over Mr. Middleton, the regular whig candidate.

Bank of the United States. Philadelphia, Monday, January 4th, 1841. At a stated meeting of the directors of the Bank of the United States, JACOB BRICK was called to the chair, and Joseph G. Grant appointed secretary.

The president of the bank then submitted and read to the meeting the report of the dividend committee, and a very detailed statement of the bank in a printed form.

On motion, resolved that the said report submitted by the president be accepted. Which was carried.

Mr. Lantz offered the following: Resolved, That hereafter no allowance or presents shall be made by the directors to any officer or other persons employed by this institution.

When the following was offered by Mr. Kennedy

Resolved, That the present policy of the directors of this bank in contracting its business and retrenching its expenses, meet the approbation of the stockholders, and its continuance is recommended.

The following was offered by Mr. Josiah Lippincott: Resolved, That a committee of six be appointed to examine into the details of the reports submitted to the stockholders.

Resolved, That the meeting appoint the committee.

Whereupon the following stockholders were nominated and appointed: Josiah Lippincott, Moses Keampton, Thomas P. Cope, Charles Massey, Richard and Willing, David Kirkpatrick.

Resolved, That the committee be authorized to fill any vacancy which may occur therein.

Resolved, That the meeting now adjourn to meet at this place on the first Monday in April, at 10 o'clock.

SAMUEL BARCK, chairman.

Mr. Gratz, secretary. In the course of the proceedings, the president of the bank, Thomas Dunlap, esq. made some explanatory remarks in relation to a reduction of expenses, which appeared to give very general satisfaction. The resolution approving of the recent course of the directors, was passed unanimously. It may be well enough to mention here, that in introducing a more economical system into the administration of the affairs of the institution, Mr. Dunlap expressed by proposing a reduction on his own salary of 25 per cent.

A considerable number of stockholders were in attendance, and after the official statement had been read by the president, and one or two explanatory remarks had been made, every thing passed off with entire harmony, and the general proceedings appeared to inspire a feeling of confidence and satisfaction. We indulge a hope that from this time forward, the condition of the bank will continue to improve, and its resources to accumulate.

The committee further report—
That the statement herewith submitted marked (B), exhibits the last return of suspended debt and real estate with an estimate of the probable loss thereon, and an account of the interest due on the same. The statement C, presents a comparative view of these several subjects, and the statement D, presents the state of the contingent fund to meet the losses of the bank. From these several statements it will appear that the amount of the contingent fund is

6,505,281 88

From which deduct the losses chargeable to the same

5,790,630 57

standing on the books of the bank including the losses at Philadelphia and those transferred from the office of the late bank

714,651 31

Leaving to credit of contingent fund

5,832,496 56

And that the estimated probable loss on the suspended debt and real estate is

4,930,640 57

To which must be added the losses at offices and agencies, not transferred to the books at Philadelphia

727,855 99

From which may be deducted the interest on that part of the suspended debt, estimated good

512,125 87

Leaving an estimated probable loss of 5,146,370 69

On submitting this statement the committee of far the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to declare a dividend on the capital stock of this bank.

Bank of the United States, Jan. 2, 1841.

(Signed)

M. NEWKIRK,

LEWIS WALIN,

JAMES MARTIN,

ROBERT TAYLOR,

RICHARD PRICE.

Bank of the United States, Jan. 5, 1841.

At an election, held according to law on the 4th instant, for twenty stockholders to serve as directors for the present year, the following gentlemen were duly chosen, viz:

Thomas Dunlap, Matthew Newkirk,

James Martin, Richard Price,

J. B. McWaine, John Humphill,

George Handy, Samuel Jaudon,

Thomas Fleming, James Robertson,

Robert Kaiton, Hyman Deany,

Robert Taylor, John Steele,

Lawrence Lewis, John C. Boyd,

P. L. Laguerrenne, Jonathan Roberts,

W. M. Meredith, William Ayres.

And at a meeting of the directors held last evening, T. DUNLAP, esq. was re-elected president.

A. LARDNER, cashier.

Bank of the United States. We this morning lay before our readers the semi-annual proceedings of the stockholders of the United States bank. It was deemed expedient not to declare a dividend, but the doings of the president and board of directors were unanimously approved. In the course of the proceedings it became necessary for the president, Mr. Dunlap, to address the stockholders, and we are gratified in saying that his remarks met the approbation of all present. In the progress of the late reduction of salaries in that institution, it seems that the president proposed the reduction of twenty-five per cent. of his own salary; so that there has been a general abatement of compensation of all the officers of the bank. The president submitted a report made by a committee, which he had ordered to be printed for the inspection of all who attended, containing a detailed exhibit of the actual condition of the institution. We learn with pleasure that the old officers were last evening re-elected. It is desirable that the president should superintend the operations of the bank till it is restored to its former flourishing condition, which, we trust, will be the case before a very great lapse of time.

(Philadelphia Sentinel.)

The Philadelphia North American says: "We learn that Mr. Biddle, the late president of the bank, came to the election a few minutes before 3 o'clock, and by means of proxies held by him voted in four directors, in lieu of four on the regular ticket. Our informant believes that this act of the late president was without the concurrence or knowledge of the present officers of the bank. The following are the gentlemen whose names were on the regular ticket, and whose election was defeated by Mr. Biddle's proxies: Samuel N. Lewis, A. J. Lewis, Hugh Campbell, Jacob Lanes. The gentlemen elected in their places are Samuel Jaudon, Richard Price, John Humphill, James Robertson.

Bicknell's Reporter states that this bank has obtained a loan in London of $2,000,000, which will enable them to resume and maintain specie payments.

The same paper estimates the loss of the Bank of the U. States, according to their exhibit, (stocks, &c. at market price), to be $17,315,955 00—but the value of the assets they think will improve as business revives.

In reference to the directors, the same paper says, the new board is composed, generally speaking of men of first rate character. The majority are said to be perfectly independent, and we have heard some of them express a strong desire to do everything in their power to benefit the stockholders and re-inspire public confidence. One plan that has been talked of is to cut down the stock to its real value, by an act of the legislature, and then to permit the institution to do business on a reduced capital, and to pay dividends on that capital. In short, to make a liberal allowance for bad debts and probable losses, and to commence on a new and a better system. A change of officers is also talked of.

MARYLAND.

U. S. Senator. We noticed the election of JNO. LEEDS KERR, esq. by a joint vote of 70 to 19 bank ballots and three scattering, in a former Register. At the election held the evening before the election there were four candidates voted for and four ballots occurred, as follows:

	1st.	2d.	3d.	4th.
General Emory,	19	16	1	1
John Leeds Kerr,	25	27	30	41
Henry Page,	28	29	30	33
Jas. A. Pearce,	3	3

The contest was between gentlemen all of whom were highly esteemed, and when the result was ascertained the utmost cordiality was expressed.

Mr. Kerr was detained by indisposition for some days but has we believe recovered so far as to repair to the seat of government.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Legislature. The following resolutions were adopted at the last session of the legislature of this state.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this legislature, a bank chartered by the United States, and whose notes are made receivable in the payment of the public dues, is contrary to the spirit and intent of the constitution; is not warranted by any express grant of power to congress; and is unnecessary and impolitic.

Resolved, That the collection of the revenue of the United States in gold and silver coin is strictly constitutional; and well calculated to preserve a sound circulating medium; and the keeping of the public moneys in the treasury of the United States, instead of entrusting them to the custody of any incorporated company is in conformity to the provisions of the constitution.

Resolved, That the power given to congress, to lay and collect taxes, duties and imposts, does not authorize congress to collect money, except for revenue, and that a tariff to protect the industry of one portion of the community at the expense of any other, is a violation of the spirit and letter of the constitution of the United States, and when such a case occurs the several states will decide for themselves the mode and measure of redress.

Resolved, That the general principles and policy of the administration of Martin Van Buren, are approved by this legislature, and are well calculated to preserve the perpetuity of the union, by an equal and just protection of the rights of every section, thus avoiding the necessity of any state resorting to her own means of self defence, to secure unimpairment of her institutions and her rights.

Resolved, That the state has been with great satisfaction, the steady and consistent adherer of her senator, John C. Calhoun, to the well known, avowed, and matured principles of the state, and they accord to him their deliberate and strong approval, for rindistating and upholding the settled and well known doctrines of the state from which he has his high mission.

Resolved, That the people of this state have cause to congratulate themselves, that the party funds which lately weakened the vigor of its counsels have happily ceased, and South Carolina now presents to the annals of her policy and to peace, at present an undivided front; and is prepared, as she is resolved, to repel, by all proper means, every aggression upon her rights, as a sovereign republic, the instant that aggression is attempted.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing report and resolutions to our senators and representatives in congress with instructions to submit them to that body.

GEORGIA.

It is stated, though on a little room for doubt, in the Middle Georgia Journal of the 5th instant, that governor McDonald has refused his signature to the bill which passed both houses by decided majorities, on quarantining the city of Milledgeville, as a means of gratifying and satisfaction for the refusal of that state to deliver up certain fugitives from justice. The Journal says: "We presume the governor has vetoed the bill," &c.; and more positively afterwards: "Our object is to deprive our friends that the veto power has been exercised and that this bill is not the law of the land."

OHIO.

The message of governor Shannon to the legislature, gives a lumped account of the financial affairs of the state. He says the total amount of the state debt is $14,809,447. The amount that will be required to complete the public works now under way, is estimated at $2,488,000. The amount of revenue for the year which closed on the 30th November, is $296,498; the disbursements of the year less than this $11,407. The present school fund amounts to $296,200. The receipts from the national bank for the year ending on the 30th November less than this $560. The amount of tolls, fines and water rents on the several public works, after deducting the cost of repairs, are $953,751. This is an increase over the receipts of last year, of $21,269.

POLITICAL.

SENATOR BENTON'S LETTERS. The following letter appears in the Register of the 14th inst., signed the editor has placed the name of Mr. Van Buren again at the head of its editorial column, as a candidate for re-election.

Senate chamber, Dec. 6 1840.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to see that you have hoisted the Van Buren flag for 1841. This is the third time since the commencement of our government, that the democracy have been defeated in a presidential election, and I think the party will do more as it has done heretofore, and immediately take up their defeated candidate, and move forward with him without division and without faltering. This is the way the democracy acted in 1790, when Mr. Jefferson was defeated by Mr. Adams, and in 1824, when general Jackson was defeated by Mr. John Quincy Adams. In each of these cases the democracy instead of waiting their time in vain regret, or weakening themselves with divisions, immediately took up their defeated candidate, applied themselves to his proper presentation before the public, and carried him triumphantly forward. I am for following the same course now, and can see no reason for an hour's delay. For one, I am for Mr. Van Buren again, and I would do so, and upon a full view and a full apprehension of his conduct, public and private for twenty years past. I want no better candidate, no better president, no better man. I want no fairer and no firmer, no more energetic, no more consistent in his person will afford. The late election I do not regard as settling the question of party supremacy. It is a great victory for the federalists, and a great defeat for the democracy, but the lines were not fairly drawn between two men, and I require a new trial before I can surrender the democratic cause. I want a new trial in the person of our defeated and irreproachable candidate, and look for the same result in his case, which I have seen in the case of Mr. Van Buren in his second trial of Mr. Jefferson and general Jackson.

Yours truly,

THOMAS H. BENTON.

Moses Dayton, esq.

cretary of the navy to report, he found the following statement:

A statement showing the several sums of money belonging to the navy pension fund, which have been at different periods vested in stocks of the state of Pennsylvania, and the dates and rates at which they have been sold.

So that the loss between the purchases and sales would amount to upwards of thirty thousand dollars, by these two operations of purchasing and selling state stocks.

Then came a statement showing the several sums of money vested at different periods in the state of Maryland:

Now, these were not the only sums which had been purchased and sold in the same way. Some assuming he thought, to four or five millions of dollars, had been similarly invested. And he asked what the secretary of the navy told us? That all these stocks were greatly depreciated in value, and that some of them were now under water.

He (Mr. A.) was obliged to make his observations in a desultory manner, because he was quite unprepared. But some of his friends had had the goodness to obtain for him the report of the secretary of the navy to the last session of congress, and which, he had said, he could not obtain. He wished the clerk to read a few paragraphs.

The clerk then read as follows:
"Acted, March 3, 1837, grants pensions to the widows, and, if no widows, to the children under twenty-one years of age, of all officers, seamen and marines, who 'have died, or may hereafter die, in the naval service,' to be paid from the dates of the deaths, and to be half-pay of the navy, as such pay was on the 1st of January, 1835. It provides that pensions already granted, or to be granted, to invalids, shall be paid from the time when they were established, and that all laws inconsistent with this act, shall be repealed. This most comprehensive act has, in the short space of two years, distributed to navy pensioners more money than was required by the operation of all the other navy pension laws during the period of nearly forty years. Its future effect is beyond estimate."

"Pensions to invalids of the army, and to the widows and children of those killed in the army, have not been so lavishly bestowed as in the navy; and the reason of this difference is said to be, that no navy pension fund was created by the services of the navy, and is not a charge upon the public treasury. So long as the fund thus created shall last, the reason will be satisfactory; but when the fund shall be exhausted, it must be in two years, or in less time, and congress shall find it necessary to make large appropriations out of the public treasury on this account, the reason of the difference will cease. It will then be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to continue to the army pensioners, in similar to the act of March 3, 1837, for the navy. It must be noticed that this act allows pensions to the widows of all persons who ever died, or shall die, in the navy, to be paid to them from the dates of the deaths, and the shall die or marry; not if no widows, then to the children under twenty-one years old. Should the deaths occur in violation of duty, or even by sentence of a court martial, still the widows and children are entitled to pensions under this law. The pensions already vested and granted by this act will, in two years, perhaps sooner, exhaust the fund; and this must be the result even if the act were repealed to lay; for such repeal cannot reach the pensions already granted and vested by the act. The number of persons entitled to pensions by the act to make up the deficiency in the navy pension fund; and, as this pledge must soon be redeemed, it is now necessary to contemplate the subject."

"The vast expense and consequences of the act of 3d March, 1837, will justify a circumstantial detail of its history; and that the whole may be fully understood, it is proper to state that the naval committee of the senate had requested the secretary of the navy to prepare a plan for navy pensions. After the most careful consideration, he submitted a plan which was as liberal as it could be made without diminishing the capital of the pension fund. The committee reported a bill very nearly in all respects conforming to the plan of the secretary. It passed the senate; but, it is believed that, on its third reading in the house of representatives, about midnight, on the 3d of March, 1837, it was most unexpectedly denounced as an extravagant measure, that it would destroy the fund, &c. The bill was then amended, by striking out all except the enacting clause, and inserting what is now the act of March 3, 1837. This amendment was understood to be less expensive than the bill from the senate—that it was a retrenchment measure—would save money to the fund, &c."

"This statement is thus particularly made that congress may have a complete view of the entire subject, and to state it is certain that any postponement of the matter will create embarrassments difficult to be removed by any future legislation. The department has, so far as possible, in every instance limited the disbursements under the act; but, when parties satisfactorily proved their claims under the act, the secretary of the navy had no authority to refuse payment."

"The system has expanded to its present extent through the legislation of congress; and doubtless that honorable body will adopt some course respecting it as will, under all the circumstances, best redeem their pledge of the public faith, without affording any just cause of complaint to the parties interested."

Mr. A. continued. He had had these extracts read to show the house that no fault could be imputed to the secretary of the navy, at the commencement of the last congress, on the ground of not having informed this house what was the condition of the navy pension fund. He (Mr. A.) spent a small portion of the last session in extracting the house to take up this subject. The recommendation was then made to take it up immediately, in order to arrest this bleeding artery. But not the New Jersey members were to be brought into the house at any sacrifice but as to the funds of the United States, or their obligations, or the want of means to meet them, the house had not time to consider or think any thing about."

Towards the close of the last session of congress a message was transmitted by the president, covering a communication from the secretary of the navy, suggesting that an appropriation of $350,000 was necessary to meet the payments of navy pensions coming due on the 1st of July last. The message was sent on the 13th of June, and there was in it a letter from the secretary of the navy, stating that the sum of $300,000 was required to pay pensions coming due on the 1st of July, and that it was, in the opinion of the secretary, impracticable to effect a sale of the stocks belonging to the fund, even at considerable loss, in time to meet the payment. What did the house do with that message? It had no time to consider it; and still it was that he had offered his resolutions. But the house would not receive them—would not allow them to be read. The time of payment came—and notices of the stocks were made, which were also made of the necessity of the house to make the payment. And that $50,000 was one of the demonstrations and reductions from the expenditures of 1840, about which the president and the secretary of the treasury were consulting themselves. They told the house that if that sum was not appropriated it would be necessary to make great sacrifices. Yet the house refused to consider the subject at all; and this sum now stood less upon the expenditure of the treasury of the president and the report of the secretary of the treasury."

In the report referred to, the statement of the secretary of the navy was, that the stocks at present held by the navy pension fund were:

City of Cincinnati 3 per cent.	$100,000
City of Washington 5 per cent.	33,339
Bank of Washington,	14,000
Union Bank of Georgetown,	11,400
The total value set out at $158,739, and then came the note that these stocks were depreciated in value, and that some of them were altogether unsaleable. Here, to be sure, were no state debts; but he knew that there were debts due from several important cities, and that the value of the stocks in city of Cincinnati 3 per cent. stock. What operation that had on the elections in the city of Cincinnati he would not undertake to say; but we were now told that it was unsaleable—good for nothing—and that an appropriation of $350,000 was necessary to supply the amount of that stock which had been provided for.

Nor was this all. About the 1st of September, 1838, the sum of five hundred and nine thousand dollars and upwards was deposited in the mint at Philadelphia in gold—in mint drops—a sacred trust which the United States had accepted upon the pledge of their faith to keep it whole, entire, for the purposes for which it had been given by a foreigner. Within three days, the five hundred and nine thousand dollars were on their way to Arkansas to make a bank. Mr. A. (who here was scarcely heard by the reporter) was understood to say that the two members of the senate and the member of this house from the state of Arkansas, had a quick sale of the money that were coming into the treasury. They were not as yet come; and in the bill making appropriations for the support of the academy at West Point, in the sixth session, upon the last day of the session, under the operation of the previous question a provision was inserted authorizing the president and the secretary of the treasury to loan to the states that sum of money when it should come into the treasury. It was three months before, and on the third day after the money was received, the plan was carried into execution."

Now, we had heard of British gold carrying the elections which had just gone off—not in favor of the present administration, which was done by the aid of British gold. There he (Mr. A.) put a finger upon $309,000 of British gold which contributed, so far as it could go, to the re-election of the present executive—Agassiz; and he (Mr. A.) thought he had shown the means by which it was done. Go to the state of Arkansas. The dollars are not there, but they were there, and they were sent there from the mint of the United States. Here was policy—profound policy—economy—democracy; and all this, too, accompanied with a great and honest confession of assumed state debts, that the hair of gentlemen stood on end at the mere mention of the possibility of such a thing. Was not here a debt of the state of Arkansas of half a million of dollars. Had not the general government assumed that debt? Had they not employed trust money? If Arkansas should declare itself insolvent to-morrow, congress must pay the debt; they had assumed it. Arkansas had not one representative on this floor. Now, if congress assumed debts to create the banks of any other purpose, what did the rule of justice require if the state of New York came here and called upon congress to assume her debts and take her bonds? Twenty millions of dollars! The state of New York had rights to come and demand that congress should take twenty millions of dollars of her bonds as a matter of right, congress having done the same thing with Arkansas. What would be the rule of justice with Pennsylvania? She had a right to demand $14,000,000. They could very easily make up a sum of two hundred millions, by doing nothing more than just carrying out the very principle on which the sum of $549,000 of gold—British gold—would join the creditors of the state of Arkansas to make a bank.

He had desired a long time to say this much to the house, and he said it now, although a little out of order, because he had never been allowed to say it in order. [Laughter.] All the session he had desired to hear him say anything; and it was that consideration which induced him to offer the resolutions he had read, and which gave something like a sample of these things. He offered them after the message called for $200,000, and the very object had come in. But now it was not in order, and there was a gentleman here who cried out "objection!" [General laughter.] He (Mr. A.) was not heard by the house, but he had now been heard; and he was that when he should have been heard. He had resolutions, as he wished to do, they might at least be allowed to go on the journal as a record, to show that such propositions had been offered. Those resolutions went utterly and entirely against the system of increasing state debts, above the rate of thirty, fifty or sixty per cent. below par. He said that, so far as it went, it was an assumption of state debts; and if gentlemen were so averse to the assumption of state debts as they professed to be, he expected they would put a stop to this course of things. One of his resolutions was to prohibit the purchase in future of any state bonds. He considered it not only an extremely impolitic and excessively improper mode of assuming state debts, but it must be assumed at all as being among the most foolish things that ever done by this government. He had specified this sale of half a million of dollars of British gold to the state of Arkansas; but the same course of objection might be taken against the sale of the state which had been treated in the same way. He wished the whole subject to be looked into, and with the blessing of God, it should be looked into at the next session. He did not expect that it would be this session. He knew, from the course of what out of the record, and had seen this opportunity to open to the house, and so far as he could, to the nation, what was the system which had been pursued—in what manner the funds of the nation—trust funds—had been and continued to be employed in the present administration—continued, at all events, so long as there was an election ahead.

There was no further question which he wished to be considered; that was, to ascertain exactly how the permanent, irrevocable debt had been fastened on this nation by the present administration, the head of which and the financier of which said that they were opposed to all national debt. The secretary of the treasury had expressly said this year that the only way to get rid of the time of peace. Now, that officer was a good friend of Mr. Jefferson; and he (Mr. A.) would ask him what he thought of $15,000,000 paid for the purchase of Louisiana! He would also ask him what he thought of $3,000,000 (borrowed money) paid for the purchase of Florida? A gentleman before him (Mr. Downing) thought that he (Mr. A.) was a little pledged in that; but then it was to be considered that he had never pledged himself against a national debt. The great error of all these debts was to make a good bargain; and if an administration did that, they would not come here with their homilies about national debts. Let them tell us they were against a national debt, but let them be against the national interest; but when the national interest requires it, let the debt be contracted on the best terms, and let it be paid honestly. That was the rule of private individuals, and it was the rule of nations; and it was a rule of principle for the head and the financier of a nation to say to us against all debts in time of peace. The president told us in his message that he was against a national debt and a national bank, and that he always had been. Then he (Mr. A.) would break the law, so the president was opposed to what might be very useful to the interests of the nation.

But, more than this—there were debts of millions upon millions which had been made. All our Indian treaties—[and there was now a bill before the house, reported by the chairman of the committee of ways and means, making appropriations of six or seven hundred thousand dollars for Indian annuities;] what, he would ask, were all our Indian treaties but national debts? What were all the sums of money given to Indians for their lands? What was all this but a national debt! A sacred debt which the government was bound to pay; and if the Choctaws and the Chickasaws, and the Kiowas and many other tribes, were not extinguished, as seemed to be the policy, the government, so long as it existed, would have to pay an annual debt to them. The government had only now to provide the interest—$100,000 dollars, that was to say to a debt of ten millions, at 6 per cent. Of those $100,000 of principal—how much he knew not—but he believed at least four millions had already been invested in state stocks, exactly as this half million trust fund from the Secretary of the Navy came and told us that these state stocks were good for nothing; and yet, when some of these states came to us and said: "You ought to help us in our distress, in distress, in distress, in distress"—[as the gentleman from Florida says]—these debts are not extravagant debts—they are not for luxuries—we have not been wasting the public moneys—these are debts which, in the long run, will pay you more interest, and under the same conditions—you must take a part of them."—[The exclamation was one of horror at the idea of paying state debts.] That was the answer, and he wished gentlemen who thought this thing so horrible, to make the distinction, and let him know whether or not he had not assumed these four or five millions of debts to the states by investing the treasure of the government, and still more, the mere trust funds of the government, in state stocks, taking the boots of

He could wish to say a great deal more on this subject, but he believed he had said enough now to open it to the consideration of members. It included within itself the policy of this nation, not only in relation to its own debts, but the respectability of the several states of the union. It included the general consideration of a national debt, and, probably, of a national bank. It included the justice of this nation to all the Indian tribes, and the justice of this nation to all the states, in the sums of money, and then spent them by investing them in state stocks.

Another example occurred to him at this moment in the manner in which the government contracted debts, and actually wasted or employed the fund. In another part of this building, within a few days, some reference had been made to one of these trust funds—that belonging to the Smeena nation. About the year 1780 or 1791, the Smeena nation, and the United States was vested in the president of the United States, for the time being, for the benefit of that tribe of Indians, in perpetuity, the government being bound to pay to the tribe the annual interest of the money. The money was invested by order of general Washington, it was held by him in trust, invested in the six per cent. funds of the United States, purchased at an advance. Mr. A. was under the impression that the state that had the benefit of investment of this fund which took place from the time of general Washington to that of Mr. Madison, it had been sunk from $100,000 to $86,000. He (Mr. A.) had himself directed a purchase of 3 per cent. stock, and it was made, and when the 3 per cent. were paid off, the sum of one hundred and six thousand dollars was realized for the sum which was originally $100,000; and which was only $86,000 when he made the treasury. And that sum of $108,000 was paid into the treasury by his order. What had become of it? A few years ago, in an appropriation law, this sum of $108,000 was appropriated for the use of the treasury of the United States for that year, and the money was gone. The United States then state that he spent it. Now, what was that there was a debt contracted of which there was no sign or appearance in the president's message. The government had to pay the annual interest by appropriation; but as to the principal, that responsibility would not be free from this responsibility, so long as the Smeena nation existed as a tribe. The government had used it for its own purpose, but was responsible for it. It had been a part of the responsibility of the government.

At present, he should content himself with these observations, and he would leave it to the chairman of the committee on naval affairs to make such reply as he thought proper; but he (Mr. A.) begged that it should not break the law, so the president was opposed to what might be very useful to the interests of the nation. If there was no alternative but that he would rather pay three times the amount than give his sanction to the bill.

[This speech has not had the benefit of revision, and was taken down under the disadvantages of interruption, and, in some parts, of doubtful hearing.] Mr. Reed spoke briefly of the absolute necessity of making a law of appropriation, which, he said, in regard to the faith and honor of the government required, notwithstanding that the appropriate fund had been exhausted by an improvement law of this house. He took occasion, also, to call attention to three most important bills, in his opinion, ought not to be staved in order to get the action of the house, and which were, first, a bill to repeal, in part, the pension law, [which law, he said, trenchanted on the interests of the nation by giving both pay and pension to officers who, in his opinion, ought not to receive them]; secondly, a bill in relation to navy pensions; and thirdly, a bill in relation to pursers.—Mr. R. said he earnestly hoped that the house, at once early day, would give short space of time to the consideration of these bills.

Mr. Wier said he did not rise to oppose the bill, on the contrary, he should vote for its passage; but he wished to add a word or two to the remarks which had been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Adams]. The navy pension fund, to which this bill related, did not belong to congress, but had been raised by the exertions of the sailors themselves, and government stood to it in honor, and in duty. The fund, first established it had amounted to twelve hundred thousand dollars, and what was it now? What said the secretary of the navy, in his annual report at the present session? The navy pension fund, which at the close of the year 1837, amounted upwards of a million of dollars, the annual interest of which was sufficient to meet all demands, now consists of $100,000 in Cincinnati five per cent. stock, greatly depreciated; $14,000 of stock of the Bank of Washington, in the same state; $33,339 five per cent. stock of the city of Washington, and $11,400 of stock of the Union Bank of Georgetown, the latter totally unavailable at this time. In the letter, however, from the secretary, which was read by the clerk, there was a material error; for, in summing up the nominal value of the stocks in which the fund is now invested, he states it at $138,729, but the truth is, it does not amount even to that. The nominal value of the whole stock of the city of Cincinnati has been advertised to be sold at auction on the 13th of December, for the purpose, in the first place, of reimbursing the Bank of America the sum of fifty thousand dollars advanced to it in 1837, and the balance of the stock, to meet the payment of pension which became due on the 1st of July last. This sum, therefore, of $50,000 is to be deducted from the $138,729, leaving the real amount but $108,729, and this only at the nominal value of the stock. When, then, is the real fact? In 1837, the secretary reported that he had in this fund $1,150,000, and that the interest of that sum was sufficient to meet the regular payment of the pension charges upon it; but now he has available funds but $108,729, and of stock at its nominal value $108,729, amounting, in all, to $127,388 61. This, sir, is the whole which remains of the fund, good and bad and indifferent. How is this accounted for? The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Calhoun) has the honor to be the cause of the effect of the bill of 1837; but I have examined the table of pensions furnished to us from the department, and have taken pains to trace the actual operation of that law, and what was the result? The total number of persons entitled to the pension by that law was 479, and the usual annual appropriation for the payment of their pensions was $31,119 73. To this amount what has been added since that? Three hundred and forty-four widows, the aggregate of whose pensions amount to $62,718 74; ninety-one minors, whose pensions amount to $11,622; being, together, $74,330 47 per annum, which for three years gives us $222,990. And this is all that has been added to the fund, for the enormous deficit of $927,000, which we ought now to have had in the hands of the secretary, not in depreciated stocks, but in good money.

Here Mr. Thomas interrupted, and asked leave of Mr. Wier before he proceeded further, to correct the statement he had made, in two respects. First, as to the original constitution of the navy pension fund. It did not, as the gentleman seemed to suppose, consist of the contributions of the sailors themselves, but was a fund which was given to the gentleman from Virginia seemed to have confounded it, but of the United States shares of prize money.

Mr. Wier received this correction, and explained that he had stated the fund to have been raised by the exertions of the sailors, because it was by their bravery and enterprise that the prizes had been taken, and the prize money brought into possession of the government.

Mr. Thomas proceeded to say that the gentleman from Virginia had totally misapprehended the provisions and operation of the law of 1837. That law did not merely add new pensioners to the roll, and prescribe the annual allowance they were to receive, but it also enacted that a widow receiving pension under that act was entitled to have it reckoned from the death of her husband; and a person disabled was, in like manner, to have his pension reckoned back to the date when the disability had been incurred—thus requiring the payment of a vast amount of arrears. So large was this amount that $850,000 had been paid under that law for such arrears within a single year.

Mr. W. resumed. As to the construction put by the department on the law, I have nothing to say. I am not now speaking to that point; but as to the origin of this fund, I repeat that it is the fruit of the toil and enterprise of our gallant navy. It has been earned by their blood. They have a right to what they captured, and in the administration of this fund, the government is but their trustee; and I insist that, by a fair interpretation of the law of 1837, there ought still to be a million of dollars left of this fund. The contemplation of pensioning who, in previous understandings what he is writing about, does not state what has been told us by the gentleman from Maryland. I take his report as it is given; and it shows that the additional pensions since 1837 have cost the government, to but a little over $74,000. And yet there is this immense deficit to be accounted for. I do not either approve or find fault with the interpretation put by the department on the law; but if they have construed it so, I leave it to the wisdom of congress to amend it to its true meaning. It is their fault, not ours.

There were many other remarks which I have intended to submit, but which have been anticipated, and much better explained, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I pay myself a high compliment when I say that, in a great portion of his speech, he pursued this very track which I had marked out for myself.

As to the investments which have been made of this fund, on which that gentleman commented with so much severity, it is possible that some of them were made b-fore the present administration came into power; but the $740,000 of this fund were certainly purchased since 1837; and the report made this year by the commissioner of pensions confirms (a thing that does not always happen by the) the report of last year. And what does it show? That the rate of $20,000 at the rate of 62 1/2 per cent; $25,000 at the rate of 63; $10,000 at 62 1/2; $10,000 at 62 1/2; and $5,000 at 62 1/2. Thus was the amount of $70,000 in a great measure thrown away. It will not do to tell us that the law of 1837 was unavailing, for the commissioner adds that, since December last, 21,400 dollars in Washington city corporation five per cent. stock have been sold at auction for the purpose of paying pensions—no doubt at a sacrifice, but the rate is not stated. He tells us that, to pay these pensions now on the roll, at least $100,000 will be wanted in 1841; and this sum added to the debt due the Bank of America will make $160,000. Ten thousand dollars will be required the ensuing year to meet demands that the office renewal of making an aggregate of $170,000 which will be wanted in 1841.

Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, (chairman of the committee on naval affairs,) then arose, and to suffer this bill to pass without any comment on his part, for he had not felt himself called upon to reply to the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts on the general policy of the administration, particularly as he, as well as the honorable gentleman from Virginia who had just resumed his seat, had commenced their speeches by declaring that it was their purpose to vote for the bill. It was anxious to have it pass the house this year and go to the senate, that the renewal of this fund might be saved, and the demands of the government to pay the existing pensions might be met in time; (for which purpose $150,000 would be wanted on the 1st of January next). But he would not sit still and hear the extraordinary charges advanced against the secretary of the navy without making some reply. If there ever was an officer of government whose conduct was not only unworthy of blame, but deserved the highest praise and felicity, the secretary was that officer. No sooner did he find himself in office, than his attention was immediately turned to this pension law of 1837; and at the very next session he sailed not in war congress that it was his duty to see that it stood as the navy pension fund would shortly be absorbed in its application to an object for which that fund had never been originally created. In the senate, this warning took effect, and the law was repealed; but the law of repeal was lost in the house, why Mr. T. could not say. They all knew how time was often wasted in that body by irrelevant and latitudinous discussion. He did not find fault with this, because he believed that, upon the whole, this country was better off by the loss of the house, and the bill reported a bill to put a stop to this waste and misapplication of the fund, but it never had been acted upon. Thus much on the delay which had taken place. In the course of the operation of the law of 1837. He wished the house to see whether the fund had not been exhausted through the legitimate interpretation of that law. The gentleman from Virginia had fallen into most strange mistakes in his apprehension of the subject; to confound which it would be only necessary to look at the law. (Mr. T. here quoted the act of 1837). From this it appeared that there were two classes of pensioners contemplated, 1, the widows and children of officers, seamen, or marines who had died in the public service; and 2, persons who had been personally disabled by wounds or injuries received in such service. In both cases the law was not prospective merely, but retrospective also; it not only gave pensions to the families of those who died, but the pension should be reckoned back to the death of the officer, seaman or marine, and to the date of the disability incurred. In this manner there had been paid, in 1837, to 12,000 widows and children, $120,000, to 35 widows the sum of $121,000, and to 129 children $129,000.

Here was a gross sum of $329,000 paid as arrears, besides the annual pensions which were to be paid.

Mr. W. here explained, and insisted that, even according to Mr. T.'s own showing, there ought to be a large balance still left in the hands of the department.

The gentleman said that he had only stated the result as it stood (if the reporter correctly understood him) in 1837; (he must be remembered that the law had continued to operate in the same manner ever since).

Mr. W. again interposed, and referred to a report which stated the gross amount of arrears at about $340,000; and inquired how much it had been since increased?

Mr. T. here held it in his hand an account from the department, stating the amount thus paid at over $594,000, all the particulars were given.

Mr. W. According to that, there ought to be on hand balances at all left, but the secretary reports a balance of $1,000,000.

Mr. Thomas said there was about $108,000 left still. But whence did this law which had led to such a result emanate? Who authorized this application of the pension fund? It was not the secretary of the navy or the commissioner of pensions, but the two houses of congress. Who were the authors of the bill? It had been reported to the senate by the honorable Mr. Robinson, of Illinois, and sent to the committee on naval affairs, of which Mr. Southard was a member, and he had reported the bill to the senate, by whom it had been passed without a division. The senate bill coming into the house had been referred to the committee on naval affairs in the house. Mr. T. read the name of this committee among which that of Mr. W. was one. The bill had been ordered to its third reading without a division, and passed by the house without amendment.

Mr. T. then explained, stating that, though his name appeared on the naval committee, he was not responsible for the bill. He was at that time but nominally one of the committee—his attention was directed elsewhere—he had other fish to fry—and could no longer attend in the business of that committee, (of which he had previously been an active member), being appointed on another which occupied his time and thoughts.

Mr. Thomas had not the least suspicion as to that gentleman's course in relation to the bill. The responsibility rested on the whole house. Congress passed the law, and order the secretary to administer it. That officer had warned them how it would operate and was operating. And was he then to be held responsible for carrying out an act which was the law of the land?

Mr. Reed (also a member of the naval committee) here made some explanation which was totally inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. Thomas then resumed, observed that he concurred fully with such part of the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams], as related to the policy of leaving in the hands of the department the discretionary power of buying and selling on public stock, and of any description. He had raised his feeble voice against such a practice many years ago. But while the authority remained, he trusted that parties accused, as the secretary of the navy had been, would be tried by the law as it stood. That, if he had for his acts the express authority of law, he would be acquitted. And if such authority were in itself wrong, congress would withdraw it, but not unjustly charge the fault of the law on the officer who executed it. Nor would the navy pension fund originated from prize money taken in time of war, and as the United States had had neither war nor prizes for some years, he referred that, the secretary would violate the law by selling the fund in the hands of the hands, the investment of it in stock had been made some fifteen years ago.

Mr. Adams here interposed to say that those investments had all taken place since 1837, and ever before.

Mr. Thomas, resuming, said that he referred to the capital of the fund. It was the interest which had been invested; and in thus vesting it the secretary had but followed the course of his predecessors. The law itself provided that the secretary must invest the interest of the fund in any way he thought best. (Mr. T. here quoted the law). The present secretary could, however, have had but a small sum to invest in any way he thought best. He had been already made or not. Mr. T. would now express an opinion; he rather supposed, however, that it would be admitted to be better to place the money in state stocks, rather than in those of any private individual. He would not, however, in congress, in not laying down a rule specifying in what stock the interest of this fund should be invested. As to the sale of the stocks which had been purchased, it was an operation indispensable to meet the engagements of the navy. He would not, however, in conclusion, that he had not attempted to go into a reply to the speech of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Adams), nor did he feel bound to do so. He was not in the same position as the gentleman who had just made a speech prepared for delivery at the former session.

Mr. Adams said that his attention had been drawn to this subject at the last session of congress, and to him it appeared perfectly simple. The law passed in 1837, and he had been a constituent, by means of which the navy pension fund had been almost entirely absorbed, in a manner never contemplated or intended when the fund was created. This was an operation over which he was deeply concerned, and which he could not go over. Under this state of things, the manifest duty of congress was to replace the money; to repeal the law of 1837, and in the meanwhile to acknowledge the debt and pay the interest until it was paid. This was his opinion, and he would not, however, in congress, be adopted, the pensioners must come down to the means of the government, whatever they happened to be. This, he held, congress had not the moral right to do as the representatives of a moral and free people. He trusted they would not attempt such a piece of injustice, but would in this matter, as in all others, act as the honest representatives of an honest and an honorable people.

Mr. Anderson, of Maine, next addressed the house, but as he spoke in a low tone of voice, and turned his back to the reporters scarcely a word of what he said could be distinctly heard by them; a thing the more to be regretted as Mr. A. very rarely addresses the house. He was in preparation to effect the interests of fact, and to show how far the actual operation of the law of 1837 was from the intentions and anticipations of congress in its passage, in distributing large amounts of the public money to individuals already in affluent circumstances.

Mr. C. Shepard, of North Carolina, offered the following as an amendment to the bill:

Sec. 2 And be it further enacted, That the act of March 3, 1837, entitled "An act for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund," be repealed.

Mr. Thomas remonstrated, and expressed his earnest hope that his colleagues on the committee would not persist in pressing this amendment. The committee had been in preparation to effect the object he aimed at; but the present bill had been introduced simply with a view to prevent the sacrifice of certain stock in which the interest of the fund had been invested. Should the amendment be appended thereto, it would be a sacrifice of the fund to the object of discussion, and to such delay as would defeat the object intended.

But Mr. Shepard persisted in offering his amendment. He insisted that nothing could be brought before the house without being the subject of party question; nothing, it seemed, could get the attention of the house, unless some public individual was to be hunted down. He should not follow gentlemen in their remarks on the course of the secretary of the navy. They had been satisfactorily answered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Thomas]. He would call the house to the real question before it. The navy pension fund had originated in 1790—being formed out of the United States prize money earned by our gallant navy. Its sole object was the relief of those who had been injured in the public service. In all the successive laws which had been passed in relation to it, one pervading feature was to be found, viz: that none were to receive the benefit of the fund but those who had suffered for their country. That spirit was the basis of the law. It had been introduced; for its introduction some blamed one of the great political parties, and others blamed the other. To whom the blame justly belonged was now immaterial; the law had passed, and it provided that these naval pensions were to be paid not to those who had suffered in the service and defence of their country, but to the widows and children of those who might, at any previous time, have died in the service, who her they had suffered or not. And it also provided that, when pensions were paid to invalids, or persons who had incurred disability, the pension should be reckoned back to the date of the disability, as well as forward from the date of the act. The fund was to be much larger than was actually needed for such applications. It was originally been contemplated, and the interest arising from it amounted to a large sum annually. Government was pledged to keep it as a sacred fund for the maintenance of the navy of this country; but the law which had been hastily passed, operated to divert the fund into a different channel, and to sweep almost the whole of it away. The question arising from such a state of things was, whether it was not now time to stop, and to amend a law having such an operation? He thought it was. It had been said that this application of the fund was a sacred debt; Mr. S. contended that, in reference to the persons who had incurred it, it was not, but a mere gratuity. Had they done or suffered anything for the country? Not at all. Did it appear that their parents had suffered any thing? No. They had died in the service; that was all. Where, then, was the justice in paying such pensions? And how was that to be paid? There was no quid pro quo? He thought that this was the time to shut the gate, before the flood of applicants should sweep away the little remnant of the fund that still remained. As the bill was passed, he thought that the minds of our gentlemen were already made up on the subject, he would forbear further remarks. He hoped the amendment would prevail.

Mr. Reed, of Massachusetts, said that, since the law of 1837 had been passed, and it had been alluded to as having been one of the members of the naval committee who reported it to the house, it might be proper for him to state that he had opposed the bill, and had warned the house at the time what its effect would be. He had done this even before that when the principle was introduced in the bill for the relief of Mrs. Deatur. That bill had passed the house, but Mr. R. had strongly opposed it, on principle. As to the law of 1837, it passed with little deliberation, in a hasty, inconsiderate manner; but before the house undertook to repeal it, the bill ought to be examined with deliberation. It had been passed rashly and hastily, and now it seemed the house was asked to repeal it in haste. Mr. R. had been ready to vote for the repeal over twenty years ago, but he was not willing to repeal it in this form; it was an improper mode; and, therefore, he hoped the amendment would not pass, but that the committee would take up the original bill and modify it, and then report it to the house in a new shape; but let it not be repealed at a blow, in this hasty manner.

Mr. Tillamach said he was in favor of the bill before the house, and should vote for it. When the bill was introduced, the whole house seemed agreed; nobody disputed that the existing defect in the navy pension fund must be provided for. But it was a very different question how much of the law of 1837 was proper to repeal. He had no objection to it on many good and important reasons, and it was cherished in the feelings of many; he trusted it would not, at one stroke, be abolished, and no substitute provided; he hoped this would not be attempted in the shape of a rider to the present bill. He could not believe that any friend of the navy would be found advocating such a measure in such a form.

Mr. Peck said he was a friend to the bill before the house, and, as such, would move the previous question.

The motion was seconded, put, and carried, the amendment adopted, and the bill forthwith passed, and sent to the senate.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—24 SESSION. SENATE.

January 6. The vice president laid before the senate a message made in compliance with a resolution of the 34th instant.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Wright, from the pilots of New York in the neighborhood of Hell Gate, praying a repeal of the law of 1837 relating to pilots.

By Mr. Phelps, resolutions of the state of Vermont favorable to such amendment of the constitution as will restrict the president from being eligible to a second term.

A number of memorials signed by a great number of the merchants and citizens of Philadelphia, praying that the spirit ration may be abolished in the navy, and tea, coffee, or other small stores substituted therefor.

By Mr. Southard, from 320 citizens of Newark, in New Jersey, praying the passage of a general and uniform bankrupt law.

By Mr. Nicholas, from the chamber of commerce of New Orleans, asking the enactment of a uniform bankrupt law.

On motions by Mr. Linn and Mr. Anderson, papers were taken from files relating to private claims and again referred.

Mr. Wall, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States.

Mr. Sturgeon, introduced, on leave, a bill making certain appropriations for the patent office, twice referred.

Mr. Nicholas, introduced on leave, a bill to authorize the issuing of patents for certain entries of public lands; twice read and referred.

The bill for the benefit of the Howard institution of Washington was considered in committee of the whole; and after some debate, in which the bill was advocated by Messrs. Merrick, Walker and others, and opposed by Messrs. Tappan and Hubbard, it was ordered to be engrossed by a vote of 29 to 7.

The senate then proceeded to take up the special order—the bill for a permanent prospective pre-emption system; when Mr. Clay, of Kentucky, rose and addressed the senate at length against the bill, and followed by Mr. Wright and Mr. Linn in its support.

January 7. The vice president laid before the senate a message from the president of the United States in compliance with a resolution of the senate, relating to a report of the secretary of war, showing the number of soldiers antedated during the late war that are entitled to bounty lands.

Also, from the secretary of the treasury, in compliance with a resolution of the 4th instant, transmitting information relative to the payment of a certain claim said to be due to the commissioners appointed for the settlement of the Yazoo claims.

Also, from the post office department, transmitting, in obedience to law, a statement showing the names and compensation of the clerks in that department.

Also, from the secretary of the treasury, a statement from the banks of the District of Columbia, showing the condition of their affairs on the 1st of January.

Petitions were presented and referred.

Mr. Wright, from the committee on finance, reported a bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to extend further indulgence to certain debtors.

Also, making an unfavorable report on the petition of the sufferers at Natchez by the late tornado.

A number of bills of a private and local character were also introduced.

On motion of Mr. Tappan.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate, as early as possible, in a detailed and full form, all the information in the possession of his department in answer to the following questions:

1st. What amount has the federal government lost, since the time when the banks were suspended, by the use of bank paper, or by its connection in any way with banks, including the depreciation of bank paper?

2d. What amount the people of the United States have lost, from the commencement of the government to this time, by the failure and suspension of banks and the circulation of bank paper, by the loss and destruction of bank notes, and by the existence of banks and the use of bank paper generally?

3d. What have the people and the government paid, directly or indirectly, to the aggregate banks of the United States, for the use of these institutions, annually, for the last ten years?

4th. What portion of the stock of the several banks in the United States is at this time owned by foreigners?

The bill for the benefit of the Howard institute, was read the third time and passed.

Several bills of a private and local nature were considered in committee, and ordered to be engrossed.

The prospective pre-emption bill was taken up as the special order, when Mr. Huntington rose and addressed the senate at some length against the bill, as did Mr. Johnson and Mr. Preston. Mr. Hubbard and Mr. Young followed in its support.

At about 4 o'clock, the senate adjourned.

January 8. The vice president laid before the senate a letter from the treasury department, transmitting a report from the commissioners of a general land office, in relation to the public lands.

Also, from the war department, showing the expenditures of the contingent fund of the military establishment for the year 1840.

Also, from the general land office, memorials of the legislative council of that territory, asking appropriations for the erection of a penitentiary and making military roads.

Mr. Roberts, senator elect from Illinois, after the 4th March next; which were placed on file.

Memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred, and a number of reports from committees made, which will be noticed in their progress.

Mr. Linn, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for the protection and settlement of Oregon, and to extend the laws of the United States over its same.

Mr. C. on Mr. Linn's introduction of the bill, made some remarks explanatory of the causes which induced him to offer it to the consideration of the senate, and went at some length into the history of the settlement of Oregon, and the encroachments made on it by British traders.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, viz: the bill to establish a permanent and prospective pre-emption system; when Mr. Johnson rose and addressed the senate at length in support of the bill.

Mr. Mangum, wishing to address the senate on the bill, proposed to its friends to postpone its further consideration to Monday, when he promised them his aid, in the question upon ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. Linn made a few remarks in reply to one part of what had been said yesterday by Mr. Preston. The gentleman had expressed an opinion that the application of the law of 1837, in regard to danger on our western frontier from incursions of the Indians were without foundation, inasmuch as it was much more likely that those wild savages would attempt to molest our settlements on the prairies and among the mountains and Caddos than make assaults upon the dense settlements of the whites, where they could expect only an armed resistance. It would be sufficient to take off the force of a rivulet, or to state that the Indians had already made three successive attacks on the white settlements; how many more they might attempt, it was not for him to say.

Mr. Preston explained. He had not said that there was no danger on the frontier—he knew that danger did exist; but he apprehended it had been sufficiently provided for by the establishment of military posts, the raising of regiments, &c. He still thought that, ultimately, the Indians would find it easier to go westward, but he did not insist upon the argument.

Some conversation took place about postponing the bill to the following day. Mr. Crittenden said that he could, on certain conditions, consent to a pre-emption bill; and, as the best mode of settling what they were, he would ask leave to read a motion, for recommitment of the bill with instructions, which he had the honor to read, and then to offer at the proper time. Mr. C. then read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the committee that reported it, with instructions to report amendments therein to the following effect:

1st. To distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several states of the union in just and equitable proportions.

2d. To prohibit any side settlers upon the public lands the right of pre-emption to any quantity thereof not exceeding one-half section, or 320 acres, the land to be sold, at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, with such provisions as shall limit the right of settlement and pre-emption to actual bona fide settlers whose estate at the time of settlement shall not exceed 160 acres.

3d. To prohibit any speculators from interfering with, or participating in, the privilege of settlement, and to provide that speculators who are hereby granted and intended for the sole advantage of the needy and honest settlers and cultivators.

Mr. C. wished the motion to lie over for the present and the instructions to be printed.

Mr. Linn gave notice that, should this motion be pressed, he should move to amend the instruction of such department, or any officer thereof, touching such claim; the answer to which shall be reported with said bill."

The following bills were severally considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed:

A bill to authorize the legislature of the state of Arkansas to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of soldiers to be engaged in the war.

A bill to perfect the titles to lands sold to the Arkansas river, held under New Madrid locations and pre-emption rights, under the act of 1814.

A bill in addition to an act to promote the progress of the use of arms.

A joint resolution to authorize the secretary of the treasury to extend further indulgence to certain deposit banks.

A number of relief bills were also considered in committee and ordered to be engrossed.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, the bill relating to the permanent and prospective pre-emption system, when Mr. Calhoun rose and addressed the senate at length in favor of his substitute for the amendment of Mr. Crittenden.

Mr. Crittenden followed, and was replied to by Mr. Benton, when, at a late hour, the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, Jan. 6. Mr. Jones, of Virginia, from the committee of ways and means reported a bill making appropriations for the support of the army for the year 1841; which was twice read and referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and with the accompanying documents ordered to be printed.

Petitions were presented by Messrs. Chiles, Radford and Griswold.

Mr. Fillmore asked leave to introduce a bill "to regulate the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections and for other purposes," which was referred to the committee on elections and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Davis, of Indiana, presented an amendment which he should offer to a bill for the support of the army, and moved it be printed; which was carried. Mr. Chiles gave notice of a bill in relation to Louisiana that he would ask leave to introduce at some future day.

Mr. Thompson, of Miss. according to previous notice, asked leave to introduce a bill in relation to the Choctaw Indians; which was referred to the committee on Indian affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Leonard, from the committee on the public buildings, which was instructed to inquire whether the falling of the chandelier in the hall of the house was caused by a defect in the workmanship and construction; and whether any money had been paid for it, and if not, whether any ought to be paid, made a report upon the subject. The committee enter into a full account of the making of the contract, its terms and conditions, and express their opinion that its provisions have been fully complied with by the contractors; and that they consider the falling of the chandelier "as one of those casual accidents incident to all material things, and which, like almost every one that occurs, it is so easy to see how it might have been avoided when too late."

It appears that the utmost caution was used to submit the materials to any employer who might be suspended, and no effort was spared to give assurance of its safety. The committee report that no money has been paid to the contractors; that the remaining materials are valued at $400, which the contractors are willing to take back. In full view of all the circumstances, the committee come to the conclusion to recommend a strict compliance with the contract, by directing the clerk to pay over to Messrs. Hooper & Co. the contractors, such balance as may be coming to them, after deducting the $300 for the broken materials.

The report was read, when, on motion of Mr. Briggs, it was concurred in; and so the clerk was directed to pay for the chandelier according to contract, deducting $300 from the amount, and to give up the fragments to the contractors.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson moved a suspension of the rules that he might report a bill providing for the relief of the lunatics of the District of Columbia. He was sure that the house would not be five minutes in the consideration of it. He moved that the house go into a committee of the whole on the consideration of the bill.

Mr. Catary Morris hoped that the house would consent at once to take up this bill. He was satisfied, after having visited the prison where they were confined, that the subject demanded the immediate attention of the house, and of every benevolent individual.

The question on the suspension of the rules was then put and carried—whereon, the house resolved itself into a committee of the whole, (Mr. Fillmore, of N. C. presiding,) and took up the bill.

Mr. Cushing asked for information on the subject, which was given by Mr. W. C. Johnson.

Mr. Hubbard moved an amendment to the bill, that the expense of the lunatics be charged on the city, in the proportion in which those paupers were located. It was properly a subject which should be left alone on the local authorities. That the house was not organized for the purpose of regulating the poor house to the District of Columbia. If the provisions of the bill were carried out, the paupers of all the states would flock in here, and we should have notional paupers. Mr. Johnson observed that the bill provided for lunatics. Mr. Hubbard said there was no difference, but the means by which they raised their support was the same. Mr. Johnson thought the amendment very necessary. That the city of Washington ought to remove their lunatics to Baltimore, without coming to congress to ask leave.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson said that the states provided for their lunatics. Congress was the local legislature of the District—will you not even act the part of the states. The expenses would be incurred by the city. He hoped that congress would not act on a principle different from that applied by the states. He hoped the gentleman would withdraw his amendment; and if not, that the house would reject it.

Mr. Davis said at some length. He was in favor of the bill without the amendment.

Mr. Hubbard said that the states did not support all their lunatics; pauper lunatics were the proper charge on the states.

Mr. Thompson moved an amendment that the bill might read lunatic paupers.

Mr. Vandeventer suggested to the gentleman from Maryland the propriety of another amendment confining the bill to the lunatics who had a residence in the District. The amendments were those except that offered by Mr. Thomas, and the bill was reported to the house.

Mr. Hubbard moved to lay the whole subject on the table; the vote on which was taken by yeas and nays, and the motion lost; yeas 53, nays 10.

The bill was then read the third time, and the vote called on the final passage of the bill.

Mr. Cure Johnson said it authorized congress to take on itself the lunatic paupers of this District—in the District. The amendments were those except that offered by Mr. Thomas, and the bill was reported to the house.

Mr. Davis noticed an inconsistency between the title of the bill and its provisions. The bill was entitled "a bill for temporary relief," whereas its provisions were permanent in every sense of the word.

Mr. W. C. Johnson had no objection to changing its title. He said that the committee regarded it as temporary, proposing that the lunatics be confined in an asylum which they erected. Their object was economy—that congress was unwilling to build an asylum at present.

Mr. Garland inquired whether there had not acts passed heretofore of a similar character. Mr. W. C. Johnson replied that there had not to his knowledge.

Mr. Fillmore said it was an imperfect bill. He moved to recommit the bill that he might have an opportunity to offer an amendment to be reconsidered; and thus calling on the city heretofore to make provisions for its lunatics—instead of depending on a permanent provision by congress.

Mr. Peck desired that the gentleman would consent to the recommitment. He could not vote for it in this shape; was exceedingly desirous to. He favored a limitation of the bill.

Mr. Wm. Cost Johnson moved the previous question.

The main question on the passage of the bill was then taken and negatived; yeas 72, nays 82.

Mr. Fillmore then moved the reconsideration of the vote just taken on the passage of the bill, for the purpose of recommitting and so amending it that lunatics and many other of its friends might vote for it.

After remarks from several members, the orders of the day were then moved by Mr. Cure Johnson, and the house resumed the consideration of the Pennsylvania contest election.

Mr. Ingersoll resumed his argument from yesterday, in support of his right to the seat now held by Mr. Taylor, and concluded at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Taylor then rose and addressed the house, but gave way to a general call for adjournment.

Whereupon, a motion to that effect having prevailed, the house adjourned.

Thursday, Jan. 7. The speaker having announced the business before the house for the day of the contested election from the state of Pennsylvania, between Messrs. Taylor and Ingersoll. And Mr. Taylor being entitled to the floor—Mr. Fillmore rose (at the request, he was understood to say, of Mr. Taylor), and moved that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow morning. He (Mr. F.) understood that Mr. Taylor was very much out of health, and that he desired, in favor, that a postponement might take place. Mr. Fillmore said he was not at all in a hurry, and would be fixed upon. It was private bill day and ought not, in the present state of the calendar, to be given up to other purposes.

Mr. Fillmore said he would then, at the request of many gentlemen around him, propose Mr. Monday next. Mr. Wm. thought that, before a day was fixed, the house should ascertain the disposition of Mr. Taylor himself. Mr. Taylor then rose and said a few words, of another day, and not to-morrow, by the reporter beyond the statement of the fact that he had suffered severely all night, and (as he was understood) that Monday would be agreeable to him.

Mr. Vandeventer inquired of the speaker whether the subject would come up as a privileged question. The speaker replied in the affirmative. And, the question having been taken, the further consideration of the subject was postponed until Monday next.

The motion of Mr. Fillmore, to reconsider the vote of yesterday, rejecting the bill to make temporary provision for lunatics in the District of Columbia, came up, in order, for consideration.

Mr. Reed said that the reporter of the Globe had misstated him as to two or three things. He was reported to have said that the ward of the District had an annual salary of ten thousand dollars and the persons in jail were in the most wretched condition. I said (observed Mr. R.) that the income or emoluments of the office of marshal of the District were said to be ten thousand dollars, and that it was said that the persons in jail were in a most wretched condition, and (said Mr. R.) I believe it. The income or emoluments of office arise from fees and the profits of boarding prisoners for about $2 a week.

I hope (said Mr. R.) that the motion will prevail, and that the vote rejecting the bill may be reconsidered, I feel bound, as an act of justice and humanity, to make provision for the poor lunatics in this District. They do assemble here, for various causes, from all parts of the country.—They are in a miserable and wretched condition.—Humanity demands relief for them. This District ought not in justice they are not able in fact, to bear the tax of supporting these lunatics; I am therefore in favor of supporting these rational lunatics from the national treasury.

Mr. Tillgham suggested that what seemed to him to be required was a verbal change in the phraseology of the bill, by inserting the word "paupers" in the last as well as in the former part.

He thought, also, that the bill should contain a provision limiting its operation to the lunatics who might have been inhabitants of the District of Columbia. His motive yesterday in asking for a withdrawal of the previous question was, that he might suggest these alterations, as he could not vote for the bill in the form in which it then stood. He was in favor of the proposition, such an alteration was made in the phraseology as would carry out the real objects which it was intended to accomplish.

The previous question was moved by Mr. Martin, and demanded, put and carried.

The gentleman then moved the reconsideration was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative, as follows: yeas 93, nays 62.

The reconsideration being carried—Mr. Fillmore moved that the bill be recommitted to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union, for the purpose of amendment.

Mr. Jameson moved that it be recommitted to the committee for the District of Columbia.

The question was first put on committing to the committee of the whole on the state of the union, and carried; yeas 85, nays not counted.

Mr. Fillmore then moved that the rule be suspended so as to go immediately into committee of the whole on the bill; carried; yeas 57, nays 57.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, (Mr. Lincoln in the chair).

The bill was then read by the clerk.

Mr. Fillmore moved to add the following section: "That any person who shall be confined in force until the 1st day of March, 1843, and no longer."

Mr. Peck moved further to amend so as to continue the operation of the bill to pauper lunatics of the District of Columbia whose support is legally chargeable thereto; this was also agreed to.

The bill was opposed, at considerable length by Messrs. Hand and Hubbard; who were replied to, and the passage of the bill advocated by Messrs. W. Thompson, W. C. Johnson, Dawson, Briggs, Monroe and Alford;—when, on motion of Mr. Fillmore, the committee rose and reported the bill with the two amendments, they were concurred in, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

It was then read the third time, and the question on its passage was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative, yeas 110, nays 59. So the bill was passed.

The speaker laid before the house the following communications, viz:

1. A letter from the treasurer of the United States, Mr. Seiden, transmitting his quarterly accounts for the service of the post office department for the years 1837, 1838 and 1839, each year ending on the 30th June.

The letter of the treasurer states that the balance to his credit for the use of the post office department in the last deposit bank is $22,844—of that amount, $22,227 is in the Bank of the Metropolis, and detained by the bank in satisfaction of certain alleged claims against the post office department. The balance in his hands and in the hands of sub-treasurers belonging to the department is $18,281. Referred to the committee on expenditures in the post office department.

2. A letter from the secretary of the treasury, transmitting the annual statements showing the condition of the several banks of the District of Columbia. Laid on the table.

3. A letter from the secretary of the navy, with a printed copy of the Naval Register for 1841, for each member.

A letter from the postmaster general, accompanied by a list of the clerks employed in his department in the year 1840, with the pay of each. There were 59 clerks—the salary of each clerk named, but the aggregate amount paid during the year is not given. Laid on the table.

4. A letter from the postmaster general, accompanied with a list of regular and temporary agents employed by the post office department, with the amount paid to each from July 1, 1839, to November 30, 1840.

The regular agents are Arthur Benson, Howard Kennedy, Wm. Tanner, C. G. McIlhenny, James Brown, Alvin Haynes, George Pitt, at a regular salary of $1,600 each, with John A. Grosvenor, John P. Robinson, substante, and other expenses, about equal in the aggregate, to the regular salary.

The temporary agents were John Manon, John A. Webber, Thomas J. Boyd, Charles H. Kirk, Samuel Fry, B. H. Hathaway, Thos. A. Grosvenor, A. J. Comstock, Lemuel M. Barker, J. Vassant, S. Doubleday; the nature of the special service is stated, together with the compensation given; which, in general, are small sums. Referred to the committee on expenditures in the post office department.

5. A letter from the governor of the territory of Iowa, enclosing three memorials; one for post routes; one for an appropriation for a penitentiary; the other for a military road from Bloomington to Iowa city, then to intersect the road from Dubuque to the Missouri line.

Sundry bills heretofore received from the senate severally received their first and second readings, and were referred to the committee to be more particularly noticed in their progress.

Mr. Cushing made an intellectual attempt to go into committee of the whole on the bill to provide for the satisfaction of claims of certain American citizens for spoliation committed on their commerce prior to 3d July, 1801.

Mr. Curtis, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill authorizing and providing for the purchase of a lot of land adjoining the custom house in New York,—which was twice read and referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Monroe, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill to found a military asylum for the relief and support of invalid soldiers of the army of the United States; committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. M. moved to print an extra number of copies of the bill and report which accompanied it; which motion lies over under the rule.

A number of other reports were made on private and local matters and several committees discharging their duties. The report of the committee on petitions and memorials which had been erroneously referred, and they were committed to appropriate committees.

Mr. Durin, of Indiana, moved an adjournment, which was carried, and the house adjourned.

Friday, Jan. 8. Mr. Everett asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on revolutionary pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing for the term of five years the pensions allowed under the act granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows, passed July 7, 1783.

Mr. Peck thought the subject was already before the house in the shape of a bill; at least, the committee had directed the chairman to report a bill, which he thought embraced all that was contemplated by the resolution.

Mr. Everett asserted that a bill had been reported which, upon explanation, was found not to embrace the provisions contemplated by the resolution of Mr. Everett.

The introduction of the resolution was objected to. Mr. Everett moved a suspension of the rule, and called for the yeas and nays.

After explanatory remarks from Mr. Peck, Mr. Tullafier, Mr. Hand and Mr. Galbreith, the question on suspending the rule was put—yeas 99, nays 58. There not being two-thirds, the rule was not suspended.

Mr. Casey, from the committee on the public lands, to which was referred the bill from the senate to authorize the inhabitants of township 8 north, range 22 east, in the state of Arkansas, to enter a section of land in lieu of the 16th section, upon condition that the same is surrendered to the United States for military purposes, reported that the bill ought not to pass. It was then committed to the committee of the whole house to-morrow.

Mr. Underwood, from the select committee on the explosion of steam boilers, made the following report:

The select committee to whom was referred the petition of John Coates and others, relating to steamboat disasters and the means of prevention, and likewise the report and bills submitted to the house at the last session by the select committee to whom the petition of Samuel Rash relative to his self-acting safety valve was referred, report: That they have adopted the report and bills submitted by the select committee during the last session, and herewith present the same, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the bills herewith presented shall be considered on the day of _____, and made the special order on that and each succeeding day until the bills are disposed of."

The bills are the following:

A bill to authorize the president to employ persons to construct apparatus with a view to extinguish fires on board steamboats, and to test its utility.

A bill to provide for purchasing the patent for Raub's self-acting safety valve;

A bill to amend the act to provide for the better security of the lives of prisoners on board vessels propelled by whole or in part by steam, approved July 7, 1839, and for other purposes.

The bills were severally committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union. The question then came up on the resolution to make them a special order.

Mr. Cushing suggested the propriety of appointing a distant day for filing the bill in the resolution reported by the committee for a special order on these bills.

After some remarks from Messrs. Cushing, Underwood and Jones, of Virginia, as to the day for filing the bill, it was filled with Monday next two weeks, (the 25th instant), and the resolution was then adopted. Tuesday the 12th instant the bill was made the special order of the day for Monday, the 25th inst.

Petitions were presented, on leave, by Messrs. Grinnell, W. C. Johnson, Mallory, of Virginia, Forrester, Brackridge, Weller, C. H. Williams, Tolson, Stearns, Salladell and Stearns.

Mr. Barnard inquired of the chair, how much of the morning remained?

The speaker answered about 20 minutes.

Mr. Barnard then said that, as this was private business, and the contested election would come on again on Monday, he would waive his right to go on with his speech on his resolutions upon the subject of the finances till Tuesday next.

This was assented to, and so the subject is postponed till Tuesday the 12th instant.

Mr. Crabb obtained leave to introduce the following resolution, which was read and adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the judiciary be instructed to inquire and report whether it be legal for the officers of the supreme court of the United States to reside out of the limits of the circuit to which they are respectively assigned; and if it is legal so to reside, to make such an expediency of prohibiting, by statute such residence.

Mr. Curtis, from the committee on commerce reported a bill to authorize the enrolment or registration of American Amistad; which was read the first and second time.

Mr. C. moved the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and explained the necessity of its speedy passage.

Mr. Pickens objected, and gave his reasons.

Mr. Curtis further explained, and moved a suspension of the rules, so as to put the bill on its passage. The question was put, and the rules were suspended.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

Mr. Winthrop obtained leave to offer the following resolution, which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the same provision for the payment of the arrears of their salaries as is made for the arrears of the salaries of the clerks in the custom houses at New York and Philadelphia.

Mr. Salladell obtained leave to offer the following resolution, which was read and agreed to:

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be directed to communicate to this house what amount of money was received by the United States under the act of June 25, 1812, and the act of February 13, 1813, providing that two per cent. of the net amount of prize money arising from captures made by the private armaments of the United States be applied to a pension fund, as set forth in said act; also, to report whether the same, or any, and what part thereof was invested, and if so, in what stocks or securities, and at what price; the annual investments, and also the sales thereof were made. And also to report when the said pension fund became exhausted, and how much of the same, or of the proceeds of the raising thereof, was paid to persons other than those for whose use the fund was pledged by the said acts, and under and by virtue of subsequent acts.

Mr. Thompson, of South Carolina, obtained leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the navy be required to communicate to this house the proceedings of the naval council, managed for the purchase of Commodore Joseph Smoot, Messrs. Joseph Stallings and J. C. Sharpe.

Mr. Kemble moved to amend the resolution by adding the following: "Also copies of the general order in the cases of Lieuts. Sharpe and Stallings, exhibiting the reasons for confirming the decision of the court martial in the one case, and modifying it in the other."

The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as thus amended, was adopted.

At the request of Mr. Stanley, the bill to pay over to the states the fourth instalment under the deposit act was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Turney said, as this was the 8th of January, he would move that the house adjourn.

Mr. Stanley said the 8th of January was a very good day to do something for the widows and orphans, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The question was taken, and there appeared—yeas 19, nays 163.

Mr. Stanley congratulated the house that the days of glorification are passed. I hope now, sir, we can proceed, and attend to private claims demanding our attention. Mr. S. then moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on private bills, which was agreed to. And the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on private bills, [Mr. Briggs in the chair.] When several private bills were disposed of, and the house, on motion of Mr. Core Johnson adjourned at half past 12 o'clock.

Saturday, Jan. 9. Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, and Mr. Hyman, of North Carolina, appeared to-day for the first time this present session.

Mr. Lincoln, by leave, introduced a resolution, which, at the request of the absent members, he modified, and, as modified, it was adopted, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to furnish this house a statement of the quantity of public land claimed to be purchased by pre-emption under the several acts of congress granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, distinguishing between those under act of Congress passed June 13, 1835, entitled "an act granting pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," and also under an act supplemental to the act aforesaid, passed on the 1st day of June, 1840, and of the amount of money received into the treasury from this respective land offices in the several land districts in which the public lands are situated. And also to report the number of persons who have duly and legally made entries of the same, and paid the purchase money therefor, are superseded by reason of the operation of the aforesaid act, and upon what cause and for what time such persons are to be withheld; and whether, in any event, the U. States are made liable in relation to persons who have permitted make such entries the purchase money paid therefor.

Mr. Jones, from the committee of ways and means, reported a bill to authorize the issue of five millions of treasury notes.

Mr. Granger called for the reading of the bill; it was read accordingly, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. Stansby, from the committee on expenditures on the public buildings, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on expenditures on the public buildings have power to send for persons.

The resolution was read and agreed to.

Mr. Stansby, from the same committee, also reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That neither the president of the United States nor any other officer of the general government shall issue certificates or due bills, or other evidence of debt or contract, without authority of law.

The resolution was read and agreed to.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. Adams on the 22d of December, was called up by the mover, viz:

Resolved, That the postmaster general be directed to report to this house the names of all the postmasters throughout the union who have been removed from office since the 31 day of March, 1829, with the names of the persons appointed in their stead, and to certify the names of all those removed for official delinquency or misdemeanor, and specifying the nature thereof, the complaint upon which the removal was made, the extent in support of such complaint, and the name of the officer removed was made acquainted with the complaint, confronted with his accuser, or allowed to be heard in his defence.

Mr. Hopkins moved to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word resolved, and inserting as follows:

1. That the power of removing executive officers is vested in the president of the United States.

2. Resolved, That this power was conferred to enable the executive "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and cannot be exercised arbitrarily or capriciously, without an abuse of power, tyrannical in its operation, corrupting in its tendency, and converting a remedy for unworthiness and misconduct into a terrible engine of executive power.

3. Resolved, That the patronage of the executive department has increased to an alarming extent, and ought to be restricted and diminished, so that it is compatible with a safe and faithful execution of the laws.

4. Resolved, That it is the right of the representatives of the people to examine into all abuses and usurpations, and may apprehend and correct, in any of the executive departments, in order that they may be corrected and prevented, if possible, by legislation, and, in flagrant and venient cases, exposture and punishment.

5. Resolved, That the power of appointment and removal from office vested in the executive may be greatly abused, and its exercise ought therefore to be kept close and strictly guarded, so that it may be prevented the power and patronage of the executive from being brought into conflict with the freedom and purity of the house.

6. Resolved, That the representatives of the people have a right to inquire into the causes for which any executive officer has been removed or dismissed from office by the executive.

7. Resolved, That, in prosecuting such inquiry, the house of representatives has a right to call for and have furnished to it all official documents, papers and letters relating to the removal of such officer which may be on file among the records of any of the executive departments.

8. Resolved, That a select committee be appointed whose duty it shall be to report a bill imposing such restrictions upon executive patronage as may be consistent with the foregoing resolutions, and compatible with the constitution of the United States, so as more effectually to guard against abuse and corruption in the exercise of the power of removal from and appointment to office.

Mr. Care Johnson said that, from the mass of business before the house, there could be no opportunity of discussing these resolutions at this session; he would therefore move that they be laid on the table.

Mr. Adams raised a question of order, on the ground that the amendment of Mr. Hopkins was irrelevant to the subject matter of his resolution.

The speaker decided in favor of the relevancy of the amendment.

Mr. Adams appealed. After some remarks from Mr. Adams and Mr. Hopkins—Mr. Banks moved to lay the appeal on the table. And the question was put, by yeas and nays, and decided in the affirmative yeas 93, and nays 90.

The appeal being thus laid on the table, the question returned on the motion of Mr. C. Johnson that the resolution and amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. Adams inquired of the chair what was the state of the subject under the decision of the speaker. The appeal had then lain on the table, and consequently the speaker's decision was not affirmed; that the appeal was therefore still existing, and the amendment could not be considered as received.

The speaker stated that the appeal being an idle pretence, and laid on the table, the speaker's decision must stand, in all further action on the subject, until reversed.

Mr. Adams said he supposed he had no remedy.

The question was then taken, by yeas and nays, on the motion to lay the resolution and amendment on the table, and decided in the negative, yeas 85, nays 92.

Mr. Hopkins then asked Mr. Adams to accept his resolution as a modification of his proposition; in which event, Mr. H. pledged himself to vote for the whole.

Mr. Adams would be willing, he said, to modify his proposition if he could see how it was possible. His resolution was for a set of facts—his resolutions of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Hopkins) contained a set of principles to be acted on by the house.

The question had now been disposed of, when, the house having adjourned, the speaker announced the private order of the day. And the resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Mr. G. Davis, on behalf of his sick colleague, (Mr. Sherrod Williams), asked leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury of the United States inform this house what six land districts have been discontinued under the act of June 12, 1840, and what salaries or other emoluments were paid the officers of such districts between the 12th of June aforesaid, and the discontinuance of such districts, specifying the same paid to each individual. And that the secretary also report the amount of revenue that was paid to each receiver of such districts between the time of their discontinuance and the 12th of June aforesaid.

The house proceeded to the consideration of private bills, and after disposing of several, and the postponement of others, at half past 3 o'clock adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 11. The journal of Saturday having been read—the speaker announced the special order of the day to be the case of the contested election from the state of Pennsylvania between Mr. Naylor and Mr. Ingersoll.

Mr. Naylor then arose and presented the house in behalf of his right to the seat now held by him; entering minutely into the history of the case; and into the testimony taken in relation to it; and replying seriatim to the positions assumed by Mr. Ingersoll in his argument of last Tuesday.

Mr. N. continued to speak (without concluding) until near three o'clock, when he gave way to a motion for adjournment; which, however, was waived for a moment to enable

Mr. Jones, of Virginia, on leave, to report from the committee of ways and means the general appropriation bill for the civil and diplomatic expenses for the support of government for the year 1841; which was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole on the 12th of the month, and ordered to be printed. The house adjourned till to-morrow.

Tuesday, Jan. 12. Mr. Adams had leave to present a petition of Redman Burke and George Wix, of Washington, who they have been discharged from work on the public buildings at Washington; which was referred to the committee on the public buildings.

Mr. Green asked the consent of the house to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to inquire into the expediency and necessity of laying such duties, for the purposes of revenue, upon imports and exports, and such other articles of luxury imported into the United States, as will meet the necessary expenditures of the government, and pay off the public already incurred by the issue of treasury notes, and such other debts as may be incurred by the government of the United States, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Turney called for the reading of the resolution, which we read accordingly.

Mr. Pickens was proceeding to make some remarks; when Mr. Hubbard objected to the introduction of the resolution; and there the matter ended.

Mr. Campbell, of S. C. asked leave to introduce a resolution directing the speaker to issue a subpoena duces tecum to Samuel Hart, clerk of the court in Philadelphia, to appear before the house with the election returns of members of congress for the 3d district of Pennsylvania, in 1838.

Many members objected to the introduction of the resolution, and it was returned to Mr. Campbell.

Mr. Sergeant reported the senate bill further to amend the act providing for taking the sixth census with a small amendment, which was adopted; and the bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. Sergeant reported the bill from the senate supplementary to the act to abolish imprisonment for debt in certain cases, without amendment. Mr. S. explained the provisions of the bill, and the urgent necessity that existed for immediate action upon it. And he asked that it might now be put on its third reading.

Mr. Adams moved to amend the bill by striking out the words "or shall hereafter be," and gave his reasons for proposing the amendment, contending that the act is as now stood, transferred to the state the power which, under the constitution of the United States, belongs to congress.

The amendment was discussed briefly by Messrs. Monroe, Thompson, of Mississippi, Fillmore, Curtis, Vanderpool, Barnard and Pope.

Mr. Everett inquired if it was intended that if that effect of the bill should be lost, it would be to be the effect, he thought that the bill itself ought not to pass.

Mr. Hubbard objected, he said, to the whole act, as well as to the bill passed at the last session of congress; for he believed the operation was partial. He moved, therefore, to recommit the bill to the committee on the judiciary, with the following instructions:

"To report a bill to abolish imprisonment for debt under process issuing from the courts of the United States to all cases except where the judgment shall be against an officer of the United States for a delinquency in his office."

Mr. Peck sustained briefly the motion to recommit.

Mr. Sergeant explained his views in relation to the constitutional points as between the U. States and the several states, and earnestly opposed the amendment.

Mr. Briggs here rose, and reminded the house that Mr. Naylor, who was entitled to the floor in continuation of his argument, had yielded to his colleague, (Mr. Sergeant), under the supposition that the bill would be lost; and that he was now moved.

When several voices called for the "previous question."

Mr. Vanderpool said he would move the previous question if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Briggs] would give way.

And Mr. Briggs having yielded the floor—Mr. Vanderpool moved the previous question. And there was a second.

The speaker said that the previous question would cut off the motion to recommit, and would bring the house to a vote, first on the amendment, and then on the third reading of the bill.

And the house ordered that the main question should be put.

Mr. Adams asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment, which were ordered, and being taken, were yeas 51, nays 110. So the amendment was rejected.

And the bill (having been ordered to a third reading at this time) was read a third time and passed.

Mr. S. Grant, from the committee on the judiciary, reported three bills from the senate, viz:

To conform to the state of Indiana the land selected by law for that state in the new boundary Erie canal which lies between the mouth of Tippecanoe river and Terra Haute, and for other purposes.

To prevent the counterfeiting of any foreign copper, gold, silver or other coin, and to prevent the bringing into the United States or uttering any counterfeit foreign copper, gold, silver or other coin.

To amend an act entitled an act more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes.

These bills were then committed to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, again asked leave to move a resolution, which was read at the clerk's table, and it was followed by

Resolved, That the speaker of this house be requested to issue a subpoena duces tecum to Samuel Hart, ex-prothonotary of the court of common pleas for the city and county of Philadelphia, directing the said Samuel Hart, etc., to appear personally or by deputy before this house at 1 o'clock P. M. on Friday, the 15th instant, with the election returns and other papers on file in his office relating to the congressional election in the first congressional district of the state of Pennsylvania in 1838, there to be examined in evidence in the case of the contested election now pending between E. J. Ingersoll and Charles Naylor, from the said congressional district.

Several members objected.

Mr. Campbell then moved a suspension of the rules to enable him to introduce the resolution, and the question was put and decided in the negative without a division.

The house resumed the consideration of the case of the contested election from the third congressional district of the state of Pennsylvania between Mr. Naylor and Mr. Ingersoll.

Mr. Naylor resumed his argument from yesterday in support of his right to the seat now held by him; and before he had concluded, the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

ABOLITION POLICY. The New York Journal of Commerce gives the following as the amount of the votes polled for Messrs. Baines and Enrie, the abolition candidates for federal and vice president, out of a total of about 2,400,000 votes:

States.	Abolition.	States.	Abolition.
Pennsylvania,	97	Illinois,	97
New Jersey,	69	Vermont,	319
Ohio,	902	Connecticut,	174
Michigan,	42	Delaware,	1
New York,	2,779
Maine,	194
Massachusetts,	1,818

THE BANKS OF THE CITY OF BALTIMORE, it is announced have resolved that it is inexpedient to resume specie payments until they ascertain that those of Virginia at least, if not other southern states will be prepared to resume also. The annual exhibit of the condition of the banks of the city on the 1st January, made under oath to the treasurer of the state, has been published.

BANK OF VIRGINIA. The legislative examination into the affairs of this bank, and the names which have operated to produce the late severe losses of the bank, has not had the effect of inspiring the confidence of the stockholders in the prudence of directors of the institution. The old board of directors were re-elected—Dr. Breckenborough (the president) by a majority of more than two to one.

BOSTON COMMERCE. In 1840, the arrival from foreign ports amounted to 1,628 vessels—being an increase of 76 over those of 1839. Cleared 1,362 vessels, being 72 less than in 1839.

BUENOS AYRES AND FRANCE. The brig Cervantes of New York, from Rio Janeiro, brings the important information that the Oriental brig India had arrived there with intelligence that a treaty has been concluded between the French and Buenos Ayres, and that the blockade, which has been continued for three years, was raised on the 21st October.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN THE U. STATES. It is stated in the Catholic Almanac for 1841, just published in this city by Fielding Lucas, Jr. that the Catholic population of the United States is estimated at 1,200,000. The number of clergymen in the ministry is 1,436, otherwise employed, 109—total 1,545. The number of churches and chapels is 312; churches 27, of other stations 291. There are 17 ecclesiastical institutions, with 141 clerical students. The female religious institutions number 31, and the female academies 49. There are in the female academies 2,000 pupils. The literary institutions for young men number 24, and the young men in them 1,593. The number of Catholic bishops in the U. States is 14; in 1840, the number was 13. As to the priestly office have been 55. The archdiocese of Baltimore, which comprises the state of Maryland and the District of Columbia, has 65 churches and chapels, 2 churches building, and 100 priests. The number of clergymen in the ministry is 39, and the number otherwise employed, 31. There are 633 young men in the colleges of this see, and 520 pupils in the female academies.

THE CAROLINE AFFAIR. A public meeting was held at Buffalo on the 29th ult. to "commemorate and act upon the means of redress for the outrage of the burning of the American steamer Caroline, on the eve of the 29th day of December, 1837." Among the resolutions adopted was one to commemorate the 29th of December "annually henceforth, as a great valedictory of the late of neutrality existing between the American government and Great Britain, until the blood of the murdered Durfee and his fellow citizens be atoned for."

DELAWARE U. S. SENATOR. The legislature have elected the late THOMAS CLAYTON and RICHARD B. DAYARD to represent the state in the U. S. senate—both whigs.

EXCHANGE. New York on London 54p. on France 84 1/2, 17, on Boston 100p. Philadelphia 11 1/2 on Baltimore 2 1/2 on Washington 14 1/2; Richmond, Norfolk, &c. 2; Raleigh, Wilmington, &c. 3; Charleston 11; Augusta 11; Macon 12 1/2; Columbus 25; Savannah 41; Mobile 6 1/2; Mobile of Alabama 6 1/2; New Orleans 24 1/2; St. Louis, Louisville, Cincinnati 6 1/2; Nashville 8.

PRICE. Liverpool, Dec. 8. United States and Canadian flour is 1s. 1p. per drayer; 3s. 6d. no 20s. per bbl. paid for prime red-stripe paragon; 4s. 6d. for former. Liverpool, Dec. 19. The duty on foreign wheat is advanced to 2s. 8d. per qr. on flour to 16s. 6d. per barrel.

At New York, Genesee flour commands $4 94. At Baltimore, the receipt price is $4 23; selling price $4 41 to $4 50, city mids $4 62.

FIREBURN. Loss of lives and property. The country at the time being covered with about 15 inches of snow, a heavy rain commenced on the evening of the 21st, and continued for the next forty-eight hours. The consequence has been most disastrous. Property and improvements to the amount of millions of dollars in value have been lost in the forests and in the cities. The interruption of the roads and bridges and mail interrupt the union in all directions. Enough of mail bags to fill a small warehouse have accumulated at the Southampton, where the ice prevents the boats from crossing. Passengers pass upon the ice at great risk. The railroads in Maryland have stood the frostiest winter we have heard of but little injury yet.

At Georgetown, in the District, the breaking up of the ice in Rock creek carried away the lower bridge, near the mouth of the creek. The Dowman and Leblond rose to about thirty-five feet above low water mark, and the destruction thereof by accumulated ice was terrible indeed. Dwelling houses, houses, and several boats, store houses, &c. have been floated off and destroyed, and some lives lost.

It is feared that the aqueducts and culverts are all gone. The dams on the Lehigh river, above Mauch Chunk, have been swept away, and all the floating fixtures of the company at that place have been destroyed. Several lives were lost. The Lehigh Canal iron works were inundated, and the Lehigh bridge has been carried away. The furnace at the South Eason was inundated while in blast, and the sudden evolution of gas and steam burst the walls and scattered the fragments about.

Numbers of bridges, dams, mills and houses have been swept away on the Potomac, Susquehanna, Delaware, Schuylkill, Lehigh, Passaic, Hackensack, Hudson, Connecticut and all their principal tributaries—indeed, the damage to the Union water works is estimated at $150,000.

On the North river, King's bridge is gone and no many other bridges that the mail cannot be forwarded by land, it is by the water.

The water works of New York have suffered severely, about one half of the Croton dam was carried away and the several mile-below, where the water has been carried away, as has been the bridge crossing the river above the dam erected by the water commissioners. The three bridges below the dam, one of which was carried by the river and another by the post road, are destroyed. Several dwelling houses, both below and above the dam have been carried away, and three lives have been lost. The flood came so rapidly, and in the night, that persons escaped from their dwellings in their night cloths, and got into trees for security.

From Albany we have advices to Friday evening that at O'Leary. South Market street was impassable for foot passengers, and all communication was carried on by boats.

The damage at this place and vicinity is extensive.

Severities. The losses at this place are estimated at $100,000.

The Connecticut river rose at Hartford within ten miles of the height it was at in the memorable freshet of 1801. Nearly all Front street was covered with water, and the second story of the second building east of Frost. It will be some days before the stores can be reopened. Numbers of families were driven from their homes, and others in their upper stories. Numbers of horses, cattle and pigs were destroyed.

Several bridges across the Farmington and other rivers were carried away.

This freshet is two or three feet higher than that of January, 1839, and much higher than that of any other year since 1811.

THE FACKET SHIP GARRICK, capt. Palmer. The passengers and crew are all landed here, but the ship went ashore on the north end of Westlands, Jersey shore, 20 miles from Sandy Hook, on the night of the 1st inst., and in a complete wreck—every spar breaking over her. She lies within her length in the shore, and they are hauling her across upon timber, much damaged of course. The cargo was estimated to be worth 400,000 dollars—much of it was not more than one-third landed, freight less £1,200. The ship itself was insured to the amount of $200,000 in the N. York, Ocean, and Fire Insurance Company.

THE SHIP GAZON, capt. Duff, and of for Africa, with a valuable cargo left Liverpool on the 12th Nov. and on the night of the 6th Jan. ran aground on the S. E. point of the middle ground, thereby unshipping the cargo and causing her to lie on her side. The captain and all on board left her, after anchoring, and proceeded to seek safety and succor. With the latter the captain was returning when he discovered the ship under way for Norfolk, in possession of some pirates, who had manumitted taken possession, and refused to deliver her up. She is now at Norfolk.

SIR JOHN HARVEY is a prisoner in the Calabrian for Liverpool, having been induced in a conspiracy in or about the month of August last to murder the Governor John Bell has taken of the sublime power, as collateral security for monies loaned to carry on the war against the House of Aspas.

The refusal of this officer from authority in our vicinity, is considered unfavorable to harmony between the British and this country. The N. York Commercial says, to him more than any man, is to be made, and he is now in the city.

The Boston Atlas says: Lord Sydenham appears determined to retire, in a quiet way that will cause no disturbance to the country, and the protestant officers in command in the British provinces in America. Not long since we announced the appointment of Sir Colin Campbell to the command of Ceylon, as a quiet way to restore him from the government of Nova Scotia. Sir John Harvey is now, it appears, to be dismissed as a similar manner. The London Chronicle announces that major general Sir Thomas Pearson, now in command of the north of Ireland, is to proceed to Nova Scotia, in the place of major general Sir John Harvey, ordered to India.

The Commercial says: It appears that Sir John Harvey, the governor of New Brunswick, is ordered to Syria, and we are sorry he is ordered anywhere. For while he has faithfully discharged his duty to his own sovereign, he has manifested a peculiar interest in the welfare of the people of which has not failed to be appreciated by the descendants of Englishmen. His intercourse with general Scott, at a time when the boundary question furnished a pretext for ill feeling, was marked by a nobler and a brighter page in his history, than if he had achieved the bloody triumphs of Caesar or Napoleon. Brighter, at least, than when men come to deal at things in their true light.

Later. The last mail brings us papers which state that Sir John Harvey has received no official intimation of any appointment such as intimated above.

LOANS. From the year 1822 to 1836, the foreign loans taken in London, amounted to £37,000,000—of which $263,000,000. No United States' loans were included in the above.

MAIL ROBBERIES. Extensive robberies, including packages of letters from Wheeling, Columbus, Cincinnati, Louisville, Nashville and St. Louis, about six packages from each, have been discovered, the perpetrators were taken present 210, necessary by officers Platt and Kennedy, employed by the department. A driver named Carson was first seized, who confessed and named Dr. H. Briggs, his accomplice, named Foy, and an accomplice named Trayer, all residence of Uniontown, Pennsylvania.

Large amounts of money, trunks and carpet bags were taken from mail carriers, have been discovered, and part of the money has been identified as having been taken from the mail. This system of depredation has been carried on by the British mail carriers until the 15th December, at different periods.

MASSACHUSETTS U. S. SENATOR. The whigs of the legislature held a meeting to agree upon a candidate for senator in place of the honorable John Davis resigned, and present 210, necessary by officers Platt and Kennedy, employed by the department. A driver named Carson was first seized, who confessed and named Dr. H. Briggs, his accomplice, named Foy, and an accomplice named Trayer, all residence of Uniontown, Pennsylvania.

NORTHEAST BOUNDARY DIFFICULTIES. The Boston Herald states, by the authority of a gentleman who arrived in that city—late last night, that a party of gentlemen, whose names are given us, Thomas F. Templeton, George Child and John H. Kenwick, while proceeding on their way from Bangor to Canada, were stopped by a party of the British soldiers, who insulted them and without provocation assaulted them. Mr. Child was knocked down with a blow from a musket, Mr. Kenwick received a bayonet wound in the shoulder, and Mr. Kenwick, trying to escape, received a bullet in his thigh. An officer then came up and checked further hostilities.

If the facts are correct, the occurrences will not tend to ally the excitement on the subject of the northern boundary.

POKE MARKET. At Cincinnati about 100,000 hogs had been slaughtered on the 15th ult. prices range from $3 12 to 12 1/2, baird.

STOCKS. United States bank of Pennsylvania, at N. York 30 to 51 1/2; at Philadelphia 50.

SLAVES. The examination before our district court has resulted in punishing capt. Frye and Mr. Hornbush, the mate of the brig Tiger, under bonds of $3,000 and $2,000 respectively, for the seizure of a native of Africa, on the coast with intent of making him a slave. Judge Dixon directed the charge sufficiently established to award a trial by the court, which was refused by Mr. May.

(Boston press.)

THE SERGEANT AT ARMS, of the house of representatives, Judge Hught, formerly of Vermont, died at Washington on the 15th inst. The senate voted $500 to defray the expenses of his removal to Vermont and interment of his remains.

WHEAT MARKET. Liverpool, Dec. 8. On Saturday, at Manchester, good runs of Baltic red wheat were bought at 8s. 9d. to 8s. 10d.; American at 8s. 9d. to 8s. 10d.; and some tolerable 8s. 8d. to 8s. 9d. The Irish new wheat has experienced a similar decline, but the value of English new, which the quantity offering is small, has not needed in the proportion. The best run of white legume still worth 9s. 4d. to 9s. 5d. Sweet parcels of American flour are becoming much less plentiful, and must at this time be sold at 10s. 6d. to 10s. 7d. United States 24s. 6d.; Canadian 23s. to 24s. 1s. per barrel.

The rice was a firmer tone in the wheat trade generally, and a firm advance in the price of the rice, principally to a few prices, at the full prices of last Tuesday.

THE MESSRS. WRIGHTS, bankers of London, who lately failed, it is now said will pay twenty shillings in the pound. Louis Philippe of France it is said will compromise himself in his hands.

*Which includes all the sailing.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The packet ship Patrick Henry, arrived at New York on Friday, bringing Liverpool dates to the 26th December.

Her majesty the queen of Great Britain and the infant princess are both well, at Windsor.

The terms of the convention entered into between Mehmet Ali and captain Napier have been agreed to by the members of the conference in London.

Spain and Portugal are quarrelling and about to engage in hostilities concerning the navigation of Durro. The intervention of Great Britain would, were thought, prevent any collision.

The latest Paris official paper contradicts an assertion which appeared in the opposition journals, alleging that M. Guizot had determined to discontinue the fortification of Paris. The ministerial organ says that, on the contrary, the plan, as already stated, is to be carried into execution, unless the chamber of deputies should think proper to interfere by refusing the supplies.

The official papers also give an explanation relative to the intelligence received from Constantinople, by which we were informed that the ports had a second time resolved on the disposition of Mehmet Ali.

Her majesty's ship Fairy, captain Hewitt, while exploring the eastern coast of England, went down in a squall of wind, and every soul on board perished. There were thirty-five persons on board at the time. The Fairy is the eighth ship that has turned over and gone down—cause, faulty build or construction.

The letters of the Manchester bank, by one mail, enclosing drafts to the probable amount of £10,000 were recently despatched and received at the post office by an adroit rogue. Payment of nearly all the drafts was promptly stopped by notices and arrangements.

The coal mines at Ridgely Field, near Bolton, were suddenly overladen on the 16th. Of 39 persons, all but three escaped almost miraculously.

It appears that there have been rumors that the East India company were to bear the expenses of the Chinese expedition. The governor of the company states, however, that assurances had been received from government, that it would not be required.

The prince Louis Napoleon has forwarded to some of his friends in Paris a singular document—an invocation to the name of Napoleon. We subjoin a sample:

You have again beheld Frenchmen whom you loved so well; you have returned to that France which you rendered so illustrious; but foreigners have left traces of their footsteps, which this pompous display alone can never efface.

You behold that young army, the children of your brave warriors; they worship you as the god of their glory, but the word of command to them is—be still.

Sire, the people that inhabit our beautiful country are still men of the same stamp, but for those whom you made so great, for those whom you found so little, have no regrets.

They have renounced your faith, your ideas, your glory, your very blood. When I addressed them in behalf of your cause, they replied—"we understand you not."

Heed not what they say, nor what they do; the grains of sand o'er which the wheels of the chariot roll effect it not. These men may say you were a meteor that left no traces behind, but they vainly attempt to deny your glory. They can never disinherit it.

Sire, the fifteenth of December is a great day for France and for me. From this instant the pompous procession you have turned into dry dismal abode, and calling to mind the carcases you heard upon me in infancy, you have thus said—"friends, thus suffer for my sake; try, but conduct I approve."

The Jews. There seems to be a movement among the Continental Jews in relation to the late events in the east. The following is the concluding paragraph of an address to the Jews, published in Der Orient, a German newspaper:

"People of Israel, raise yourselves from your thousand years' slumbers! Rattle round leaders have really the will, a Moses will not be wanting. The rights of nations will never grow old; take possession of the land of your fathers; build a third temple of Zion, greater and more magnificent than ever. Trust in the Lord, who has led you safely through the vale of misery thousands of years. He also will not forsake you in your last conflict."

The abolitionists have been throwing themselves into paroxysms of excitement about the recognition of the British government, and the committee of the anti-slavery society have transmitted to Lord Palmerston their resolutions on the subject.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT, by and with the advice and consent of the senate. Alexander H. Tyler, of Maryland, to be consul of the U. States at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in Brazil, in the place of Woodbridge Odlin, deceased.

William H. Ward, of Kentucky, to be solicitor of the general land office of the United States, in the place of Samuel F. McKim, resigned.

Oscar F. Bledsoe, of Mississippi, to be attorney of the United States for the northern district of Mississippi, in the place of Samuel F. Butterworth, resigned.

Burrington Anthony, to be marshal of the United States for the district of Rhode Island.

Thomas D. Condy, to be marshal of the United States for the district of South Carolina.

Fidelis S. Hunt, to be marshal of the U. States for the southern district of Mississippi, in place of Wm. M. Griffin, resigned.

Conrad Fan Eyck, to be marshal of the United States for the district of Michigan.

James Miller, to be collector of the customs at Salem, Mass., reappointed from January 3, 1841.

Samuel Sumner, to be collector of the customs at Fairfield, Conn. reappointed from January 8, 1841.

Richard Sands, to be collector of the customs at Annapolis, Md. reappointed from January 8, 1841.

Win. Field, to be collector of the customs at Baltimore, Md. reappointed from January 9, 1841.

Edwin J. Kelso, to be collector of the customs at Praque Isle, Pa. reappointed from January 9, 1841.

Samuel S. Allen, to be collector of the customs at Bristol and Warren, R. I. reappointed from January 9, 1841.

Sylvester Brown, to be collector of the customs at Ocracoke, N. C. reappointed from January 10, 1841.

Abraham Wendell, to be collector of the customs at Michilimackinac, Mi. reappointed February 9, 1841.

Joseph Aborn, to be surveyor of the revenue at Paxtucket, R. I. reappointed from January 4, 1841.

Charles B. Lemer, to be surveyor of the customs at St. John, N. B. reappointed from January 8, 1841.

Issue Burdick, to be naval officer at Newport, R. I. reappointed from December 23, 1840.

TEATRY WITH HANOVER. The Hanover Gazette of December 14, announces the conclusion of a treaty of commerce and navigation between Hanover and the United States.

TRADE AND COMMERCE. Tobacco and breadstuffs. At a meeting of the tobacco planters of Dinwiddie county, Va. the following resolution was passed.

"That, while in a spirit of peace we have submitted to the odious and monopolizing laws of England, we utterly repudiate, as revolting to our sense of justice, the idea of a longer submission to the enormous and oppressive duties now imposed upon our tobacco."

"The Pittsburg Advocate respecting the above resolution says:

It strikes us that this is as good an exemplification of southern feeling for northern interests as can any where be met with. Our very chivalrous neighbors are willing to submit to the brutalities of the north being excluded from Great Britain, but they utterly repudiate the idea of a longer submission to the enormous duty now imposed on tobacco—"the most valued staple," to use their own language, "of nearly two millions of American freemen."

They never entered into the calculations of these patriots to consider how many millions of freemen breadstuffs forms the "most valued staple," or how their interests are affected by those odious and monopolizing laws of England."

"To which they appear willing to submit, provided they can obtain a reduction of the duties on tobacco. There is something extremely ridiculous in this gauding about tobacco, by men who are willing to see the whole manufacturing and agricultural interests of the north sacrificed to the odious and monopolizing laws of England."

We care not how soon the countervailing duties which the tobacco planters desire are imposed, but in the name of all that is just and reasonable, resist against the "most valued staple" of the north being excluded from the benefits of any new modification of our tariff.

The Lake trade. The following statement published in the Buffalo Advertiser, will furnish some idea of the present extent and future importance of the trade of Lake Erie.

Statement of the principal articles of produce reported at Buffalo, during the season of 1840.

To this must be added 572,327 bushels of wheat entered at Black Rock Dam, making the aggregate of wheat received at both ports 1,985,889 bushels. To which must also be added the 597,742 bbls. of flour received, which if reduced to its equivalent in grain at five bushels to the barrel, we have an aggregate of wheat received at the two places, of four millions five hundred and seventy-one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight bushels.

Collector's seizure. Some time since we stated that a large quantity of English goods had been seized by the collector at Cincinnati from a Mr. Hall a merchant of that place. The case was tried before Judge McLean, at the circuit court at Columbus, and the jury rendered a verdict in favor of Mr. Hall against the collector for nearly $16,000.

THOSE TROOPS. At last we have information that can be relied on, touching the movement of troops in, or on, about the disputed territory. The following letter from Sir John Harvey to the governor of Maine was communicated to the senate at that state on Thursday.

(N. York Com. Adcer. Governor John, Frederick, N. B. Dec. 10, 1840.

Sir: As your excellency will doubtless be informed that a detachment of her majesty's troops has lately arrived in the Madawaska settlement. I deem it to consist with that frankness by which I trust my intercourse with the authorities of Maine has always been characterized, to acquaint you that the movement in question, made by order of the governor general of the province, has no other object than to give support to the civil authorities of that settlement—one of whose magistrates, Francis Rice, esq., has been grossly insulted, threatened with personal violence, and obstructed in the discharge of his duties. Persons professing themselves to be citizens of the state of Maine; and another Jas. McLaughlin, esq., also a magistrate of this province, and holding the office of "warden of the disputed territory," will be threatened by the person in charge of the expedition, and will be told—"Fish River," with being arrested and sent as a prisoner to Augusta in the event of his persevering in the performance of the duties imposed upon him by the government of the queen, and that of this province.

Whether the assertion made, as I am assured, by this person, that, in holding this language, he is only acting in accordance with his instructions, be correct or otherwise, your excellency will let me know; but refusing, as I have done, to believe that he can have received any authority for a proceeding which I must regard as inconsistent with existing engagements, I have not hesitated in expressing to the governor general my belief that an armed civil posse, corresponding in amount and description with that maintained by Maine, will be found quite adequate to effect the object in view, viz the prevention of acts of unauthorized aggression or interference, with persons inhabiting the authorities of the Madawaska settlement; and I am accordingly no reason to doubt that, acting upon this suggestion, his excellency will forthwith give direction for the troops to be withdrawn to their former stations.

I have the honor to be, with great commendation, your excellency's most obedient servant.

J. HARVEY.

His excellency the gov. of the state of Maine.

GENERAL GAINES' SYSTEM OF DEFENCE. He proposes, the immediate construction of seven rail roads, to extend from the two central states of Tennessee and Kentucky, in seven grand divisions of the national frontier. The location of these rail roads, as set forth in his memorial to congress, are as follows: 1st, One from Lexington, Ky. to Buffalo or Pittsburg, N. Y. with branches to Detroit, Albany and Boston. 2d, One from Knoxville, Tenn. to Norfolk, Va. with branches to New York and Richmond, Va. and Newbern, N. C. 3rd, One from Memphis, Tenn. to Charleston, S. C. or Savannah, Geo. with branches in Middlebury, Geo. and East Florida. 4th, One from Louisville, Ky. to Mobile, Ala. with a branch to Pensacola, Florida. 5th, One from Lexington, Ky. via Nashville to New Orleans. 6th, One from Memphis, Tenn. to the Sabine River, with branches to Fort Towson and Fort Gibson, Ark. 7th, One from Louisville, Ky. or Albany, N. Y. to St. Louis, Mo. and thence to the Missouri river, north of the mouth of the Big Platte, with branches from Albany, N. Y. to Chicago, and from the northwest angle of the state of Missouri to the upper crossing of the river Des Moines. These seven principal rail roads, which each be from 300 to 700 miles in length, making altogether a distance of 4,200 miles. The average cost of their construction, general Gaines thinks, would be $10,000 per mile, or for the whole, $42,000,000—provided, he says, they are located and constructed by the army of the United States.

THE ARMY.

Florida. An arrival at Charleston from Florida, brings St. Augustine papers of the 8th inst. Col. Harvey in his late expedition had succeeded in discovering the several islands which have afforded a secure retreat to the savages; and the Augustine News says, "the capture of the Indians' security broken up, and his strong hold upon which he relied for safety, are open to enterprise and capture."

We understand this to allude to the expedition, the result of which we gave the last Register, and of which we have additional particulars.

Chakika was killed by the indomitable perseverance and courage of private Hall, of the 2d dragoon. More distant than any of the Indians whom they hunted, he was engaged in breaking wood, and on finding himself discovered, he strove and ran for the grass. Several started in pursuit, but they all gave out except Hall, who followed until he had almost overtaken him, when Chakika snatched and extended his hand, and broke and ran for the shore, women and children. Hall levelled his rifle and the ball sinking in the brain of the chief, he fell dead in the water, but a short distance from the island which was the depot of his plunder.

This chief was of great daring, headed the massacres of troops at Caloosahatchee, and led the attack on Indian Key. His loss in his people will be attended with results fatal to their confidence, and holds out to the territory a subject for the warmest gratulations.

In relation to the late tragic affair, the Globe says—Contrary to instructions from the war department, and in opposition to positive orders issued by the commanding general, forbidding any escort being sent from post to post, under thirty men, a wagon was dispatched from Fort Micanopy in Fort Waculaw with only eleven mounted infantry, and was accompanied by a single mounted trooper; as the morning was fine, Mrs. Montgomery rode out with them. About an hour after their departure, some of the horses returned to Fort Micanopy without their riders, and shortly after two soldiers rode up and announced that the party had been attacked, Mrs. Montgomery and lieut. Sherwood and several soldiers killed. The garrison immediately sallied out, and within three miles of the fort found the bleeding corpse of Mrs. Montgomery, and in its vicinity, lying levelled, the body of a man, just strong to say to her agonized husband, who threw himself on the ground by his wife's bleeding body—"Here!—I fought for your wife as long as I could." Lieut. Sherwood was well wounded, and, if it is reported, have escaped, but would not abandon his fair charge. This barbarous act, it is believed, was committed by a band of the cruel and blood thirsty Mikasuckies.

The frontier posts in Florida are not fit places for the residence of ladies. The same circumstances which render it improper for them to be on board ships of war, might be urged against their being allowed to accompany their husbands to these points of danger. Officers ought to be free to act in moments of emergency without the nuisance of having to protect helpless women and children.

This unfortunate lady had been only three weeks in Florida, and but lately married.

THE NAVY.

Promotions. Charles H. Bell, to be a commander in the navy from September 10, 1840.

Daniel B. Ridgely, to be a lieutenant in the navy from September 10, 1840.

Wm. B. Scott, to be navy agent for the navy yard in the city of Washington, and for the navy department for four years from October 1, 1840.

George Johnson, to be navy agent for the port of Pensacola, Florida, for four years from December 28, 1840.

The New York American says that the United States ship of war Cyane was at Toulon on the 29th of November last, to sail for Mithoon—will well on board. On the arrival of the Cyane, she found two three deckers and three 74's, which, in a few days after, were joined by the fleet of evacuation from the Levant, consisting of one three decker and ten 74's—making in all an exhibition of the French naval force, then in the harbor of Toulon, equal to six line of battle ships, 3 of which were of 120 guns each. In the fleet three admirals, 13 captains, and 3 sailing ships, were included, and in command of the station and arsenal, making 3 admirals at that time on duty there. The ships are represented to have exhibited a magnificent appearance. The commander of the Cyane, capt. M. de la Motte, had declared that on which occasion salutes were fired. War between France and England was the all engrossing topic among the French officers.

The following is a list of the officers on board of the Cyane.

William K. Latimer, commander; Sylvanus W. Goddard, lieutenant; Samuel F. Haas, 2d id; Alford Taylor, 3d id; Benjamin F. Dove, 4th id; John J. Army, acting master; Lewis B. Hunter, surgeon; William Grier, assistant surgeon; Horatio Bickard, purser; James Jolly, professor of mathematics; George A. Bickard, midshipman; Francis Alexander, Wiltner Shields, Archibald Melkay, Geo. B. Balch, Gustavus V. Fox, Charles W. Peace, Frederick W. Colby, Alexander C. Rhind, midshipmen; George F. Cutler, captain's clerk; George Chubb, brewer; John Barr, gunner; James Farguson, sailmaker; Thomas Patterson, carpenter.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

The committee on elections of the legislature of Maine have reported that there was no choice of governor at the September election. The vote stands thus:

For Kent, (whig) 45,575, Fairfield, (Van Buren) 45,507, Hamlin, (Van Buren) 28, Smith, (whigs) 23, scattering, 65.

The number necessary for a choice is 45,590. The acceptance of the report was objected to by the whigs, on the ground that 100 votes for Fairfield and 45 for Kent, informally returned, were allowed, and was laid on the table. If the report is accepted, Kent will be chosen by the legislature; if it is not, and the 100 votes rejected, Kent will be declared elected by the people.

The legislature of Maine having accepted the report of the committee appointed to count the votes for governor, that there was no election by the people, the house of representatives, nominated Edward Kent and John Fairfield to the senate, and the latter body, by a vote of sixteen to eight, on the same day elected Mr. Kent (whig) governor of Maine for one year. On Wednesday Mr. Kent took the oath of office, and entered upon the discharge of his duties.

We learn from the Portland Advertiser, that Mr. Joshua A. Lowell, when the Van Buren governor of Maine has declared election to congress, and to thence to the United States senate, has been chosen. He received a minority of the votes, but gov. Fairfield declared him elected by rejecting the returns of a whig township. Mr. Noyes it is said will contest the seat and obtain it.

Governor Kent, in his inaugural address adverts to the occupation, by order of the governor general of Canada, of the posts at Temiscouata Lake and Madawaska, by British troops, in direct violation of the stipulated agreement between the authorities of New Brunswick and Maine, and says:

"I cannot but view this proceeding, as my predecessor does, in his reply to sir John Harvey, as a direct and palpable infringement of the stipulated arrangement, and as an infringement of that portion of the contested territory. And if the suggestion of lieutenant governor Harvey, who seems not to have been consulted in relation to this new act of jurisdiction, and who so silently regards it with regret, if not as an infringement of stipulating arrangements, is disregarded, and the British troops are permanently located at Madawaska, I shall feel it my duty to reiterate the request already made to the general government, and to urge upon the executive and legislative authorities of the United States, to maintain a military possession on the part of the United States of the territory in dispute. The general government owns it to Maine to move forward in this matter, with promptness and energy, with a sincere and unflinching determination to preserve, but with an equally firm determination to maintain subsisting engagements on our part, and to insist upon a full performance from the other party."

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Two new counties were constituted in N. Hampshire at the last session of the legislature by the division of Stratford county. The new counties are named Belknap and Carroll; the first contains eight townships and the other thirteen. Stratford county, which was the largest of the state, with therefore contains but thirteen towns. The sections of the county for Belknap county will be held at Gilford; and for Carroll county at Ossipee.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Message of governor Davis to the Boston Atlas of yesterday contains the message of the governor of Massachusetts to the legislature of that state. It occupies only one column and a half of the paper; but into that small space governor Davis has compressed a volume of practical wisdom, and of eloquence in moderate and dignified language; and has serves these characteristics even in commenting with deserved severity upon "the experimental policy pursued since the chief magistrate of the United States took into his custody and keeping the revenue."

The hon. Isaac C. Bates was yesterday elected U. S. senator for Massachusetts, to fill gov. Davis' vacancy, and for the next term of six years. The vote in the house stood:—Isaac C. Bates, 250; Marcus M. Mason, 114; scattering, 6.

Boston and Worcester rail road company. By an abstract from the superintendent's weekly reports, it appears that the receipts for passengers and freight on the Boston and Worcester rail road were, for

for 1836	$175,200 79
1837	194,288 62
1838	199,662 70
1839	216,129 63
1840	234,795 67

NEW JERSEY.

The legislature. This body re-assembled at Trenton on Tuesday last and organized for business; the officers of which are the hon. Joseph Porter, of Gloucester, vice president of the council, (senior), Robert E. Lee, of Princeton, secretary. In the assembly, Hon. John Enloe, of Burlington, speaker, Samuel Pryor, jr., of Salem, clerk.

A correspondent writes "that the election of a United States senator to take the place of gen. Van Ness probably be held some time in February, when, of course, a good vote will be chosen to represent the broad seal of New Jersey in the senate of the United States in conjunction with her favorite Southard."

PENNSYLVANIA.

Legislature. Resolutions in favor of a repeal of the sub-treasury act, and advocating the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, have been introduced in the legislature of Pennsylvania. They embody instructions to the senators, and requests to the members of the lower house, to vote in accordance with the views of the legislature on these questions. In relation to the tariff, the following resolution is also before the legislature:

Resolved, That our senators be instructed, and our representatives be requested, to vote for such modification or adjustment of the tariff, as may increase the revenue derived from imports, equal to the wants of the national government, so that at no time hereafter, under any pretext whatever, shall any money arising from the sales of the public lands, be used by the general government.

Loan. The bill authorizing a loan of $800,000, at six per cent. for five years to meet the state engagements on the 1st of February, which passed both houses of the Pennsylvania legislature on Saturday, has received the executive signature, and become a law. The bill originally proposed a sale of bank stock owned by the state, as an alternative, for raising the "ways and means" to meet the interest on the state debt, which falls due on the 1st of February. But the bill was amended in the senate, so as to provide for a loan of five years at six per cent. for the sum necessary, without reference to the bank stock of the state.

DELAWARE.

Gov. Comery's message. The message of gov. Comery was communicated to the two houses on the 5th inst. It refers mostly to matters of local interest. The common school system now in operation throughout the state is, in some respects defective. The appointment of a general superintendent is recommended—also some modifications in the law imposing the school tax. It is proposed to exempt persons whose taxable property does not exceed three hundred dollars.

The penal code of the state is in thought needs revision. Many of the punishments inflicted by it are severe beyond the morals and feeling of the age—inasmuch that the excessive rigor of the law often defeats its own end, through the necessary interposition of the pardoning power, or the nullity of juries to condemn.

VIRGINIA.

United States senator. The legislature proceeded on Monday last to the election of a U. S. senator, for the unexpired term of six years, from the 4th of March, 1839, since which period the state has had only one senator in congress. The vote stood as follows:—Win. C. Rives, 83; John V. Mason, 40; James McDowell, 30; scattering 3.

Mr. Rives received the vote for him in the senate, and two Mr. Smith, of Gloucester, in casting his vote for Mr. Bruce (W.) and he should vote for Mr. Rives, if after a first ballot it was found necessary to elect him, but otherwise he could not vote for him. Mr. Bayly, of Accomack, voted for Mr. Robertson, as did also Mr. Thompson, (V. B.) the senator from Kent-

Mr. Fulton, (W.) of Wythe, voted for Mr. Mason in obedience to the wishes of his constituents.

Francis E. Rives and George C. Dringdale, representatives in the present congress from this state have both publicly declined being candidates for reelection.

The population of Virginia, it is ascertained, is 1,241,444—of which there are—

Whites,	735,813
Free colored,	46,423
Slaves,	457,207

	1,241,444
Population in 1830,	1,211,400

Increase, 29,038
The white population in 1830 was 694,193. The increase of whites is therefore 41,737. The increase of free blacks has been 1,322, and its decrease of slaves 22,517. The excess of white over slaves in 1830 was 224,713—in 1840 it is 228,605.

NORTH CAROLINA.

The inauguration of this new governor of the state of North Carolina, (John M. Morehead, eq.) took place on Friday the 1st instant, on which occasion, after listening the address of the president, the presence of past governor Dudley, the judges of the supreme court, and both branches of the legislature, governor Morehead delivered an address pertinent, to the occasion, the following passages of which especially deserve attention, the first for the moral truths of which it inculcates, and the other for the vindication of the sovereignty of the states which it includes:

"Nothing so surely indicates the happiness and prosperity of a people, as numerous school houses well filled during the week, and churches well crowded on the Sabbath; and the latter are sure to follow the former. If we desire to perpetuate our glorious political institutions, we must give to all our people moral and intellectual culture in the first place, and improve his intellect for six days in the week, and on the seventh endeavors to give it the proper direction from the precepts of our holy religion—who learns to do unto others as he would they should do unto him, that man will never be a tyrant—and he can never be made a slave."

"Believing, as I do, that county and good feeling should exist between the general government and all the members of the confederacy. I shall endeavor, while I have the honor to preside over North Carolina in every occasion that may offer, to meet them with that courtesy to which they are justly entitled—and which a due self-respect and the dignity of our state require should be shown."

"The days of our political existence, under our present form of government, are numbered, when the states shall permit their sovereignty to be confounded, and their great seals to be scoffed at and disregarded."

"I will cheerfully yield to the general government all the powers to which it is entitled, from a fair and proper construction and interpretation of the constitution; while, on the other hand, I shall carefully maintain, protect and defend the rights which pertain to our state only."

"I shall be extremely careful to see that North Carolina, when she speaks in her sovereign character, has a right to speak—and, when she does so speak through her great seal—the emblem of her sovereignty—while I have the honor to control it, it shall be well and respected."

During the late session of the legislature of N. Carolina, three new counties have been erected out of the counties of size too large for convenience. The names of the counties are Stanley, Cleveland, and Beaufort.

It appears by the late census, that the population of North Carolina consists of 227,214 free persons of color, 216,917 slaves, and 497,298 whites—total, 735,939. In 1830 the population was 737,987. Increase in ten years, 18,952.

GEORGIA.

Representative. Hiram Holt (whig) has been elected a representative in the present congress, by a large majority over his opponent, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Colquhoun.

Free patriots are the legislature of Georgia have passed a resolution, raising the pay of members to five dollars per day. A member of the Georgia legislature the other day introduced a bill to reduce the pay of members to two dollars after the close of the present session. Probably the wise and good people expect to be so reduced and probably the Kentucky economist does not!

Resumption. The last Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle contains the proclamation of governor McDonald, of Georgia, in obedience to the 1st of the last legislature, directing the banks in that state, to resume specie payments on the first day of February next. If any bank fail to comply with the provisions of this act, the charter of such bank is forfeited.

LOUISIANA.

Legislature. This body met on the 4th instant. The hon. Felix Garcia, was chosen president of the senate, and general William Debury, speaker of the house. On the same day the governor transmitted his message, of which we will take some notice hereafter.

KENTUCKY.

The bill providing for a repeal of the existing law of Kentucky, which prohibits the bringing into that state of slaves, for the purposes of sale, was negatively by the house of representatives, after long and arduous discussion. The 9th inst. The vote on the passage of the bill of repeal was—yeas, 34; noes, 33. Referring to the question thus decided, the Louisville Journal says: "No question which has come before the Kentucky legislature for years, has produced so much excitement as this."

INDIANA.

One term. A joint resolution has passed both branches of the legislature, favoring an amendment to the constitution of the United States, debarring a president from re-election.

ILLINOIS.

Riches of the west—products of Illinois. We have before us the statistics of Illinois, and the result is, (even for a single state) a basis upon which produce merchants here and elsewhere, might make some pretty certain calculations. The 9th inst. The vote on the passage of the bill of repeal was—yeas, 34; noes, 33. Referring to the question thus decided, the Louisville Journal says: "No question which has come before the Kentucky legislature for years, has produced so much excitement as this."

half a million—it founded the following production from labor:

Cereal products.—Wheat, 2,302,956 bushels; corn, 19,628,904 do.; oats, 2,767,500 do.; to these should be added, potatoes, 1,596,600 do.

It appears then, that the main crop of Illinois is corn, instead of which is fed to animals. Of wheat, there are about 8 bushels to each soul, or but little more than is ordinarily allowed for the consumption of a people. Illinois, then, has not yet become a great vital state. The potatoes, however, may be considered a surplus crop. If we allow the consumption of the people as we have done from wheat. In fact, however, both are consumed and both partially exported.

Animals.—Hogs, 1,253,181; neat cattle, 164,961; sheep, 337,157.

It seems, then, palpable enough, that hogs are the chief animal raised in Illinois, and they are the great consumers of their vast product of corn. Here, too, is an item for the pork packers every where to reflect upon. The amount of hogs put up in Cincinnati is only a little more than a rich part of the number of the population of Illinois. Consequently it is impossible for the pork market to be controlled; in Cincinnati, or any other point whatever.

Mineral productions.—Coal, 3,546,000 bushels; salt, 20,000 do.; lead, 263,668 lbs. This is an interesting item, showing that Illinois has within her limits three valuable minerals in sufficient abundance.

Literature.—There are several colleges in Illinois, but the number and pupils are omitted in the account above. Daily newspapers, 2 semi-weekly, 2 weekly, 27; periodicals, 7.

There are two or three counties omitted, but they will not affect the main items of production, as stated above, materially.

Illinois, in the whole, may be regarded as a prosperous state; but not enough so to run the extravagant career of debt, schemes and boasting, which has been undertaken in the last few years. After all, the best mode of growth, both for individuals and states, is the gradual and judicious.

[Cincinnati Chronicle.]

It appears by the recent census that the population is 445,475. It is thought that there are few states in the union, that have progressed faster in growth and population, within the last ten years, than Illinois.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

THE STATE AND ITS ANTIQUITIES.

The first of public service in which you have been called, is bonded by no narrow limits. It includes the responsibility of securing civil rights; of defining crimes of every grade, and prescribing their appropriate punishments; of establishing laws concerning the acquisition, tenure and alienation of property, or instituting and maintaining courts of justice; of prescribing and enforcing all duties arising out of the domestic and social relations; of creating associations designed to promote the public good, and controlling or suppressing such as are injurious; taking care of the public health; providing a medium of exchange; sustaining domestic trade, regulating elections and preserving the purity of the elective franchise; enacting laws for the discipline and instruction of the militia, the education of youth, the support of the poor, the relief of the afflicted, the encouragement of agriculture and all the useful arts, and the development of the resources of the state by the improvement of rivers and the construction of roads and canals; and finally, all the responsibilities and powers which sovereign states may assume and exercise.

Those expressly committed to the federal government, and subject only to the limitations prescribed by the constitution of this state, and that of the United States. These responsibilities affect the welfare, honor and happiness of the whole community of free people. A thoroughly distinguished for the refinement of its social condition, this community is only in the beginning of its existence. Notwithstanding its thousand towns, it has yet an extensive region altogether unoccupied, and with aggregate wealth of a million of millions of dollars; its soil is imperfectly cultivated, its minerals have hardly been disturbed in their beds, the natural obstacles to trade have only been partially removed and the perfect subordination of individual interests to the public is yet to take place. We are in the midst of communities which are neither hostile nor rival powers, nor yet dependent colonies, exhausting their wealth for our support; but free and prosperous states, bound to us not only by common sympathy and affection, but by the strongest ties of common sympathy and affection, and obliged by the natural direction of their trade to contribute to our revenues and increase our commercial importance.

When the federal government has discharged its duty in maintaining peaceful and advantageous relations with foreign countries, in conducting its fiscal affairs so as not to derange the business of the people, in making the necessary improvement of navigable rivers and lakes, and in providing proper facilities for the transmission of intelligence, it can do little more to promote the public welfare. On the other hand, the legislature which by salutary reform, effects a decrease in crime, raises the standard of general education, establishes a new safeguard around the elective franchise, or opens a new channel for commerce, does more to increase the general prosperity and even to strengthen the bonds of the union, than congress with its limited powers can accomplish.

The year which we are permitted to review, has been crowned with the blessings of health, plenty and peace. No pestilence has been abroad, severing the ties from which we derive our strength; no compulsion with disease and death the usual offices of affliction; nor has war, with its fearful desolation, diverted from domestic sorrows their rightful sympathy and consolation. Contentment has been in our dwellings, and the people have received as rendered it more easy to give than to withhold. The laws have maintained their supremacy; and the administration of justice has encountered no resistance. All the departments of the government have performed their services without interruption and with general success. The harvest has been followed by a partial resuscitation of confidence, and the general indications of a revival of enterprise, promises a return of prosperity. Sentiments favorable to frugal and patient industry, have regained their just influence; and the agitation which, for a time, threatened to array against each other manes having common interests, and to establish new, impracticable and revolutionary measures, in the policy of the government, has given way to a prevailing conviction that the public welfare is best promoted by mutual harmony and confidence, and by a conservative support of tried institutions and laws.

The comptroller will lay before you a full report of the fiscal condition of the state. The revenue derived from auction sales, within the fiscal year ending on the 30th day of September last, amounted to $164,821 88. The receipts for duties on salt manufactured at the salt springs were $155,961 16.

The revenue from auction sales, have been effected by the depression of commerce, and exhibit a diminution of $60,790 48, since the previous fiscal year. The quantity of grain manufactured, has been less in the year 1839, by about two hundred thousand bushels, and the revenue is therefore less by the sum of $23,301 96.

There has heretofore been in use one salt spring in each of the counties of Liverpool, Salina, Syracuse and Geddes. The water at Liverpool contains about seventy per cent. of salt; the springs at Salina and Syracuse, furnish about fifty-six per cent. each; and the water at Geddes yield about thirty per cent. All the springs, except that at Liverpool, furnish limited supplies. The very conservative efforts of the superintendent to discover additional sources of saline, have been crowned with success.

Three springs have been found at Salina, each furnishing water equal in strength and purity to that at Liverpool; and collectively, they will yield an ample supply for the manufactories at Syracuse and Geddes. I am happy in being able to state that the search for salt springs at Onondaga, has been successful, and that a revival of the manufacture of salt at that place, may be expected. As a consequence of these discoveries, we may anticipate a reduction of the expense of manufacture, and an increase of the quantity produced; results which cannot fail to be profitable to the treasury, and beneficial to our fellow citizens.

The amount of tolls and rents of surplus waters collected during the fiscal year, on all the canals of the state was $169,827 43
And the amount of charges on all canals, exclusive of interest on loans, was 886,011 87

Leaving a nett revenue, $1,200,215 58 being $36,981 18 less than the amount of nett income of the preceding year.

The amount of tolls and rents received during the fiscal year was $1,758,747 87, showing the gratifying increase of $159,365 55 over the amount received in 1839.

The productive capital of the school fund at the close of the fiscal year, was $2,023,907 95. The revenue derived from the sale of the proceeds of the appropriation of $165,000, from the income of what is called the United States deposit fund, was $268,400 45. The amount paid out for the support of common schools, was $278,010 30.

The capital of the library at Liverpool was $283,777 93. The revenue during the year, including $268,000 appropriated from the income of the U. S. deposit fund, was $46,935 84. The amount paid out and applied to the support of the higher establishments of learning, was $47,971 97.

All the colleges in the state are in a flourishing condition. The number of students attending these institutions is six hundred and sixty-two; of whom one hundred and twenty are in Columbia college, one hundred and fifteen in the university of the city of New York; two hundred and seventy-three in Union college; ninety-four in Hamilton college; and sixty in the college at Geneva. The communication from the president of the university, herewith submitted, shows that this institution is suffering a singular inconvenience from the partial liberality of the state.

The number of students in all the academies and grammar schools in the state, is thirty-four thousand six hundred and three. The number of the children attending the common schools is about five hundred and seventy thousand; and the whole number of children between five and sixteen years of age, is estimated as being a million and about six hundred thousand. There are about seven thousand common school districts in the state, including those under the charge of the public school society in the city of New York, in all of which schools are maintained during an average of eight months in the year. Of these school districts, there are very few which have not complied with the act providing for the establishment of school district libraries, and there are at this time in these various district libraries about one million of volumes.

Within the five years limited by the law there will have been expended in the purchase of books, more than half a million of dollars. Although an injudicious choice of books is sometimes made, generally in consequence of the influence of popularity, voyages and travels, works on natural history and the physical sciences, treatises upon agriculture, commerce, manufactures and the arts, and judicious selections from modern literature. Henceforth, no citizen who shall have improved the advantages offered by our common schools, and the district libraries will be without some scientific knowledge of the earth, its physical condition and phenomena, the animals that inhabit it, the vegetables that clothe its surface, and the minerals which under its surface, the physiology and the intellectual powers of man, the laws of mechanics and their practical uses, those of chemistry and their application to the arts, the principles of moral and political economy, the history of nations, and especially that of our own country, the progress and triumph of the democratic principle in the governments on this continent, and the prospects of its ascendancy throughout the world, the trials and faith, valor and constancy of our soldiers, and the inspiring examples of benevolence, virtue and patriotism exhibited in the lives of the benefactors of mankind. The fruits of this enlightened and beneficent enterprise are chiefly to be gathered by our successors. But the present generation will not be altogether unwarded. Although many of our citizens may pass the unimproved life, I trust the treasure it contains, the unpretending volumes will find their way to their fire-places, diffusing knowledge, increasing domestic happiness and promoting public virtue.

The institution for the instruction of deaf mutes, and the asylum for the blind, continue to make annual returns for the patronage they have received.

The legislature of 1839 very properly directed the immediate attention of the commissioners of the asylum for the insane to the completion of one of the four edifices contemplated by my predecessor. That building is designed to accommodate about two hundred and fifty persons, and may be prepared during the ensuing season for the reception of those who unhappily are to become its tenants. It duplicates upon the same system for the government of the institution. There is not within the range of the healing art, a department that requires so rare a combination of profound knowledge of the physical and intellectual constitution of man, with firmness, gentleness and devotedness, as that of the cure of mental diseases.

The geological examination of the state will be completed on the first day of June next. The public officers of the several state departments will be transferred to their new offices on the first of July. The building now occupied by those officers will, in pursuance of the law passed at the last session of the legislature, be fitted for the reception of geological, botanical, mineral and zoological specimens and the collection of the state. The final report of the geologists will be submitted at the next session of the legislature. Exhibiting a full view of the zoology, botany, mineralogy and geology of the state of New York, it will be a noble tribute to science and to the state.

The law passed last year concerning the redemption of bank notes has had a beneficial operation.—The currency issued by the several banking institutions and associations, has been assisted in its circulation. The bills of the City Bank at Buffalo have been redeemed by applying for that purpose $262,358 82 of the state fund, and $52,795 17 received from the contributing banks. The Wayne county bank at Palmyra, has recently been placed under an injunction at the instance of the bank commissioners, but the holders of its bills will sustain no loss. There remains of the capital of the state fund the sum of $206,486 76.

The number of prisoners in the state prison at Auburn on the thirtieth day of September last, was six hundred and sixty-seven; of whom two hundred and fifteen were received during the year ending with that day. In the same period, twelve died, thirty-five were pardoned, and thirty-four were sentenced to the penitentiary. The amount received for the labor of the convicts during the fiscal year was $61,355 35; and the amount expended for general support and necessary improvements was $57,925 10. The excess of the earnings of the convicts over the ordinary expenses of the prison, was $6,917 39. The number of convicts in the state prison at Mount Pleasant, at the close of the fiscal year was eight hundred and thirty-two. The number received during the year was three hundred and fifty-six; sixteen died, twenty were discharged by pardon, and one hundred and ninety-two by expiration of sentence, within the same period.

The amount of earnings was $83,501 14, and the expenses of the prison were $77,460 10. The fiscal condition of the prison is highly satisfactory, and their discipline has been improved. The convicts are encouraged to industry by the prospect of pecuniary reward, and the system of penitentiary industry to discipline, have altogether ceased. Sundry schools have been maintained, and in pursuance of my recommendation, the cell of each prisoner is always supplied with a volume of the school district library. This measure was followed by a gratifying improvement in the conduct of the prisoners.—Many venerable hours of solitary confinement are beguiled, resolutions of repentance and reformation are formed, and the inmates are in the pursuit of knowledge, and the contemplation of virtue and expanded by knowledge, are gradually prepared to resist the temptations which await them on their return to society.

The efficacy of the administration of justice must necessarily be impaired by a too frequent exercise of the pardoning power. Inconsiderate clemency operates as an encouragement to crime, and produces more misery than it alleviates. I have deemed it my duty to insist on the necessity of the pardoning power being exercised with the same narrow limits that have been heretofore observed.

It has been confined to those cases where the conviction was erroneous; where the punishment adjudged was excessive; where there were extenuating circumstances; where the justice were made; where the insanity of the prisoner showed that a higher than any human power had interposed between society and the offender against its laws; where diseases threatening life might be removed by a restraint to liberty; and a small number in which the appeal for mercy was commanded by the act, the tender justice of the prisoner, or, or by the temptations which prompted, or the mitigating circumstances which attended the commission of crime, and was supported by evidence of remorse and reformation. The whole number of persons discharged from the state prison by pardon during the last year, was fifty-four. The number pardoned in 1839 was thirty-three. Of those pardoned in the two years, the rights of citizenship were restored to only six in number, who were found to have been unjustly convicted.

The whole number of persons pardoned for every description of offence, including misdemeanors, in 1820 was 254, in 1821 311, in 1822 308, in 1823 100, in 1824 190, in 1825 172, in 1826 253, in 1827 193, in 1828 321, in 1829 338, in 1830 135, in 1831 151, in 1832 107, in 1833 160, in 1834 149, in 1835 131, in 1836 99, in 1837 109, in 1838 153, in 1839 64, and in 1840 85.

Sixteen convictions for murder have been reported to us within the last two years. Of these one conviction was reversed by the court for the correction of errors; one convict was pardoned because, although he pleaded guilty to the charge, it was contrary to the evidence that he had committed the crime; the sentences of three were commuted to confinement in the state prison for life, upon the ground of doubts of the justice of their conviction, or from mitigating circumstances; nine have suffered the penalty of death. Two are now awaiting the same fearful punishment. While many citizens deny the absolute right of government to inflict capital punishment, all agree that its too frequent operation as an encouragement, rather than a preventive of crime, is an interesting and important inquiry, whether that frequency does not now exist among us.

The commissioners appointed to mediate a settlement of the difficulties on the manner of Rensselaer, have prosecuted the duty assigned them in a spirit of equal justice to all parties, and will, as I am informed, soon be prepared to submit a report.

The canals were navigable from the twelfth of April until the first of December, and this navigation has been less hindered than in any previous year. An increased depth of water has been maintained, permitting an increase of burthen in the boats used, and materially reducing the expense of transportation. The time required to complete the repairs in the dam across the Hudson river, at Troy, which was carried away by a flood in February last. It was also found necessary to substitute new structures for several decayed locks and bridges, in order to maintain the navigation of the Erie and Champlain canals. The expenditures for repairs, have therefore been somewhat increased.

The enlargement of the Erie canal has been prosecuted with all the diligence permitted by the appropriations for that object. Various portions of the work have been finished, and others will be completed within the winter. The amount expended for the enlargement prior to the 1st of January 1840, was $1,650,661. The appropriations for that object, during the last year, were $2,500,000, and the surplus revenues of the canals applied to the same purpose, were $369,171. Thus, between the first day of January, 1840, and the first day of March next, the sum of $2,969,171 will have been expended, making the total amount expended to be applied to this great work, $7,523,832.

The experience of the present commissioners justifies belief that the sum of the enlargement will not exceed the corrected estimate submitted by their predecessors in 1839, viz: $12,172,666. Deducting the amount which will have been expended on the first of March next, $1,523,832, there will be required to finish the enlargement the sum of $10,648,834. That portion lying between Albany and Rome might be completed in the spring of 1842; the part extending from Rome to Rochester, might be finished by the spring of 1845; and the residue, from Rochester to Buffalo, in the spring of 1847.

The legislature, at its last session appropriated $100,000 for rebuilding the locks on the Chenango canal. The work has been commenced, and will be efficiently prosecuted. Fourteen of the new locks will be ready for use when navigation is resumed. A section of the feeder of this canal, one mile in length, was left in an unfinished state, and the navigation has been much hindered. The inconvenience has been felt more severely since the business of the canal has been increased by the transportation of coal.

The construction of the Black river canal has been continued. The portion of it from the Black river to Rome, about thirty miles in length, required as a feeder, may and ought to be completed as soon as an additional supply of water shall be required for the enlarged Erie canal. According to the corrected estimate of the former canal commissioners, the cost of the Black river canal and feeder will be $2,421,399.29. There was appropriated in 1836, the sum of $300,000, and in 1840 the sum of $250,000 was appropriated, to which is to be added the expense of a feeder from the Black river to the canal, estimated by the canal board at $290,057.66, which has been transferred to the credit of this canal, making an aggregate of $1,340,057.66; of all which, except about $160,000, had, at the close of the fiscal year, been devoted to the completion of this canal.

That part of the Genesee valley canal, lying between Rochester and Mount Morris, 35 miles in length, was opened for navigation on the 1st of September last. The branch canal to Danville will be finished and connected with the main canal during the present winter. The cost of the entire improvement was estimated by the former canal commissioners at $1,900,122.79. The sum of $1,000,000 was appropriated in 1837, and in 1840, the whole of which will have been expended by the 1st of March next.

Forty-five miles of the New York and Erie rail road, extending from its eastern termination at Poughkeepsie, westward to the Hudson river, at the county of Orange, will be in operation within the present month. The entire length of the road will be four hundred and forty-five miles. Various portions, seventy-two miles in the whole, are graded and ready to receive the superstructure. The whole line, chiefly in the valley of the Susquehanna, are under contract, and the company represents that it is about closing contracts for one hundred and eighty-eight miles. It represents further, that its route will be in capacity for business, and the cheapness and safety with which it can be used, be an exception to none in the United States, and with the exception of its higher grades, equal to any in England.

The company also communicates its expectation of completing the work within the period of two years. The cost of the road, as estimated by the company, will be about nine millions of dollars. The amount which has been expended is one million and fifty thousand dollars. The credit of the state, granted by the law of 1838, was three millions of dollars, of which four hundred thousand dollars were issued prior to 1840, and four hundred thousand dollars within that year.

The construction of the Auburn and Rochester rail road has been successfully prosecuted. That portion of the road which extends from Canandaigua to Rochester, and connects with the rail road from the latter place to Batavia, was put in operation on the 1st of September last. It is expected that the whole will be finished within the ensuing eighteen months; and there will then be a continuous line of rail roads from Albany to Batavia, leaving a space of only forty miles without such communication, between the Hudson river and Lake Erie.

The commissioners appointed to survey the routes for a rail road from Ogdensburg to Lake Champlain, have performed that duty. I lay before you their report concerning the feasibility and advantage of an improvement which I deem essential to the development of the mineral resources of the state, and to its general prosperity.

The Delaware and Hudson canal company, and all the other companies which have been aided by loans of the credit of the state, have regularly paid the interest on the stock issued for their benefit.

The debt of the state, exclusive of that portion which was contracted for the construction of the Erie and Champlain canals, and which is regarded as paid by the accumulation of funds set apart for that purpose, and exclusive also of the contingent liabilities arising from the loans of its credit, is as follows:

Debt of the general fund, exclusive of what is called the permanent loan to the treasury from the canal revenues,	$1,412,961 62
Debt for the lateral canals that are completed, including the recent loan for the Chenango canal,	3,351,784 21
Drafts contracted for unfinished works, viz:
For the enlargement of the Erie canal,	6,560,000 00
For the Black river canal,	1,500,000 00
For the Genesee valley canal,	2,500,000 00
For the Onondaga river improvement,	50,000 00

Aggregate state debt, $15,064,746 33
The net revenue of all the canals during the fiscal year, after deducting all expenditures and the deficiencies of the lateral canals, was $1,020,918 57

Leaving a clear surplus, after paying the interest on the debt for the enlargement of the Erie canal, and the $400,000 annually loaned to this treasury, $398,095 95
The commissioners of the canal fund estimate that the clear surplus of the current fiscal year will be $570,000 00
The expenditures from the general fund during the fiscal year, exclusive of the deficiency of the lateral canals, were $779,324 36
The receipts from the sources provided for by the act of 1836, were $729,211 01
From the payment of the balance due the preceding year from the canal fund, and from other sources, $400,113 35

The militia of the state consists of four divisions, of which four are artillery, three are cavalry and horse artillery, thirty-three are infantry, and three are riflemen. These are divided into three hundred and sixty-nine regiments and separate battalions. The aggregate number of citizens enrolled in one hundred and eighty-three thousand one hundred, of whom seven thousand three hundred and thirty-six are cavalry and horse artillery, nine thousand and eight are artillery, three hundred and fifty-seven thousand six hundred and thirty-one are infantry, five thousand six hundred and sixty-nine are riflemen, and three thousand three hundred and eighty-two are enrolled in independent uniform companies. The governor has the honor to announce a gratifying improvement in the armaments of the militia, it will excite no surprise that its discipline remains as imperfect as heretofore.

The report of the commissary general presents an account of the department. The state owns two hundred and sixty-two iron, and two hundred and fifty-five brass pieces of ordnance, with arms and impromptu equipments for a force of one hundred and fifty thousand men. Your attention is respectfully called to the subject of the commissary general, concerning the necessary measures for the preservation of the important property committed to his care.

I submit herewith the correspondence which has passed between the executive of Virginia and myself, on the subject of the demand made by the former for the delivery of certain fugitives from justice, charged with stealing a negro slave. In bringing the subject of this demand before you, your predecessor, I observed that it fell within the province of the executive department, and that the duties of that department arose under the constitution and laws of the United States, and not under the laws of the four states mentioned. Nevertheless, the respect I owed to the executive of Virginia, and to the legislature of that state, induced me to submit my action for the information of the legislature. The governor of Virginia, by direction of the legislature of that state, subsequently transmitted to me certain resolutions of that body, with a request that I would lay the same before the legislature of this state. I was at the same time requested by the executive of Virginia to review the position which I had taken. Both these wishes were complied with, and with what results will appear in the correspondence now submitted. I have thought it might not be uninteresting to the legislature to receive also a copy of a special message by the governor of Virginia to the legislature of that state, together with a copy of a circular letter addressed by that functionary to the governors of the slaveholding states.

In discharging the constitutional duty of recommending such measures as may be deemed expedient, I shall have occasion sometimes to express my views, submitted to your predecessors, and to past legislation. It has been recommended that the legislature should insist upon the payment by the federal government of the four millions of the surplus revenues, and require a relinquishment by congress of all claims for a reimbursement of the moneys constituting the United States deposit fund. The moneys deposited with the states were derived from impost and duties on articles of foreign commerce, and were the property of the people of the United States. It cannot be denied that when the distribution was made, it was well understood by congress, that the form of a deposit was adopted, only for the convenience of the president, and at the request of the secretary of the treasury, this deposit is retained as a part of the resources of the treasury which has laid unclaimed for during a long period of fiscal embarrassments, although congress subsequently to the distribution, expressed its views on the subject by demanding the moneys without its express authority. Having observed with much pleasure, the introduction into the house of repre-mentaries of a bill which would carry into effect the views I have heretofore presented to the legislature, I again respectfully submit the inquiry, whether the people of New York expect to withdraw from the support and endowments of common schools and other seminaries of learning, the sum of four millions of dollars thus derived, and pay it into a treasury which, when well managed, overflows with the tributes of their own commerce.

After the canal tolls, the duties upon the revenue are the duties upon auction sales, and upon the manufacture of salt at the salt springs. Previous to 1838, such sales were required to be made by persons appointed by the governor and senate. It was justly urged against this system, that it was a monopoly injurious to trade, and that it unnecessarily increased the patronage of the executive, and it was therefore abolished. It has been thought worthy of inquiry, whether the plan now pursued is not defective in provisions for securing the payment of the duties constituting the revenue.

The salt springs furnish a supply of water ample for the production of half a million of bushels of salt annually; but the demand within the region dependent upon them, scarcely exceeds half that quantity. It has been believed that by a judicious reduction of canal tolls upon the salt manufactured from the water of those springs, the market might be extended, the quantity of salt sold, and consequently the revenue of the state augmented. To these suggestions, I respectfully add that of a negotiation upon some equal basis with the state of Ohio, for a reduction of tolls upon our salt transported upon the canal to the western shore, might be reciprocated by a reduction of our tolls upon coal and other minerals from Ohio.

It was submitted to your predecessors that the administration of justice was hindered and delayed, and rendered oppressive, by the defective organization of the courts of law and equity; that the court of chancery was incompetent to its important duties; that causes remained on its calendar more than two years; that its patronage and powers were too great to be reported in a single paper; that the supreme court was oppressed with business, and could not perform it with the deliberation and despatch required by the public welfare; that courts of common pleas in the city of New York were overburdened by suitors, and had the form and organization of courts of justice, while they enjoyed little of the popular respect due to such tribunals, and performed few of their important functions; and that the compensation bestowed upon the judges, the clerks in chancery, and to the clerks of the supreme court, to county clerks, surrogate, notaries and supreme court commissioners for their services, to attorneys for the collection of debts, and to solicitors, counsellors and masters in the law, who were not, and were disproportionately to the services actually rendered, and was unnecessarily increased by the prolixity and tediousness of legal forms and proceedings. It was proposed to reorganize the court of chancery and the supreme court, to restore the efficiency and usefulness of the courts of common pleas, to enlarge the jurisdiction of the justices' courts, to introduce greater simplicity and brevity into legal proceedings, and to reduce the fees of the various public officers to such a scale as would afford just compensation for necessary services. Although the necessity of reorganizing the higher courts was earnestly insisted upon by my predecessor as well as by myself, his suggestions were not adopted by the legislature for several years, and has been made the subject of reference to the judiciary and to a special commission; yet such have been the difficulties attending any improvement, that it has been left to your consideration.

The only measures which have been adopted were temporary laws directing the appointment of two vice-chancellors in the first circuit, one in the eighth, and an additional judge of the court of common pleas in the city of New York. The legislature of 1839, reduced the fees and emoluments of registers and clerks in the court of chancery by a law which diminished the aggregate compensation annually paid to those officers by about the sum of $30,000.

The legislature of 1840, entitled itself to the lasting gratitude of the people, by benign measures designed to produce reform in legal proceedings. It dissolved the counties, and merged the offices of county courts and boards of supervisors in the appointment of county treasurers and county superintendents of the poor, a conception by which judges were made partisans, and the power of the executive department was extended to the selection of the people in the selection of those legal functionaries. The office of commissioner of deeds was abolished, except in cities; its duties were devolved upon justices of the peace, while the fees allowed for their duties were diminished; and thus no officer was dispenwith, in which there were about three thousand incumbents, and the burthens of the people were sensibly diminished. A law was also passed requiring all judgments designed to effect any real estate, to be recorded in the county in which the real estate is situated. The measure has relieved the situation of land of onerous charges, and much inconvenience, and has removed one of the causes which diverted business from the courts of common pleas to the extraordinary tribunals of the city and county courts was extended, so as to include controversies where the amount involved does not exceed one hundred dollars. It is gratifying to notice the progress of these domestic tribunals in the favor and confidence of the people. Their jurisdiction, which was originally limited to demands not exceeding five pounds or twelve dollars and a half. By other laws, the legislature reduced the fees of many other officers, and diminished the average cost of foreclosure of mortgages to a sum three times less than under the former system, that of collecting debts in actions not litigated to a sum of three months' fees, and the costs in litigated suits to an amount equal to three times the sum of the debt.

While there can be no doubt that these measures were in principle just, and that the reform which has been accomplished was necessary, it is complained by many who are conversant with the practical operation of the measures, that the reforms which have been passed are imperfect, liable to be evaded, and in some respects unequal in their operation. Such a result is by no means improbable. There are few of the works of man which are not susceptible of improvement. The objects of the present legislation, that laws seldom form an exception if the system which has been substituted in the place of one that has long prevailed, is, in any material respect, defective or unjust. I do not think that it will afford any place for the making of the necessary amendments. The charitable institutions under the patronage of the state, have heretofore been commended by you to the legislature; and I am happy to acknowledge that no appeal made in their behalf, has been unavailing. In the year 1839, the annual reports of the state required the visitation of the institutions for the deaf and dumb. The superintendent of the common schools was very properly charged with that duty.

The system of our penitentiaries it has been maintained that discipline ought to be tempered with kindness, and that moral influences should be employed to secure the submission and promote the reformation of convicts. Although some improvement has been made in the management of the penitentiaries, it is too often forgotten that the object chiefly contemplated in the adoption of our penitentiary system was the reformation of offenders. This object is of the utmost importance from considerations of prudence, as well as of philosophy. The unrepentant convict, after being released, spends a brief period in committing depredations upon society, and in corrupting youth, and then returns to the prison to exercise a vicious influence upon his fellow prisoners. Reformation can seldom be expected, without addressing the mind. I would have the school room in the prison fitted as carefully as the solitary cell and the work shop, and although attendance there cannot be so frequent, I would have it quite as regular.

The recent establishment of a separate institution for female prisoners, under the management of one of their own sex, reflects much honor upon the wisdom and humanity of the legislature, and the expectations of the legislature. Females convicted within the district from which criminals are received at the Auburn prison, are now sent to that penitentiary, where they remain until an executive order directs their removal to the prison for females, and such an order cannot be made for less than ten convicts. This temporary imprisonment of females in the prison at Auburn operates harshly towards them, and is inconvenient in regard to the management of that institution. It respectfully recommends that the law be modified so that females be directly conveyed to their proper penitentiary. The chief obstacle to a reformation of this class of offenders is the inflexibility with which society rejects them after their season of penance is past. While the cause of public morals requires their exclusion at least until they have given satisfactory evidence of reformation, humanity and expediency unite in recommending proper efforts to sustain those who are truly reformed.

It has been suggested that a retreat might be provided for them at Mount Pleasant, where, under the care of benevolent friends, they might maintain themselves by labor upon the good conduct they should be entitled to enjoy. I am informed that such a plan must necessarily be left to private liberty, and I am informed that such liberality is unwelcome to the undertaking, and I ready to engage in it, if a proper edifice can be obtained. There is a building which belongs to the state, situated near the prison, and now of very little use, which might be devoted to this humane purpose, at least until the experiment can be tested. The whole number of male convicts in the state prisons is 1,423, of whom 1,133 are white, 270 are colored persons. The number of female convicts is 74, of whom 40 are white and 34 are colored. The sex has a just claim to extraordinary efforts for the reformation of the small number of persons it furnishes to our prisons.

The success which has crowned the benevolent efforts of the founders of the house of refuge, has induced an opinion, that it would be profitable to establish a similar institution, in the western part of the state, where the subject of its discipline could be maintained at much less expense than in the city of New York.

The law which authorized the imprisonment of non-resident debtors, against whom no fraud was alleged, was repealed at the last session upon the ground that the practice operated injuriously to trade, and was inconsistent with the benign spirit of our code. There remains now only one relic of that usage in this state. Imprisonment for debt is allowed in actions brought in the federal courts; and by the laws of this state, our jails, designed only for the custody of criminals, are permitted to receive a class of debtors confined by writs issued under process issued by the authority of the United States. If you shall be of opinion that no principle of the federal union requires us to extend our country so far, we shall no longer witness the imprisonment of debtors, and the unfortunate debtors, with the sanction of this state.

The legislature at its last session, communicated to our representatives the opinion that congress was imperatively required to exercise its constitutional authority to make the necessary amendments of the bankrupt law. I beg leave to refer you to the views of that interesting subject which were submitted to your predecessors, and to suggest a renewal of instructions during the present session of congress.

Our currency was sustained in 1839 and 1840, during a period of suspension in most other states. For this advantage we are indebted to a supervision of the banks, to the establishment of a free banking system, to the reduction of the price of the circulation of small bills, and to the law of the last legislature regulating the redemption of banks notes. The policy looked most conducive to the public welfare, was the establishment of a law increasing the number of chartered banks, and from legislation hostile to time in existence; to correct defects in the new system of free banking, and to give it a fair trial; to require of all banking institutions and associations, and to require a prompt redemption of their circulating notes; but also that such notes shall be at all times kept in good credit throughout the state. These views having prevailed in the legislature during the last two years, the public conveniences which heretofore existed, have ceased; and it has happened for the first time within thirty years, that the legislature has relieved alike from applications for banking privileges, and from complaints against those by whom such privileges are held.

We, the most careless observer can scarcely fail to perceive that political power in this country resides chiefly with that portion of the people which is engaged in agriculture—the who studies the operations of the soil, and who is the most industrious of the agricultural classes a guaranty of peace, good order and the stability of our institutions. It might therefore be expected, that the policy of our government would be such as to favor the first and most important of our domestic industry. But no such favor has been extended; at least to the agriculture which employs free labor. Our workshops are chiefly in Europe; and yet the productions of the grain growing states are actually excluded from European markets by the operation of our laws. Nor is this all. We import productions similar to those of our own soil; hemp from Russia, wine and silks from France, wool from Spain, and honey from Greece. But the most important of our domestic industry has been called to the subject of agriculture, less from a hope that direct relief could be afforded, than under a belief that our fellow citizens engaged in its pursuits might be assisted in gaining the fruits of their industry. Agricultural improvement have engaged public attention. One contemplates the foundation of agricultural societies, upon the model of that established in Berkshire county, in Massachusetts. A second class of this kind has been heretofore formed in this and many other states, and have been productive of very beneficial results. The other plan proposed for the establishment of a board of agriculture, and was advocated by an eminent citizen, now deceased, who adorned his life and enriched the state by studies exclusively practical, and eminently useful.

We have many earnest admonitions against a state debt, and against a national debt, from those to whom this generation is indebted for all its experience of either. But I confess that the debt which it seems to me ought most carefully to be avoided, is that which results from an unrestricted importation of foreign legions, without any restriction of exports upon agricultural productions in exchange. The inhabitants of this state, alone, pay annually for foreign wares, more than the interest upon the cost of all its canals and rail roads; and for foreign ships an amount not less than the original cost of the Erie canal. Two provinces in Italy, with a population less than that of this state, and a climate represented as less genial to the mulberry and silk worm, export silk of the value annually of twenty-five millions of dollars. I cannot believe that our country, and especially this state, will always be content to retain its tributary condition. I have observed with pleasure that the school district library now in the course of publication by the enterprising Harpers, contains a very interesting and instructive treatise upon political economy and agriculture, which cannot be without their just influence. The fruits of the seed thus scattered, are sure to be gathered. It is only to be regretted that this generation should not allow itself to anticipate the harvest.

It was submitted to your predecessors, that while we are obliged by the laws of the United States, to preserve an extended and inconvenient organization of the militia, it would be just and consonant to the spirit of our institutions, that the arms and burdens of the service should be reduced and equalized. Our fellow citizens are enjoying the fruits of such a reform in the reduction of military funds, which was effected by a law passed at the last session.

The rank and file of the militia are mustered twice in each year, once by regiments, and once by companies, for the purpose of inspection, review and martial exercise. These parades would, perhaps, be less inconvenient if they were ordered on one or two consecutive days. Experience, however, has proved that they are entirely insufficient for instruction in military science. The number of days assigned for each duty will certainly not be increased. The law of Congress would be completely clogged by an annual muster for inspection on one day only; and for this inspection, a parade by companies would be more convenient than one by regiments. Uniformed companies might be safely relied upon for police, and the former and latter companies might be encouraged by abridging their term of service, and by furnishing them with arms from the state arsenal under proper restrictions. This would not affect the law prescribing the drills of officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, which might be beneficial to extend to this class some or all of the privileges allowed to uniform companies. Regimental courts martial are inconvenient and oppressive. If the commandant of each company were required to report all delinquencies to a justice of the peace, that officer could be charged with the duty of imposing and collecting the penalties prescribed by law.

A well settled principle of the society of Friends, that its members can neither conscientiously bear arms, nor contribute to military purposes. The constitution differs to these scruples, by exempting those who entertain them from the performance of military duty, and the law directs the state to avoid of which the law directs shall be applied to the support of the militia system. To this communication the Friends raise the same conscientious objection, and urge it in a manner sufficiently general and persevering to state that it is worthy of every our capacity, while their known liberality proves that the objection does not arise from any unwillingness to bear an equal portion of the burdens of government.

Every year produces instances in which the property of Friends is sacrificed, or their persons imprisoned for non-conscience sakes. In such cases, I have never refused to let the penalties imposed. But such a practice, if it should become general, would be an avowal of the existing power to abrogate a part of the organic law of the state. I am aware that the question has its difficulties. It is supposed that the grievance can only be removed by an amendment of the constitution; and there is not yet any sufficient evidence that the people are prepared to make this concession to the conscience of those who ask it in that inoffensive spirit which marks all their public actions. I assume to speak only my individual sentiments, when I say that I respect the principle of which the difficulty arises. Believing that war is the chiefest of national calamities, I am quite willing to see the principle of non-resistance obtain all the influence it is likely to acquire in this country, which, above all others, needs peace. For this reason as well as because I regard concessions to conscience in matters affecting justice as essential to a religious liberty, I should cheerfully consent to the amendment of the constitution in this respect.

I have on all proper occasions directed the attention of the legislature to the violations of the elective franchise. An important measure, in 1839, had been introduced in preventing what was called colonization in wards and towns, and in securing a more satisfactory scrutiny into the qualifications of persons whose right to vote is questioned at the polls. The act of 1840 regarding elections, and the law of 1841 have been universally satisfactory in its provisions for dividing the wards into election districts, and reducing the period for elections to one day. Although the registry of voters under the law is alleged by some to be imperfect, and by others has been deemed altogether unjust and unnecessary, I am free to acknowledge my conviction that it has excluded many illegal votes; and I am not possessed of any satisfactory evidence, that any operation has deprived any citizen of his franchise.

Legislation concerning the elective franchise ought never to be governed by partisan views.—The present season of repose from political contentions, and the opportunity which the present year will be satisfactory to all. I recommend that the time allowed for holding the general election and for the canvass in the several towns be reduced to one day, and that to facilitate the proceedings and promote the convenience of voters, the towns be divided into election districts, by their respective inspectors. To these measures it will be proposed by some of our fellow citizens to add a registry of voters in cities and villages, while a here will desire its extension throughout the state. The principle involved in these propositions is very simple. If a law establishing a registry can be passed, which in its operation will exclude no legal voters, and if illegal voting can in no other way be effectually prevented, such a measure ought to be adopted. But no law ought to be passed which will cause unnecessary inconvenience to legal voters. Your better acquaintance with the exigencies of the case, and with the sentiments of our fellow citizens, will enable you to select the most judicious as will be most conducive to the general welfare.

I recommend that it be made a felony for any unqualified person wilfully to vote, or cause his name to be registered; and that punishment be inflicted upon any person who knowingly and wilfully gives or abets such crimes. He who gives and he who takes a bribe should not only be severely punished, but be forever disfranchised. I recommend that the disfranchisement in such cases be made permanent, and that no person convicted in this manner as the incompetency to give testimony in his convictions for perjury.

It is too much forgotten that in establishing universal suffrage, we have brought into operation a new element of government. It is the equal distribution of political power among all the citizens over whom power is exercised. Universal suffrage is the condition by which we secure universal acquiescence in the laws. It requires the most perfect safeguards to secure its conservative and rightful action. We must not only establish all needful safeguards, but we must constantly maintain them, and after all, we must look upon the most elastic and effective policy, and to the enactments to secure the purity of elections. No efforts which overlook any class enjoying the elective franchise can be effectual to accomplish this great object.

Previous to 1802 no foreigner could be naturalized until after a residence of fourteen years. No one has better understood the tendency of republican institutions or entertained more just views of the principles upon which they were founded, than the illustrious citizen in a speech delivered in 1802 to secure an audacious of the naturalization laws. "Considering the ordinary chances of human life," he observed, "a denial of citizenship until a residence of fourteen years, is a denial to a great portion of those who ask it, and controls a policy passed from their first settlement, by many of the states, and still believed to be of consequence to their prosperity. And shall we refuse the unhappy fugitives of distress, that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extend to the stranger, and refuse it in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on the globe? The constitution has wisely provided that for admission to certain offices of important trust, a residence shall be required sufficient to develop character and discernment. But might not the general character and capabilties of a citizen be safely communicated to every one manifesting a bona fide purpose of establishing his life and fortunes permanently with us?" In concurrence with these suggestions, congress passed the act now in force concerning naturalization. Probably half the population of this country at that time complied with its provisions, and secured to themselves the rights of citizenship; and there cannot now be less than half that number of citizens of foreign birth in the United States. This class is largely increasing.

The number of emigrants arrived at the port of New York in 1823, was about twenty thousand. The number in 1840, was sixty-one thousand. Although the liberal and enlightened opinions of Jefferson have been the basis of our political rights for almost forty years, yet an issue is still maintained upon these opinions between a portion of our fellow citizens, and those to whom the law, passed in conformity with their sentiments, has given a full participation in our political rights and privileges. Hence arise mutual jealousies. The consequences of these jealousies are seen in the separation and alienation of classes having common interests; in the malintention of the weaker, in the perpetration of injustice on the part of the stronger, and in the demoralization of portions of both; in frauds at elections and fraudulent proceedings under the naturalization laws. The policy and measures which I have recommended are calculated to do far better for the respect, the elevation of the social condition of emigrants, and the assimilation of their habits, principles and opinions with our own.

Not much however can be accomplished by legislation, to effect the relations between masses of native citizens and the change desired in this respect, must be left chiefly to time and the operation of our institutions. But it is not so in regard to the rising generation. The census of the United States is said to show that there are at the present time eight hundred and seventy-one white persons in this state who have passed the age of twenty years, without having learned to read and write. Let us make allowance for any proportion of adult foreigners, and there yet remain a large number of uneducated native citizens. The number of children now growing up in the same manner, does not fall short of thirty thousand. These are the offsprings, not of poverty and affliction, but of poverty and affliction, the first fruits of the fruits of our penitentiaries, that of this neglected class, those are often well fortunate, who from precocity in vice, secure admission into the house of refuge or the state prison, through the ways of crime and knowledge to which they have been accustomed for pardon, is urged on the ground of neglected education, I have left it an imperative duty to appeal to the legislature, to render our system of education as comprehensive as the purposes for which it was established.

Of one thousand and fifty-eight children in the alma house of the city of New York, one-sixth part is of American parentage, one-sixth was born abroad, and the remainder are the children of foreignness; and of two hundred and fifty children in the house of refuge, more than one-half were either born abroad, or of foreign parents. The poverty, misfortunes, accidents and prejudices to which foreigners are exposed, satisfactorily account to be used, for the unequal proportion of their children in the neglected class to which the attention of the legislature was called. Although the excellent public schools in the city of New York are open to all, and have long enjoyed great success, yet it is to be feared that, nevertheless the evils there exists in its greatest magnitude. Obviously, therefore, something more is necessary to remove it than has yet been done, unless we assume that society consents to leave it without a remedy. These circumstances lead me to the reflection, that possibly a portion of those whose other efforts had failed to reach, might be brought within the nurture of the schools, by employing for their instruction teachers who, from their religious opinions, might be expected to regard the instruction of the neglected class as a duty. When the census of 1850 shall be taken, I trust it will show that within the borders of the state of New York, there is no child of sufficient years who is unable to read and write. I am sure it will show that, at that time, ten years before, there were thirty thousand children growing up in ignorance and vice, a suggestion to seek them wherever found, and win them to the ways of knowledge and virtue by persuasion, sympathy and kindness, was prompted by a sincere desire for the common good.

I have no pride of opinion concerning the manner in which the education of those whom I have brought to your notice shall be secured; although, I might derive satisfaction from the fact that the said abolition misrepresentation of the method suggested, no one has contended that it would be ineffectual, nor has any other plan been proposed.—I observe, on the contrary, with deep regret, that the evil still remains as before, and the question recurs, not merely how or by whom shall instruction be given, but whether it shall be given at all, or be altogether withheld. Others may be content with a system that erects a school and offers gratuitous instruction. But I trust I shall be allowed to entertain the opinions that no system is perfect that does not accomplish what it proposes; that our system is therefore deficient in comprehensiveness, in the exact proportion to the extent to which it leaves undisciplined; that knowledge, however acquired, is better than ignorance; and that neither error, accident nor prejudice, ought to be permitted to deprive the state of the education of her citizens. Considering the state, I could not enjoy the consciousness of having discharged my duty, if any effort had been omitted, which was calculated to bring within the schools all who are destined to exercise the rights of citizenship, nor shall I feel that the system is perfect, or liberally safe, until that object be accomplished.

Not personally concerned about such misapprehensions as have arisen, but desirous to remove every obstacle to the accomplishment of so important an object, I very freely declare that I seek the education of those whom I have brought before you, not to perpetuate any prejudices or distinctions which deprive them of instruction, but in disregard of all such distinctions, and in order to afford their education, less from sympathy, than because the welfare of the state demands it, and cannot dispense with it. As native citizens, they are born to the right of suffrage; and as such, they are to be taught to read and write; and in asking this, I require no more for them, than I have diligently endeavored to secure to the inmates of our penitentiaries, who have forfeited that questionable franchise by crime, and stand in the position of slaves, having been plunged by us into degradation and ignorance, has been excluded from the franchise by an arbitrary party qualification incongruous with all our institutions.

I have not recommended, nor do I seek the education of any class in foreign languages, or in particular creeds or faiths; but fully believing with the author of the Declaration of Independence, that even error may be safely tolerated, when reason is left free to combat it, and that, by indulging no apprehensions from the influence of any language or creed among an enlightened people, I desire the education of the entire rising generation in all the elements of knowledge we possess, and in that language which is the universal language of our countrymen. To me the most interesting of all our republican institutions, is the common school. I seek not to disturb, in any manner, peaceful and assiduous exercise, and leave of all, with contentment about faith or forms! I desire the education of all the children in the commonwealth in morality and virtue, leaving matters of conscience where, according to the principles of civil and religious liberty established by our constitution and laws, they rightfully belong.

The policy of the state in regard to internal improvements has been a subject of much difficulty. In 1839, the state having completed the Erie and Champlain, the Chenango, the Oswego, the Cayuga and Seneca, the Chemung and the Crooked Lake canals, and thus open to the city of New York an inland navigation of four thousand five hundred miles was found engaged in enlarging the Erie canal to the dimensions of sixteen feet in width by seven feet in depth, in making the Genesee valley and Black river canals, and in aiding by the loan of its credit, the construction of the New York and Erie, the Auburn and Syracuse, the Ithaca and Oswego, and the Catskill and Champlain rail roads.

The report of the comptroller showed that the debt which had been contracted for the construction of the Erie and Champlain canals was virtually paid, that the liabilities for the completed inland canals were about one-third of a million of dollars, which, added to the remaining debt of the state, exclusive of debts assumed for the unfinished works, made an aggregate of four and a half millions of dollars. The estimated expense of the works in progress, as appeared by the report of the canal commissioners, was about fifteen and a half million of dollars, which, if added to the existing debt, would have made an aggregate of about twenty millions, the same in fact, which would be required for the completion of the Erie canal, yet their future increase could not be a matter of question, and it was equally certain that they would be accelerated and augmented by the growth of the trade from the western states, and by the reduction of the expense of navigating the Erie canal when it should be enlarged.

The canal commissioners communicated to the legislature their opinion, that in a few years after the completion of the enlargement, the tolls would amount to three millions of dollars. If from this sum even one million of dollars were set aside for the expense of superintendence and repairs, the enlarged Erie canal would yield a revenue of two millions of dollars, double the amount required to pay the interest on the debt of twenty millions of dollars, and would thus secure the annual net revenue of the state, after the completion of the enlargement, would therefore be one million of dollars. The view thus taken in 1839, of the existing and anticipated condition of the state, was regarded by me as justifying the vigorous prosecution of the public works, and the expression of a confident hope, that the time had come when the state might realize the long cherished expectation of an extension of her system, of internal improvement. Experience has fully confirmed the positions then assumed, so far as they depended on the revenue from the canals. The tolls, during the season of navigation in 1840, were $1,735,747 57.

The legislature of 1839 had directed stocks to be issued to the amount of two millions eight hundred thousand dollars for the construction of the Genesee valley and Black river canals; and the legislature of 1838, under an earnest recommendation by my predecessor, had authorized the issue of stocks for the enlargement of the Erie canal had appropriated four millions of dollars to that object. The canal commissioners, under the express direction of the legislature, to put under contract, with as little delay as possible, such portions as could be readily completed, the entire enlargement with double bonds on the whole line, had made contracts for one-half of the whole improvement.

The legislature of 1839 came into the conduct of public affairs addressed themselves in good faith to the performance of their duties in regard to the public works. A sudden change, however, then occurred. The official report of the retiring comptroller, in relation to the following year, showed that the state, which had in 1836 induced the legislature to undertake the construction of three stupendous works, and had impelled the legislature of 1838 to expedite the prosecution of that one which was expected to be the most important, and in which the state had made, exhibited a dark picture of irredeemable debt and perpetual taxation.

The policy to which, under the auspices of the present administration, the state was committed, and to which it had already devoted millions of dollars, besides pledging its credit in aid of associated enterprise to the extent of four and a half millions was now represented as involving the people in a debt of forty millions of dollars, and what was still more extraordinary, all the improvements of the policy was assigned, not to the administration under whose auspices it had been adopted or to the legislature of 1836 and 1838 by whom all the appropriations had been made, but to an administration upon which had devolved the duty of finishing works long before begun, by which no money had been expended, and under which no appropriation had been made. In his report of 1839 the discovery was promulgated by the late comptroller, that the Erie and Champlain canals, whose revenues had been relied upon by the legislatures of 1836 and 1838 as justifying an expenditure of twenty millions of dollars in other enterprises, had never yielded a revenue equal to the interest on the debt incurred. Although the dimensions of the enlarged canal had in 1835 been fixed at seventy feet in width by seven feet in depth, and although one-half of this work was under contract, it was pretended to be further discovered that the enlargement had been undertaken upon a scale absurd in magnitude and profligate in expense.

It was proposed to reduce the dimensions of the enlargement to sixty feet in width by six feet in depth, and it was contended that no enlargement whatever would be necessary for the purpose of trade for a period of ten, twenty or thirty years. It was maintained that the opponents of internal improvement, by the construction of the Erie and Genesee valley canals and maintenance of the faith of the legislature, pledged in 1835 to the New York and Erie rail road company, were in policy as well as in fact, the enemies of the state and as reckless and dangerous as would be the creation of titles of nobility with patents of numerous landed estates requiring an outlay of twenty-five millions of dollars, and an annual stipend of more than one million of dollars to be paid upon the people. It was also insisted that the first business of the legislature should be to repeal the laws authorizing the construction of the Genesee valley and Black river canals, and also the laws authorizing loans to canals and rail road companies, to stop the enlargement of the Erie canal or circumscribe it within reasonable bounds, to raise the tolls on the lateral canals so that the revenues from those canals might pay the interest on their cost and the annual expenses of their repair, and to relinquish such of them as could not be made profitable.

And all this was urged as if the sudden abandonment of those enterprises would not involve in wretchedness thousands of families, and as if our state, whose successful policy had been imitated as a model by other states, and had elicited the admiration of mankind, had suddenly become destitute of wisdom, honor and good faith. History may safely be charged with the duty of assigning the reasons for such singular and unaccountable measures, however, for the present purpose to observe that the same canal commissioners who had in 1836 estimated the cost of the works which the state then assumed as fifteen and a half millions of dollars, when required in 1839 to re-examine their estimates, reported the cost of the same works at thirty and a half millions, and that consequently the debt to which the state had become committed rose from twenty millions to thirty-five millions, requiring an additional expenditure for interest of one million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The discovery of this extraordinary error in the estimates of the commissioners happened at a time when the state was brought to a crisis, the spirit of internal improvement pervaded the community, and our fellow citizens, relying upon the views of our resources before presented, were looking forward to various improvements in which they justly felt an absorbing interest. The immediate results at home and abroad were a severe shock to confidence in the faith of the state, and a serious expenditure for losses in each region in regard to improvements immediately beneficial to others, and impatience in every portion of the state for such immediate and large appropriations as would secure the completion of the public works before the approaching catastrophe should take place. It was doubted for a time whether the tendency of all this was to a desperate compromise, by reckless expenditure, or to an immediate suspension of all public works.

The policy recommended in this emergency was to retrench expenditures, and persevere in the construction of the public works with moderation and economy, to refer the plans of the unfinished improvements to the consideration of the legislature of the Canal, to competent engineers, to ascertain what portions of the same might be delayed without detriment to the public interest, what expense might be saved by executing other portions in an equally efficient, but more plain and economical, and to establish a canal board for the purpose of preventing erroneous estimates and inconsiderate legislation. It was moreover especially insisted, that, with a view to guard against a dangerous increase of debt and the possibility of taxation, all issues of stock should therefor be so limited that the whole debt of the state should at all times be kept within such bounds, that the interest on it should not exceed the net revenue from canal tolls, and that the increase of that revenue should be devoted to the extinguishment of the public debt. It was assumed, that although the adoption of this rule might seem to delay for a season the progress, it would ensure the completion of the great work in contemplation in different parts of the state, and it was maintained that the retardation, which had from such obvious causes become necessary, ought by no means to be considered a hindrance to the progress of the policy of internal improvement, but that on the contrary such retardation was indispensable, and was indeed the only mode of carrying it forward with certainty and success. This policy, which in its inception was clearly and ably sustained by the legislature of 1840, is respectfully recommended to your favor.

I tender you my congratulations upon the happy termination of the embarrassments to which it has been exposed, and the abundant evidence which it has afforded by the pillars of her strength and glory. Time enough has elapsed to show that our fiscal condition is sound; that, although the expense of our improvements was enormously estimated, our resources were abundantly adequate, and that, with judicious management, we may persevere firmly in the policy of internal improvement, with a confident expectation of accomplishing ultimately all that has been contemplated.

The Erie canal has, during the last season, been subjected to a test of its ability. From the opening to the close of navigation, a period of seven months and a half, there was an average of lockage at each lock of one boat in eleven minutes. The irregular arrival of boats has caused much detention and often delays of several days. The immediate enlargement, therefore, of the portion of the canal in which it is liable to the public convenience, and to the security of trade—1,805,123 barrels of flour and 1,293,195 bushels of wheat were delivered at the eastern termination of the canal during the past season. 616,570 barrels of flour and 1,467,061 bushels of wheat entered the canal from Lake Erie. Of the flour and wheat which entered the canal at Buffalo, 593,262 barrels of flour, and 723,025 bushels of wheat were received from the state of Ohio, 112,215 barrels of flour and 97,239 bushels of wheat from the state of Michigan, 13,726 barrels of flour, and 48,279 bushels of wheat from the state of Indiana, 2,259 barrels of flour, and 10,634 bushels of wheat from the state of Illinois, and 106 barrels of flour from the territory of Wisconsin.

These facts serve to show, not only how safely we may rely upon a continued increase of revenue, but also how much we are indebted to our system of internal improvement for the supply of our markets. If such nations as enjoy the use of the Erie canal is in an imperfect condition, and while the western states are yet in their infancy, no estimates heretofore made have approximated to the results which will be exhibited, when the Erie canal shall have been enlarged, the western states fully settled and their improvements completed.

The earliest practicable notice should be given of the time when the enlargement will be finished.—The capital, invested in boats and other property used in navigating the canal, exceeds the value of dollars. Very extensive business arrangements among our fellow citizens will be affected by the improvement in navigation, and time should be allowed to prepare for the change.

It is the peculiar and rightful province of the legislature to determine the amount to which the appropriations can be carried, and to give them their direction. I may be permitted, however, to observe that the object of internal improvement is not to confer local advantages, but to promote the general welfare; that, although revenue is necessarily an intermediate, it ought not to be the ultimate purpose of the system; that moderation and economy are required, even to save us from the effects of immoderation, then because the revenue is to render the system as comprehensive as the wants of the state. Legislative action should, therefore, always have in view the improvement of every region. Although some portions of the state may have others in point of population, no portion without fertility and resources of wealth. There are some regions in which canals would be impracticable or unprofitable, but there are none in which some form of modern improvement cannot be successfully introduced.

No one who studies the general welfare should wish to have the productions of one district dependent for a market upon the precarious navigation of fordable rivers, while those of another are transported upon an enlarged canal or by steam power; to see mails carried weekly through one portion of the state by the slow post wagon, while other portions of our citizens are receiving daily intelligence, transmitted by rail roads. Those who suppose that natural obstacles, wherever existing, cannot be overcome or removed, and that the course of trade cannot be affected by artificial improvements, may contemplate with advantage the success which has crowned the efforts of our state in counteracting, in its own narrow trade of its northern, and in its own narrow channels of trade than rivers down towards widely distant ports. Another example will soon be afforded in the successful attempt of the citizens of Massachusetts to divert from the valley of the Hudson at least the winter travel and trade between this and the sea shore; an enterprise which they are prosecuting firmly and rapidly, while in regard to that interest we are relying upon the season, but hazardous theory of leaving the course of trade to the laws impressed by God upon mind and matter.

Although seventeen millions of people have founded their cities and established their homes, order and less than one-third of the territory within the boundaries of the confederacy is occupied or appropriated. What remains is the national domain. Every acre of it has a volume—for its future improvement is as certain as the present cultivation of the soil. At the close of the war, the condition, the failure of the public credit effectually prevented the prosperity expected to follow the establishment of independence and the return of peace, while the efforts of the states to establish a more permanent union were embarrassed by their conflicting claims to the vast wilderness, lying between the western settlements. With magnanimity, characteristic of the revolutionary period, each state ceded its interest to the federal government as a trustee. The whole domain was thus made the common property of all, and it was pledged to the public creditors as a basis for the redemption of the public debts of the union. To 1823 those debts were discharged.

The revenues, derived from imposts upon imported merchandise, and, or ought always to be, adequate to the ordinary expenses of the government. Although those revenues may be temporarily diminished and diminished by errors in the laws regulating them, or by foreign war, or commercial revolution, yet they soon regain their regularity and fulness, and the chief difficulty in conducting the affairs of the government, both before and after 1823, was likely always to be, how to keep the revenues within the bounds of reasonable expenditure without withdrawing all protection from national industry. The reason is obvious. The states have reserved to themselves the powers of taxation, and powers of legislation for the public welfare, but have yielded to the general government an undue proportion of the taxes.

The maintenance of public defence is sometimes made a pretext for withholding from the states the protection of their commerce, and the preparation of military preparation in time of peace are generally preparations to compel subjection at home, and to subvert free institutions. It may safely be left to the people to decide, which are the best defenses of the people, the government, or the people. The army and navy, or standing armies—Danger from foreign aggression is manifestly diminishing, and if unhappily the scourge of nations shall fall upon us, the ability of the states to maintain the public defence will be proved, by the assistance which they bring from the revenues from the public domain.

Experience has proved that the organization of the general government is ill-adapted to secure accountability, at least to the part of its subordinate powers which are exercised in the several states. The people derive their powers, in too independent of congress, and every department is quite too far removed from the people to allow that popular supervision, which is so salutary in its operation upon similar functions in the several states. The contribution of the avails of the public lands was resisted last year by misrepresenting it as a measure by which the general government was to assume or guarantee the debts of the several states. So far as an independent proposition to the people, it was rejected by any one of the states. But the occasion and the motive for this misrepresentation having passed, it is hoped that the true question may now be brought before the people on its merits.

When we remember that the distribution, heretofore made of the surplus revenue, was attained with much difficulty, and then only secured an executive veto, by receiving the force of a loan to the states; when we remember that a bill which had passed both houses of congress and received the assent of the avails of the sales of the public lands was just for want of approval by the president, and that subsequently a veto to release, without equivalent, a large portion of the domain to the new states within which it lies, was passed by the senate, and that a similar bill is now before that body, we shall be satisfied that the true form of the question is, whether those revenues shall now be distributed, or be lost forever.

So long ago as 1806, the discharge of the national debt, and the consequent accumulation of surplus revenues from imposts and the public lands, were foreseen by the enlightened and sagacious statesman who then occupied the executive department of the United States. In two annual messages to congress, he earnestly insisted that the anticipated surplus should be appropriated to the improvement of roads, canals, rivers, education and other great foundations of prosperity and union, and suggested an amendment of the constitution for this purpose. The amendment, foreseen by president Jefferson, was delayed by interruptions of our commerce until 1823.

The eminent citizen, who in 1829 entered upon the duties of the executive department, observed, in his first message, that every member of the union, in peace and in war, would be benefited by the improvement of the inland navigation and the construction of highways, the several states were urged to "endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode that will be satisfactory to all. This, hereto adopted has, by some of our fellow citizens, been decried as an infraction of the constitution. It has been said, 'the several states have reserved to themselves the power of taxation.' All from that it has been employed at the expense of the states in the legislative councils. To avoid these evils, it appears to me the most safe, just and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenues, would be, its appropriation among the several states, according to the ratio of representation."

This suggestion by president Jackson met a favorable response throughout the union, and was especially approved in this state. The governor, in his message of 1830, observed: "The several states have reserved to themselves the power of taxation. It is a principle applicable to the extension of our public works, and is as applicable to no distant day from a new source. The duties upon the importation of merchandise are secured by the constitution of the United States to the general government, and have been its greatest source of revenue for all purposes. In a year or two, the national debt will be paid off, and as but a small portion of the revenue will be consumed in conducting the affairs of the union within the constitutional limits, and as there are prudential reasons for continuing the duties to a certain extent, they can be no valid objection to a distribution of the surplus revenues among the states, to be disposed of at their discretion. If constitutional obstacles exist against the measure, they may be removed by constitutional means."

I acknowledge my inability to present a full view of the benefits, this measure would confer upon the people of this state. Our seminaries of learning are now enjoying an annual endowment of two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, arising from the appropriation heretofore made.

The amount of no revenues from the public lands for the present year, an estimate by the secretary of the treasury of the United States, will be three and a half millions of dollars, of which the share of this state would be nearly six hundred thousand dollars. An interest of five per cent. of the settlement of the public lands may be received from the sale, and the population of the state of Indiana has increased, within the last ten years, from three hundred and forty-one thousand to six hundred and eighty-three thousand, and the population of this state, from thirty-one thousand to two hundred and eleven thousand. What the actual value of our share of such a distribution would be, cannot be estimated, but it may safely be assumed that it would far exceed all that we have expended in the construction of canals and roads, the foundation of charities, the erection of penitentiaries, and the endowment of colleges, academies and schools.

After such an accession to our revenues, the various enterprises of internal improvement would no longer be so far from the prospect of success, as they are now, from the influence of local jealousies and claims of taxation. The present generation would anticipate the blessings in store for posterity, and every portion of the state would be absorbed immediately to their enjoyment. It would be no longer our policy to increase our system of improvement but also to increase in other ways the general happiness. We are now obliged to practice a cold and calculating charity. We have more than twenty three hundred lunatics in the state, yet we have made provision for the relief of only two hundred and fifty. We have more than a thousand deaf and dumb persons, yet we are obliged to select by favor from among them, instead of putting the lights of truth and knowledge into the minds of all. Our alms-houses are perhaps sufficiently convenient for those who are brought into them by illness and vice, but do they afford all the enjoyments we would be happy to yield to the aged, the sick, the widow and the orphan, whose afflictions are the result of providential visitation, unattended by vice or error of their own? Should we longer contend about the appropriation of money devoted to education, if our funds are so abundant, and the full enjoyment of all our social and political rights, and the full enjoyment of the great fruits of our common school, the small compensation paid to teachers, if we could adequately increase the common school fund, upon which we rely for the education of more than half a million of children?

But if it be maintained that enough has been done for the relief of wretchedness and the improvement of the foundations of prosperity and union, what reason can be assigned why, with the revenues in question secured, the property of the people, the burthen of the people, should be diminished? Let us bring annually into the treasury of the state, her proportion of these revenues, and our fellow citizens can be relieved of the burthen of repaying common roads, and of paying tolls upon canals, rail roads and turnpikes, and of the heavy expenses of the administration of justice, and the support of schools and charities. We are sometimes called by the adversaries of internal improvement to content ourselves with the existing taxation. Who can object to a measure which secures almost secure a general exemption from the burthen of government?

But we shall derive from a distribution of the surplus revenues other advantages than those resulting directly. We are to partition the vast western benefits conferred upon other states. Our system of Internal improvement is only a part of that entire system contemplated by the father of our country, and relied upon by him to accomplish the object of his earnest solicitude—the binding of the states together in an indissoluble union of affection and interest. Not to dwell upon the importance of thus securing the ark of our political safety against the storms to which it must sooner or later be exposed, we have interests of a subordinate character, in the completion of the public works of our sister states. It is such a distribution of labor, we should be able, if we are not now, to connect the Chenango, the Chenung and the Genesee valley canals with the rail roads and canals of Pennsylvania; render them productive of the same advantage as time give a new impulse to our domestic trade. Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence river would no longer be separated from the central valley through which our commerce flows, but the vast territory which intervenes would be traversed by rail roads and canals, its forests would disappear, its soil would be rendered productive, and its mineral wealth be no longer left among the neglected resources of the state. Ohio proceeds in her system slowly. Michigan labors under great difficulties in her efforts to construct roads that will establish a connection between her inland regions and Lake Erie. Indiana and Illinois are struggling with extreme embarrassment in the prosecution of works upon a scale of equal magnitude with ours. It is not surprising that the financial difficulties of those states are magnified, and their credit trampled in the stock markets of Europe. But it is strange indeed, when we reflect that there are members of this confederacy, seeking close union with the great whole, that they should be visited with the censure of the federal government, in a season of embarrassment, and that the senate of the United States should, in the face of the necessities of the crisis, refuse to grant in their behalf a guarantee which they have never solicited and never desired.

One might suppose, from the cold speculations, sometimes heard among ourselves concerning the convenience of those states that they were bound, or at least rival powers, and that our security and prosperity rose with the decline of theirs. Yet it is otherwise. They are communities bound to us by interest, as well as by consanguinity between their citizens and our own; their interests are our prosperity, and no calamity falls upon them by which we do not suffer, although we may withhold our sympathy. The great lakes, about twenty-five hundred miles in length, may be regarded as a prolongation of the canal system, which is our isthmus which separates their waters from those of the Atlantic. Following the policy which has dictated the construction of our lateral canals, the states situated upon the shores of the great lakes, have actually undertaken the construction of improvements, to connect their interior regions with these inland seas. The Ohio canal, three hundred and twenty miles in length, reaching from Lake Erie to the great river which separates the states of Ohio and Kentucky, secures to us the trade of the nearest regions of the great west. The trade of the central portion of the west will be given to us by two other improvements, to wit: the Wabash and Erie canal, two hundred and thirty-four miles in length, extending from Lake Erie through the states of Ohio and Indiana to the navigable waters of the Wabash river; and the Miami canal, two hundred and ten miles in length, reaching from the lake to the north branch of the Ohio river, which flows into the Wabash canal at Fort Defiance. The canal of Illinois will extend to the Mississippi the navigation we now enjoy, and thus bring us the trade of the remotest western settlements.

These three canals the Ohio is already completed. That portion of the Wabash and Erie canal, one hundred and forty-four miles long, lying within the state of Indiana, is finished, and the remaining portion, ninety miles in length, which lies within the state of Ohio, is yet incomplete; but the late governor of that state, in his last message, gave the assurance that it would be ready for navigation during the present year. Of the Miami canal, which the state is under contract to complete, one hundred miles have been completed. Of the Illinois canal, which will cost about eight millions of dollars, about one-half is finished, and the construction of the remainder, unhappily retarded by financial embarrassment, will be completed in the aid which the state of Illinois has a right to claim from the general government, or by a speedy distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. When we consider the vast amount and value of the agricultural productions of the western states, and alone, the only one of those canals yet in full operation, we may form some imperfect conception of the interest we have in the success of the system of internal improvement in the western states. And when such conceptions become as familiar as they are just, we shall manifest more of wisdom than even of philanthropy, by lending our western brethren all the aid in our power to complete what none but frugal and enlightened states could ever have undertaken. Views similar to these were commended to your predecessors and received their approval. If they accord with your own, I respectfully suggest the propriety of renewing the expression of heretofore made in favor of the great measure I have advocated.

The people of the United States have, within the last year, in a manner prescribed by their own laws, in perfect tranquillity, chosen by free suffrage, the men to whom the administration of the government by whom all the powers of government shall be exercised shall again legal responsibilities, until those powers shall again return to themselves. However we may have differed concerning the questions which have been considered, still agree that the peace, fairness and good order which have attended the proceeding, furnish ample proof that the people may safely be allowed to discuss every measure that concerns their welfare; and that neither force nor violence will be resorted to by the victors, where power is limited, reason enlightened, and suffrage universal.

The chief magistrate of the union will enter upon his trust with favorable auspices. The public good interests and the public mind will be sustained. Fortunate in experience of public services in the senate and the field, in executive and diplomatic stations; fortunate in exemption from prejudice in favor of any erroneous policy hitherto pursued; fortunate in the payment of his country's obligations, and gratitude, and especially fortunate in having at once defined and reached the boundary of his ambition, the president can have no other objects than the public welfare and an honorable fame.

The people expect that he will preserve peace, maintain the integrity of our territory and the inviolability of our flag, co-operate with Christian nations in suppressing piracy and the slave trade, ally himself for every other purpose, conduct our foreign relations with frankness and fairness, terminate our controversies with the Indian tribes, regain their confidence and protect them against cupidity and fraud; confer the actions of the executive within the limits of the constitution, and abstain from interference with elections and the domestic concerns of the states; defer to the wisdom of congress, and submit to the will of the people; observe equal and exact justice to all men, and in the conduct of our foreign relations, be just, steadfast, that enterprise may not be disappointed; with economy, that labor may not be deprived of its reward; and with due accountability of public agents, that republican institutions may suffer no injury. I could not but understand that such expectations, no discomfit can affect—an opposition can embarrass him; for he will act in harmony with the spirit of the constitution, and with the sentiment of the people. And when, like him whose fame is unapproachable, but whose wisdom and moderation this distinguished citizen has adopted as his great example, he will have healed his country's wounds and restored her happiness and prosperity, he will enjoy the rare felicity of a retirement no honored than even his distinguished station.

When called two years since to survey the state for the purpose of submitting the result to the legislature, I could not but be deeply and long-enduring impressions of the wisdom of Dr. Witt Clinton. When considering how I could in any way contribute to diminish the burthens of the people, to promote public prosperity, to diffuse knowledge, to improve the mind and encourage the arts, to develop the resources of the state, to extend its internal communications by land and water, and equalize the advantages of free government among all my fellow citizens, I could not fail to see that its genius had marked out in all these respects the policy which the state, in the emphatic spirit expressed by her noble motto, could pursue to a higher and happier social condition than had ever yet been attained by any community. When reflecting upon the numerous and various difficulties which were to be encountered, I found in his great face an evidence that such a policy might be pursued with safety, although it must sometimes come in conflict with the passions and temporary interests.—Under the influence of feelings thus inspired, I ventured to express a hope that the time had arrived when the state was prepared to acknowledge her obligations to so distinguished a benefactor, but I trust not by any very long period, the justice of my fellow citizens.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.
Albany, January 5, 1841.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—24 SESSION. SENATE.

January 13. John Leeds Kerr, senator elect from Maryland, in the place of the hon. Mr. Spruce, deceased, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat. The senator presided, laid before the senate a communication from the treasury department, in compliance with a resolution, showing the rates of foreign and domestic exchange in the years 1838, '39 and '40.

Also, from the same, showing the number of clerks employed in the department, with the salaries annexed.

Memoirs and petitions were presented by Messrs. Leads and Rogers.

Mr. Graham, from the committee on revolutionary claims, reported a bill to authorize the building of a monument in commemoration of the services of brigadier generals Davidson and Nash, of the state of North Carolina, who fell in defence of their country.

The bills introduced yesterday as having been ordered to be engrossed, were severally read a third time and passed.

Mr. Merrick moved to take up the bill transferring the stock of the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to the state of Maryland.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said he wanted the United States to get rid of all stock of that kind, but, as the senator provided laid before the senate a communication from the treasury department, in compliance with a resolution, showing the rates of foreign and domestic exchange in the years 1838, '39 and '40.

Mr. Merrick appealed to the courtesy of the senator—that bill had passed the senate at the last session, but was lost in the other house, for want of a quorum. The legislature of Maryland was now in session, which made a speedy action the more urgent.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, thought the senator could call it up to-morrow, to which Mr. M. said he must assent, as there was no remedy.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the bill for a prospective and permanent re-emption system; when Mr. Preston rose and addressed the senate against the substitution offered by Mr. Calhoun for the motion of Mr. Crittenden.

Mr. Sevier said he had something to say on the bill, but as the hour was late he would move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow; which was agreed to.

Mr. Phelps submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be directed to pay, as a part of the contingent expenses of the senate, $500 to the order of the widow of Strahan T. Adams, an argonaut of the senate, to defray the expense of placing his body in a proper manner and in a secure coffin, carefully preserved in the public vaults in the city of New York, and in Washington, and the expense of transportation of the body to his friends in Vermont, and its burial there; and that the secretary be directed to pay to the said widow the salary of the deceased for the residue of the term for which he was elected.

After some few remarks from Messrs. Wright, explanatory of the object, and its being in conformity with the wishes of the deceased, Mr. White and Mr. Kerr, the resolution was adopted.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after a short session, adjourned.

January 14. The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Clay, from the American peace society, asking that congress would appoint a special committee to reconsider and report on the memorials presented to congress by the said society, and Mr. C. said, while he fully concurred in the benevolent sentiments of the memorialists, yet such was the multiplicity of his engagements, and press of public and private business, that he did not feel authorized to ask for a special committee, but if any senator thought it would be better to have such a committee, they could move it.

Also, a memorial for a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Wright, from inhabitants of Schenectady county, New York, asking a select committee to reconsider and report on the peace society memorials of last year. Mr. W. said it was the same in effect as that just offered by the senator from Kentucky. He could not ask for a special committee; and as the memorials had been referred to the committee on foreign relations, he did not know what better disposition to give them. On suggestion, they were laid on the table.

Also, several memorials from inhabitants of New York, all concerning the same subject.

Also, one remonstrating against the passage of a bankrupt bill during the present session.

Also, one from merchants, mechanics and traders of the city of New York, asking that the passage of a bankrupt law should be deferred to them, and going into the provisions of the same to some length. On motion, this was ordered to be printed.

By Mr. Reggie, from citizens of Buckport, Maine, remonstrating against the repeal of the fishing bounty. The memorialists state that the cod fishery is a dangerous business, yielding with the bounty but a scanty and precarious subsistence.

By Mr. Chey, of Alabama, from the legislature of the state of Alabama, resolutions against a protective tariff.

Several private petitions were also presented by Messrs. Norell, Allen, White and Chey, of Ala.

Mr. King, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill to regulate the commerce and intercourse with the port of Cayenne, in French Guiana, and to remit certain duties, with an amendment.

Mr. Lin, from a select committee, reported the bill to authorize the adoption of measures for the occupation and settlement of the territory of Oregon, and for extending a portion of the laws of the United States over the same.

On motion of Mr. Chey, of Alabama, the senate proceeded to consider in committee of the whole the bill to regulate the land office of the state of Indiana, and for other purposes; which, after being amended, was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Merrick moved to take up the joint resolution for the transfer of the stock of the United States in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to the state of Maryland.

Mr. Mangan said, this was a subject of great interest to the citizens of this District. It would be expected that the subject would have been introduced, a memorial in relation to this very matter, appended to which were some voluminous documents which had not yet been printed and laid on the tables. He therefore hoped that the subject would be presented in a more complete manner than it was. It could be passed over informally for the present.

Mr. Merrick said he was willing to grant any reasonable delay for the purpose of allowing the senator to look into it, and as it was not, therefore, out of its place, he would consent that it should lay over until to-morrow. There was a particular reason why it should be as prompt action on it as possible. The committee for the District of Columbia had the memorial and documents alluded to by the senator before them, and had reported the joint resolution, which had passed the senate at the last session without discussion, but had been lost in the other house for want of time.

Mr. Grady said the bill had just been put into his possession this morning (holding up a volume of at least 200 pages), which would require examination before it should be prepared to vote on it. Whether he could be ready by to-morrow or not, would depend on the order of business.

Mr. Merrick said, if the senator had to read that volume before arriving at a knowledge of the subject, the resolution must be defeated by the delay, and therefore he could not consent to the postponement. The citizens of this District had memorialized congress not to transfer a stock belonging to the United States, and of which the government was the entire owner. What was it to them any more than to other cities of the union, what congress pleased to do with the stock? He could see no reason for their particular interference! What were the facts in the case? Why, that this stock was hanging like an incubus over the state of Maryland, and was not worth a thing to the government. The United States had no command and no contributors in aid in carrying the canal to such point as would make it beneficial to any body. Maryland asks that the stock of the government may be transferred, on certain conditions as specified in the resolution, and for which the government has an equivalent, and she would then go on to complete the canal. Will you hold out (said Mr. M.) to the stock, to speculate on the public spirit of Baltimore? If so, the state will not go on with the work. It was a kind of dog-in-the-manger, neither doing it yourselves nor suffering the state to do it.

Mr. Walker said several years since he had introduced a bill somewhat similar to that now pending, for the relinquishment of our stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal to the state of Maryland. He had done this, after a conference with a distinguished patriot, (gov. Kent), then a senator from Maryland, but how called to a higher and a better sphere. At that time he (Mr. W.) had called upon the secretary of the treasury to report what dividends the government of the United States had received from its stock in all these canals, namely, this canal, the Delaware and Chesapeake canal, the Chesapeake and Potomac canal, and the canal at Louisville. The report then stated that these stocks, with the exception of the last, had never yielded any dividend, that they had no market price, and in all probability never would yield any dividend, especially the stock in the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. Under these circumstances, Mr.

W. said he was in favor of dissolving this unprofitable partnership between the government and this company, by the surrender of this stock to the state of Maryland. Mr. W. said that whoever would read the early debates and reports on this subject in both houses of congress could not fail to observe that this government had originally intended to proceed pari passu with the state of Maryland in subscriptions to this canal, considering it as a great national work terminating in this District. This design was now abandoned, most happily, by the government, together with the whole inland improvement system by congress, but in the mean time the state of Maryland, relying on the continued co-operation of this government in the construction of the canal, had proceeded and expended enormous sums towards the completion of this great work; and whilst he (Mr. W.) could not, even under these circumstances, vote to appropriate more money to this or any other similar object of internal improvement by this government, yet he thought it subject to the justice to state that the state, without an equivalent, but for the full equivalent provided in this act, namely, the use of this canal forever, free of all toll, for the transportation of the troops and munitions of war of this government, and the mail, and for the use of the army, and the surrender to the states in which they were located, all the stock held by this government in all other canals, and thus complete the divorce between this government and the whole inland improvement system. In relation to the stock held by this government in the Louisville canal, Mr. W. desired to cede our stock in that canal to the state of Kentucky as auxiliary to the great object of relieving that canal free of all toll, and thus remove the heavy taxation which was now imposed on those who travelled or transported products on the Ohio river. In relation to the opposition on the part of this city to this transfer, Mr. W. said he regretted it. The completion of this canal by Maryland would be of vast importance to this city, and she ought to support this bill as facilitating the completion of this work; and as to the idea that Maryland might by obtaining the control of this stock abandon the canal to this city, by carrying the canal from a point out of this District to Baltimore, it was delusive. Mr. W. said a survey for Maryland, by the accomplished head of our topographical bureau, had been made, by which it was demonstrated that all other canals except that from this canal to Baltimore were impracticable, except the route running immediately from and through this city.

Mr. W. said that this bill had passed the senate at the last session by a large majority, and he hoped it would be permitted to pass without delay.

Mr. Chey, of Ala. said it was the hour for taking up the special order. He should, as he said before, vote for disconnecting the government from all these stock operations; but he thought it proper that Maryland should be allowed to make her case on the subject. He therefore moved to postpone it for the present.

Mr. Merrick would greatly prefer to take the question on postponement. It was important to Maryland that she should know what was to be done, as she would have to regulate her policy accordingly.

The question was then taken on the postponement, and carried, and no time counted. The senate then proceeded to take up the special order—the bill providing for a permanent and prospective pre-emption system; when Mr. Sevier rose and addressed the senate, and was followed by Mr. Smith, of Indiana, who spoke for nearly four P. M.

January 15. Mr. Hamilton presented the credentials of the hon. Thomas Clayton, senator elect from the state of Delaware from the 4th of March next. The credentials were read and placed on file.

The vice president presented the credentials of the hon. Richard H. Bayard, of the state of Delaware, senator elect from that state, which were also read and placed on file.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and referred:

By Mr. Robertson, a joint resolution of the legislature of Illinois, requesting such legislation as might be necessary to secure the remission of duty on rail road iron.

By Mr. Beauregard, several memorials from the city of New York, all praying that, if any bankrupt bill be passed, banks and corporations may be included in the co-operation of the government.

As several of the memorialists in extenso, setting forth the reasons why banks should be included, Mr. B. moved to have them printed and laid on the table.

Petitions were also presented by Messrs. Wall, Williams, Hubbard, Wright, Dixon and others.

Mr. Crittenden moved to postpone all the orders of the day for the purpose of taking up the bankrupt bill.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. Kiag, Benton, Lumpkin, Hubbard and others.

Some conversation ensued on a point of order; when, after the usual remarks from Messrs. Walker, Norell and others—

Mr. Crittenden withdrew the motion, but said he should review it, and press the subject on the consideration of the senate immediately after the bill under consideration as the present special order was disposed of.

The senate then took up the special order, being the prospective pre-emption system; when Mr. Smith, of Indiana, rose, and closed the remarks which he had intended to be acted on promptly, that the banks of the District might be informed of the ground on which they are to stand. If it were not acted on at once, it would be lost for want of time. Mr. M. thought it would be agreeable to gentlemen to take a recess from a discussion which could have proved wearisome, from its long continuance, and refresh themselves with the consideration of another subject that would be doing a great service to the people of the District.

Mr. Chey, of Alabama, thought he would prove recent to his duty if he acquiesced in the wishes of the senator from Maryland. He had always been disposed to do justice to the people of the District of Columbia on the several subjects which he could not consent to have a measure of high public import, and one in which he felt so deeply interested, passed over to make room for any bank bill whatever.

Mr. Merrick was aware he was at the mercy of the senate; he thought the bill would not create much debate, as it had been so amply discussed at the last session, and he would feel greatly gratified if the senate would grant his motion.

Mr. Bayard asked if the senator really thought the bill could pass without discussion, when he must have been aware of the amendment offered by him, (Mr. T.) He was not well enough to enter into the discussion then; and, besides, there had been no consensus on the several subjects of the treasury for certain information in relation to banking that had not yet been furnished, and which was germane to the matter in question. Did not the gentleman know that the banks in Baltimore had refused to resume the currency on the 1st of January, and that they were ready to resume as soon as the banks in Philadelphia did? Well, the banks in Philadelphia had resumed; but the banks in Baltimore were not compelled to follow, and he presumed they would not resume until the 1st of February, and the Virginia banks would not resume till the Baltimore banks did; and thus neither would pay their debts until they were driven to it by the people of those states.

Mr. Merrick made a brief reply, which was not distinctly heard, but insisted on his motion.

Mr. Chey, of Alabama, moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. Merrick called for the yeas and nays, when there appeared a tie for the motion 23 against it 15.

Mr. Southard then rose and addressed the senate until a late hour, when he gave way for a motion to a joint.

And then the senate adjourned.

January 16. Mr. Fulton presented a resolution of the legislature of Arkansas in relation to ceding the public lands in the states in which they lie; also, a memorial asking that lands may be appropriated in the town of Hays in the neighborhood of Salt Springs.

Mr. Sevier presented memorials of the legislature of Arkansas for the improvement of the navigation of the Washita river, and in relation to the appointment of inspectors for the steamboats on the Arkansas river.

Memorials and petitions were also presented by Messrs. Tomlinson, Beckham, Merrick, Rouse, Henderson, Norell and Wright.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on the judiciary, reported, without amendment, a bill to amend the judicial system of the United States.

Mr. Wall, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend the second section of the treasury to compromise with the creditors of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of New York.

Mr. Chey submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to communicate to the senate the plan of a permanent change in the tariff, the duties and general principles of which the states, in his annual report of the 7th ultimo, has considered, and on which he is ready to report at any moment either house of congress may express a wish to take consideration of.

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be also directed to report, as soon as practicable, a plan of assessing the value of goods, wares and merchandise in the ports of the United States instead of foreign countries.

Mr. C. expressed a wish to have them acted on at once, as they are substance matters of importance connected with the subject.

Mr. Clay, of Ala. thought they had better lie over one day according to the rule. Mr. C. however, afterwards, withdrew his objection, and the resolutions were adopted.

Mr. Tupper submitted a resolution to the effect that the senate do, on Monday, proceed to the election of a sergeant-at-arms.

Mr. Clay hoped still there was no necessity for any action at this late period of the session.

Mr. Benton introduced the following resolution, which he prefaced with some remarks that occupied the senate about half an hour, in which he went into some calculation on the effect of the drawback on being reduced in the same ratio with the duties on the imports specified:

Resolved, That the committee on finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the drawback on refining sugar, manufactured oil of foreign materials, and exported, in proportion to the reduction which has taken place and will take place, under existing laws, in the duties on imported sugar and molasses; and of reducing the duties on sugar and molasses in proportion to the reduction which has taken place, and shall take place, under existing laws, in any duty on imported oil.

On motion of Mr. Rogers,

Resolved, That the committee on commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the registering and enrollment of such foreign ships as shall be sold to American citizens under the order or decree of any court of the United States, made on process of law, though the same may now have been built in the United States.

The following bills were then considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed: The bill supplementary to an act entitled "an act to encourage the introduction, and promote the cultivation, of tropical plants," approved 7th July, 1838.

The bill to confirm the survey and location of the lands in the state of Mississippi, east of the Pearl river, and south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude.

The senate then took up the special order, being the prospective pre-emption system; when Mr. Benton rose and delivered the remarks which he commenced yesterday.

On motion of Mr. Clay, of Alabama, the senate adjourned.

January 18. The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the navy department, in compliance with a resolution, in relation to experiments made on American water-rotted hemp, and expressing the opinion that it will be found fully equal to any imported hemp.

Mr. Buckner took occasion to say that he felt pleased that the senator from Missouri (Mr. Breckenridge) had called attention to that subject. Mr. Myerby had made many experiments, which had fully proved the superiority of American water-rotted hemp. Samples had been sent to him, (Mr. B.) and he thought he was on judge himself, he had submitted them to those that were, who had given it as their decided opinion that this article of American culture had fully sustained the reputation which it even gives it. According to usage to the navy department, the contracts were given out to the lowest bidder, and in that case Mr. Myerby, who made these valuable experiments at great expense of time and money, would lose the advantages that ought to accrue to him by competition for the contract.

The communication was ordered to be printed, and referred to the committee on naval affairs.

Also, from the treasury department, a communication, in compliance with a resolution of the senate calling for information in relation to the public lands.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Benton, from citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of any bankrupt law this session, and, if it is to pass, that banks and corporations be included in the compulsory process.

By Mr. Tappan, from citizens of Ohio, asking the passage of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Huntington, from citizens of Connecticut, asking the passage of a bankrupt law.

By Mr. Brewster, asking a modification of the pilot law of 1837.

Mr. Moulton, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill to repeal or modify the pilot law of 1837.

Mr. Tupper, from the committee on the library, reported a joint resolution for the settlement of the claim of Langtree & O'Sullivan for the Madison papers.

On motion of Mr. Clay, Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury furnish the senate with a statement showing, in tabular form, the lands the titles for which were closed under the relief laws of March 31, 1820, and of February 23, 1821, giving the number acres in each district, the value in dollars per acre, from five to ten, from ten to fifteen, from fifteen to twenty, from twenty to thirty, from thirty to forty, from forty to fifty, from fifty to sixty, from sixty to seventy, from seventy to eighty, from eighty to ninety, from ninety to one hundred, and one hundred and upwards; the amounts paid on each sale, respectively, and foreclosed; the rates at which such sales were closed per acre; also the gross amount of lands forfeited under each of these laws, in each district; the amounts in gross for which they were originally sold; the gross amounts paid on them and forfeited; and the gross amounts finally received from them.

On motion of Mr. Sturgeon, the bill making an appropriation for the patent office was taken up in committee of the whole.

Mr. Culbourn moved to strike out the $1,000 for agricultural statistics, on which a debate arose; in which Messrs. Cadmus, Pomeroy, Walker, and others participated. No question was taken, the hour having arrived for taking up the special order.

The prospective pre-emption bill was then taken up; when Mr. Clay, of Ala. rose and delivered his views in favor of the amendment of the senator from South Carolina.

Mr. White was desirous of addressing the senate on the bill before them, but if senators were not desirous to take the question that evening, he would move to postpone it further consideration until to-morrow; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. Clay said that a communication had been received from the treasury department, while he was out, in answer to a resolution submitted by him some time since, calling for information in relation to the public lands. The document was one highly interesting, inasmuch as it presented information which more than bore him out in the views he had advanced on the subject. He did not desire to appropriate the time of the senate to read it, but would move for a thousand extra copies.

After some remarks by Messrs. Walker, King, and Clay, the motion to print 1,000 copies with the accompanying maps was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Blair, the senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and after a short session adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Wednesday, Jan. 13. The house opened the consideration of the case of contempt election from the third congressional district of Pennsylvania, between Messrs. Naylor and Ingersoll.

Mr. Naylor resumed his argument (from yesterday) in support of his right to the seat now held by him and continued (without concluding) until after 3 o'clock, when he gave way to a motion, by Mr. Carter, that the house adjourn.

But the motion was withdrawn for a few moments, in order of reading the report of the committee on the speaker's table a first and second time, and referring them to appropriate committees.

The speaker laid before the house a number of communications, namely:

1. A communication of the commissioner of public buildings, containing an account of the expenditures on those buildings during the year 1840, viz:

The treasury building	$107,768 82
The patent office	83,906 78
General post office	128,472 23
Mail	3,899 62
Court house at Alexandria	3,636 13
Capitol	2,596 39
Capitol square	6,390 14
President's house and grounds	1,018 18
Foundation for statue of Washington	1,990 74
Potomac bridge	2,369 91
Sundry small items for Pennsylvania avenue, track, water, &c.	949 77

Referred to the committee on expenditures of the public buildings.

2. A letter from the secretary of the treasury, with the list of clerks employed in the various branches of the treasury department during the year 1840, with the pay of each. Laid on the table.

3. The follow-up letter from the postmaster to Mr. Blair.

Post office department, Jan. 11, 1841.

Sir: In compliance with the second section of the act of the 2d of July, 1836, to reorganize the post office department, I have the honor to submit estimates for the service of that department for the year commencing July 1, 1841.

For three years past the increasing demands for mail service have exceeded the means of the department to supply them. And these demands will rather be increased than diminished during the next fiscal year.

But as the expenditures of this department are to be provided for from its own resources, I must be governed in submitting estimates for appropriations by the probable amount of the revenue which will accrue, rather than by the extent of the demands of the country for mail accommodations.

The first quarter of the current fiscal year has exhibited a decline of about five per cent. as compared with the corresponding quarter of the last year; the accounts of the second quarter are not closed, but, unless there is an improvement in the two last quarters, there may be a declension in the revenue of the year, compared with the year ending the 30th of June last.

It is believed, however, that the next fiscal year will exhibit an improvement in the revenue, equal to at least six per cent. over that of the past year.

Upon this assumption, the revenue for the year commencing the first of July, 1841, will amount to $4,811,620, which forms the basis of the estimates submitted.

As the annual revenue, it is estimated, will be required to be expended for the mail service for the year commencing on the first of July, 1841, as follows, viz:

Mail transportation	$3,260,000
Commissions to postmasters	1,650,000
Ship, steamboat and way letters	40,000
Wrapping paper	23,000
Office furniture	6,000
Advertising	5,000
Blank bags	23,000
Blanks	33,000
Mail locks, keys and stamps	16,000
Mail depredations and special agents	22,000
Clerks for offices	710,000
Miscellaneous	66,620
	$4,811,620

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

JULIAN NILES.

Hon. R. M. T. Hunter, speaker of the house of reps.

Mr. Briggs stated to the house that his colleague (the hon. Wm. S. Hastings) was so indisposed as to be unable to discharge his duty as a member of the committee on private land claims, that he had to have him excused, and that a member be appointed on the committee in his place; which the house assented to, and Mr. Hastings was excused accordingly.

Mr. Adams moved that the bill reported by him at the last session, from the committee on manufactures, to increase the duty on imported silk goods, be made the special order for the 27th of the present month.

Mr. Jones, chairman of the committee of ways and means, would be happy to afford his aid to any proper means for bringing money into the treasury, but the process proposed by the bill now proposed to be made a special order was entirely too slow for the present pressing wants of the treasury. He had proposed other means, on which he wished the early action of the house, to replenish the treasury, and which would do it much more speedily than the bill reported by Mr. Adams. Mr. J. then referred to the bill on the subject of the interest on the attention of the house as soon as he could do so. He therefore felt bound to oppose the motion to give the bill any preference in the business of the house.

Mr. Adams said that, in his estimation, his bill, which was a bill to provide the means for paying of debts and loans, was much more deserving of favor than bills to increase the debt or make new loans. Mr. A. then went on to show the propriety of his motion.

Mr. Jones said he could not, under the circumstances he had already stated, give Mr. Adams' bill a preference at this time. He went into a short review of the condition of the treasury, its immediate and present wants, and of the means by which he proposed to supply them.

Mr. Cushing was sorry to see Mr. Jones confine himself so exclusively to the wants of the treasury during the present session; he hoped that either the government or the world were coming to see on the 3d of March next.

Mr. Hubbard here moved an adjournment which was lost.

Mr. Jones called the yeas and nays on Mr. Adams' motion.

They were taken, and the vote resulted as follows: yeas 64, nays 23.

A quorum not voting, the house adjourned immediately.

Fishing bounties, either out of the treasury or reserved from the accruing revenue 300,000
 Most of the expenses for taking the census 550,000

So that, (continued Mr. J.) if the government should realize the whole amount of revenue expected in the 1st quarter, there would still be a balance left to be provided for of one million nine hundred and thirty thousand dollars. This was exclusive of the estimated balance in the treasury on the first day of the present month, (January), and when every dollar now in the treasury, or estimated to be in the treasury on the first of the present month, should have been applied, there would still be a deficiency of three hundred and twenty-nine thousand one hundred and forty-five dollars.

But we all know that this estimated balance in the treasury could not so be applied, because a portion of it had not, in point of fact, come into the treasury. The sum of one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, due from the bank of Natchez, which was expected to have been paid, had not, in fact, been paid; and not more than five or six hundred thousand dollars of that estimated balance was in the eastern section, where it could be made available in a very short period, where full three-fourths of the expenditures would be required to be made.

The residue of the amount was scattered over the country in land offices, mints and other small repositories of the government, in sums of seventy, eighty, or, it might be, ninety thousand dollars.

Such being the means of the first quarter of the year, and such its liabilities during the same time, it became the duty of the treasury, it was intended that the treasury should meet its liabilities and preserve the faith of the country, to make temporary provision for the deficiency which would arise during the first quarter.

He knew he should be told that the deficiency was permanent, and that provision should be made to meet, not a temporary, but a permanent deficiency. If this assumption was well founded, the consequences would follow necessarily.

He knew he should be told that to determine the question, we must look to the best sources of information within our reach. Where should we look to satisfy ourselves? It would seem to him that we should look to the officer to whom all the avenues of communication and information were open, whose duty charged him with the general supervision of the whole subject of the finances—the secretary of the treasury.

Mr. J. then read from page 7 of the annual report of the secretary of the treasury the following passage:

"It may be stated, from the best data in possession of this department, that the receipts, under the existing laws, will probably be as follows:

From customs	$19,000,000
From lands	3,500,000
From miscellaneous	800,000
Aid the expected balance in the treasury available on the first of January next	1,590,955

The aggregate of ordinary means for the next year would then be 21,160,955

There will be nothing more, either of principle or interest, due from banks, which is likely to be made available, except about 220,000

A power will exist, under the act of 21st of March, 1840, to issue treasury notes till a year from its passage expires, but not to make the whole emission outstanding at any one time exceed five millions of dollars.

This will furnish additional means, equal to the computed amount which can be issued at the close of the present year, being about 312,619

It now there may be added, from these several sources, so much as to make the whole mean for the next year 21,729,473

On the other hand, the expenditures for 1841 for ordinary purposes, if Congress make no reduction in the appropriations requested by the different departments, are estimated at 10,250,000

This would leave a balance in the treasury, at the close of the year, equal to 5,173,478

But certain payments will also be made on account of the funded and unfunded debt, unless Congress authorize contracts to be formed for extending the time of their payment. Thus, there will be required—On account of the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District 149,200

For the redemption of treasury notes, for the time being, as they are to be under the present laws, and then the amount returned within A. D. 1841 will probably not exceed 4,500,000

Estimated balance in the treasury at the close of the next year, after all payments whatever $324,272"

Mr. J. continued. He thought he was satisfied the committee, if the report of the secretary of the treasury were to be relied on, that the resources of the government, for 1841, were not only ample to meet all the current charges upon it during the year, but also to reduce the four million five hundred thousand dollars of treasury notes now outstanding, and that portion of the public debt which would fall due in the year, and would leave a balance of $324,272 at the close of the present year. He thought the committee must also be satisfied that the great inequality between the receipts and expenditures, at different periods of the year, rendered it necessary that some temporary provision should be made to meet this inequality.

That the measure calculated to obviate these difficulties was to be expected, from the report of the secretary himself, appeared too manifest to require comment. On pages 10 and 11 of the report the secretary said:

"It has already been shown that the whole amount of receipts in 1841 will probably be sufficient to discharge all ordinary expenditures, and those parts of the outstanding debt, funded or unfunded, which may become due. But the preservation of a suitable balance in the treasury may require more than will probably be left after satisfying other purposes."

And again:

"It will be arranged, however, that though, under existing laws, the arrangements, enough might be obtained within the whole of 1841 for the objects contemplated, yet not a due or sufficient proportion in the first quarter; because by that time all the measures are not likely to go into full operation, nor will the anticipated increase of receipts from the actual receipts of duties under existing laws. Unusually heavy expenses will also fall on that quarter in the next year. In addition to a full portion of most of the current expenses, and the whole pension payments for taking the census, and for the first installment of the debt of this District; several of them as early as the first day of January.

"From these circumstances, and the considerations that all which is due from the banks may not be then paid, and that the balance in the treasury, under the policy adopted by Congress of late years, will of necessity be small, while the fluctuations and inequalities are very great between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year, it can be seen that the emergency, from causes that have on former occasions been explained at length, it must be obvious that entire safety requires a conditional power to be reasonably conferred on the executive to obtain at any time within 1841 such subsidiary means as may be needed for a few months, and as may be sufficient to enable the treasury punctually to discharge, during that year, all the liabilities imposed by Congress."

Mr. J. continued. He was aware that we should be told that these statements were not to be relied upon; and that we should probably be referred to the estimates submitted at the commencement of the last session, and be told that the receipts of the year fell far short of the estimates submitted to the secretary. It was true that the estimates of the receipts of last year were not realized; but every gentleman would recollect that these were mere estimates made upon data which had hitherto furnished a rule both for the secretary of the treasury and for Congress, and for the people, indeed, were it not for these times of derangement in the monetary affairs of the country, when embarrassment prevailed almost the whole land, and when revolution after revolution followed in rapid succession, they would have been correct.

Every gentleman knew that the foreign commerce of the country furnished the chief basis of the revenue of the government; and, knowing this fact, who would be at a loss to account for the extraordinary falling off of the revenue for the last year? Who could have anticipated that the imports during the last year were sink below those of the preceding year 57 millions of dollars; or that the imports of 1839, exceeding, if he recollects right, 160 millions, would have sunk down again in 1839 to less than 105 millions?

At 20 minutes past 4, Mr. B. gave way to the resolutions, and then rose and said: Mr. J. has shown that the committee rise, et tu quoque voluit. The committee rose and reported that fact. And the house adjourned.

It was also known to every member of the committee that the principal sources of our present revenue were most seriously affected by commercial prosperity;—by the crops—by the banks—and by the credit system both of our own country and of foreign nations. Let those gentlemen who made objections to this bill, and who submitted to the commencement of this year look a little further into the subject. Let them turn their attention to the year 1816; and they would find the revenue of the government sinking, in a single quarter, from 9 millions to less than 3 millions. Look at the proceeds of the sales of public land; and it would be found that in 1826 the amount paid into the public treasury from that source exceeded 24 millions of dollars, (more than half of what had been received in 1827), and that in 1827 the proceeds of such sales amounted to less than 3 millions of dollars. In Michigan alone, the receipts for 1836 exceeded 5 millions; and in 1838 they sank again to $154,000. Louisiana and Mississippi, where, in each of the years of 1827, 1828, and 1829, the proceeds exceeded 5 millions, they sank down in 1838 to $96,000.

He adverted to these facts for the purpose of showing how difficult it was for any man, with even the best means of information before him, to arrive at any thing like exactness in the estimate of the circumstances in which this country was placed. But if the report of the secretary was to be relied upon—and he (Mr. J.) knew no safer reliance—it followed, necessarily, that there must be ample means on the part of the government to meet its liabilities during the year; but those means could not be received in time to meet the liabilities as they were expected to arise. In this state of things it was that Congress was called upon to furnish such means as it might, in its wisdom, deem just and proper. The friends of the administration, regarding the deficiency as temporary, proposed so to use the credit of the government as to anticipate for a short time the revenue of the next year.

The friends of the opposition, regarding the deficiency, not as temporary, but permanent, would in all probability propose, as they had done on former occasions, to provide a loan; and this, in his judgment, would furnish the means for meeting the national debt. It was needless for him to say that he was opposed to any such measure, unless required by circumstances of unusual necessity. He adverted briefly to the difficulties likely to arise, in the present condition of our country, in the negotiation of a loan, and pointed out the objections to which, in his opinion, it was liable.

He discovered any party feeling or consideration in the matter, and concluded by expressing the hope that those into whose hands the government must shortly pass might be enabled to direct the ship of state as to preserve in their purity our republican institutions, and to enhance the prosperity of our common country.

Mr. Burdett then took the floor, and offered the proposition which follows. Some desultory conversation arose as to the proper mode of submitting it, whereupon Mr. B. withdrew it with the intention, heretofore to offer it in due form. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole on the state of the union be discharged from the consideration of the bill in relation to treasury notes, and that the subject of making provision for the wants of the treasury be referred to the committee of ways and means, with instructions—

First. To bring in a bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to borrow ten millions of dollars on the credit of the government, and to issue bonds or scrip therefor.

Second. To bring in a bill imposing duties for additional revenue on wines, spirits, liquors, and on other articles, between the States imported into the United States, but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy and spirit of the act of March, 1834, concerning sales of public land.

Mr. B. who some time since, on a resolution offered by him, (of a character similar to this proposition), commenced some remarks, which he never was enabled to finish, being cut off by a call for the orders of the day, never resumed the subject, and addressed the committee at great length on the financial condition of the government, past, present and prospective.

At 20 minutes past 4, Mr. B. gave way to the resolutions, and then rose and said: Mr. J. has shown that the committee rise, et tu quoque voluit. The committee rose and reported that fact. And the house adjourned.

CHRONICLE.

APPRENTICES. At the sitting of the court of common pleas for Rockingham county, Mass. a decision was made in relation to the liability of those who hire runaway apprentices, when of more importance to guardians and parents. An action was brought by Samuel M. Deekam against Jesse Robinson, for harboring Ezra Robinson, the plaintiff's apprentice, and defendant's son, who had left the plaintiff before an expiration of his apprenticeship. The defense was that there was no apprenticeship in law, because there was no writing of indenture, with the defendant by the contract either party might put an end to the engagement when dissatisfied, and that the boy, at the time the defendant was satisfied with his conduct, was merely at home upon a visit of three weeks duration. The court charged the jury, as we learn from the Free-Press New Letter, that the boy might be an apprentice without an indenture, with the defendant if they believed the plaintiff's evidence; was liable for harboring him, while at home, and while at any other place, where he afterwards sought with the defendant's consent. The decision of the court therefore is that the apprentice is under the direction and control of his master, whether bound by written indenture or not, and that no parent or guardian can interfere to the injury of the master, either by taking the apprentice home, or placing him under a new master, without rendering himself liable to the plaintiff, if any other person employs an apprentice without consent from the master, he is not only liable for damages but for the earnings of the apprentice for the time of his employment. The decision will serve to remove all erroneous impressions abroad in relation to the obligations and duties of apprentices, their guardians and employers.

THE BANKS RESUMING SPECIE PAYMENTS. The banks of Pennsylvania resumed specie payments on the 1st inst. The Philadelphia papers state that some of the banks of that city have received more specie than has since been demanded of them by the numerous holders. The officers of the banks at Baltimore, last week, came to a conclusion not to resume until those of Virginia should resume also. The last mail brings us the following proceedings of the banks in Richmond. At a meeting of the presidents of the bank of Virginia, the Farmers bank of Virginia, and of the Exchange bank of Virginia, at Richmond, and being authorized to act in the premises, they respectively bore, January 18th, 1841.

Resolved, unanimously. That the banks will resume specie payments immediately after the 1st inst. of Baltimore; and that the president of the Farmer bank be requested to report this resolution to the banks of Baltimore, with a request that an early day be fixed upon for the resumption.

Signed,
JON BENTENBROGH,
WM H. McFARLAND,
JAMES H. McFARLAND.

At a meeting of the board of directors of the bank of Virginia, Saturday, January 16, 1841, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Resolved. That the bank of Virginia will unite with the other banks of Richmond and the banks of Baltimore in designating any particular day for a simultaneous resumption of specie payments by the banks of Richmond and Baltimore; and that the president of this bank be authorized to communicate with the other banks referred to, and to enter, on behalf of the bank of Virginia, into the necessary mutual engagements for carrying into effect the object of this resolution.

Resolution in Delaware. All the banks in Wilmington, Delaware, resumed specie payments on the 15th. There was no run upon any, and all passed off quietly.

CENSUS OF MICHIGAN. The last census shows the population of Michigan to be 211,305. In 1830 the population numbered only 95,000. The increase, or full seven per cent. during the last ten years, which is a greater increase than that of any other state in the Union.

DEATHS. The number of deaths in Boston in the year 1840 was 1,947, or 1947 more than in 1839. The population of the city, according to the last census, amounts to 93,192. The deaths during the last year, therefore, were 1 in every 47 1/2 of 93,192 inhabitants, or about 1 in 47.

The whole number of deaths in Salem, during the year 1840, was 252, including six in the infant line.

The whole number of deaths in the city of New York, during the year 1840, was 298. It appears from the returns that the most destructive disorder among us is consumption, which has claimed 75 victims, 11 of whom died in September, 10 in January, and 9 in October—being the most fatal months.

ENSLAVING AN ENFORCEMENT IS FORGOTTEN. The supreme court of Ohio ordered, recently, that an enforcement on a note purporting that a party was a slave, had been made, and which was written by the maker in the presence, with the concurrence, and by the direction of the payee, is a receipt, the alteration or erasure of which by the payee will be forgeries.

EXPORTS TO CANADA. We learn from the Cleveland (Ohio) Herald, that the clearances at that port, for various ports in Upper Canada, for the last year, were 896,560 bushels of wheat, and 70,915 bbls. of flour. The quantity of corn shipped during the same time, is estimated at 15,000 bbls.

FLOOR, at Uniontown, Pa. is selling at $3 per barrel.

FOGITIVE SLAVES. An Upper Canada paper says, that within the last four years more than 15,000 runaway slaves have made their escape into Canada from the United States.

HARRISBURG is a great town. We have three daily papers, the Intelligencer, Telegraph and Chronicle. Three semi-weekly—the State Capital, Gazette, Kyrtland, and Free Press. One weekly—the Advertiser, edited by C. Waitsinger, Gospel Publisher and Temperance Advocate. In all, 11 papers, in a population of 6,500. It may be well enough to say that we have also ten churches, and that the religious and moralists are pretty well attended to at the seat of government.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT. The following says the Chronicle, in a true copy of a resolution of the House of Representatives, which passed the legislature of New Hampshire at its late session.

An act to abolish imprisonment for debt. Section 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, That no person shall be arrested, held to bail or imprisoned on any process or execution founded upon any contract or debt which shall accrue or be made from and after the first day of March next.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all acts and proceedings in relation to the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby repealed.

Approved Dec. 23, 1840.

INSURANCE ABSTRACT OF MASSACHUSETTS. The abstract of the returns of the several insurance companies in Massachusetts, has been recently prepared for the use of the legislature of that Commonwealth. This abstract, as we learn from the Daily Advertiser, exhibits in tabular form, the names of the respective companies, the amount and modes of the investment of their capital, amount of risks, &c. The number of companies in 1840 was 224, with an aggregate capital of $3,190,000. In 1839, 191, with an aggregate capital of $1,765,000. Of the capital of the Boston companies in bank stock, of banks in the state $3,059,925, real estate $1,000,000; mortgages, $819,412, and the remainder in various other stocks and securities. The amount of the marine risks in 1840 was $3,278,727, and of the fire risks, $4,938,251. The amounts of marine losses in 1840 were $6,176, and in 1839, $1,941,514; and of fire losses, $757,644. The marine losses paid by the 19 out of Boston offices was $110,000, and by the 180 out of the other offices was a single loss paid by the Springfield Fire Insurance company. The amount of fire risks by these 190 companies was $2,155,645, and of marine risks $252,146.

NEW STEAMERS. A gentleman who recently arrived in the Acadia, informs us that the miniature iron steamer building by the Great Western steamship company (Bristol), will register about 3,000 tons, but that the actual tonnage will exceed 3,000 tons, or about 600 tons more than any ship ever built. A great saving in stores will be gained in consequence of the adaptation of iron for her hull, while the great weight of water will be comparatively small, owing to the great buoyancy possessed by iron vessels. She will consequently be able to carry coal sufficient to sustain her for a week, and backward passages. Her engines are to be of 1,000 horse power, and it is confidently expected that the average voyage across the Atlantic will be reduced to ten days.

LAKE ERIE TRADE. The Philadelphia Seafarer states that there are now 200 sail-vessels employed in navigating Lake Erie, giving employment to 3,000 persons. Previous to the year of 1832, and the building of the Great Western Ferry at Piquette Isle, (Erie) but few vessels navigated the waters of Lake Erie. Some ten or a dozen tiny masted and masted-hulled vessels, and scattered in the lake, and the trade was so small that early date, fully adequate to the wants of commerce. There are now two ships of 300 tons each. The class of vessels now employed are mostly hermaphrodites, and scattered in the lake, and the trade is so small that early date, fully adequate to the wants of commerce. LONDON. if we except some of the Chinese and Japanese cities, it is the largest city in the world. It contains an entity inhabiting in the five parishes of Manx, Chesham, Manx, Connecticut, New Hampshire and Vermont. It has nearly 100,000 men, women, and children, and 660,000 lbs. of animal food annually. Its retail is at least $3,000,000 per annum, and its profits of at least $500,000,000 annually. There are 273 churches, 207 dissenting churches, 16 theatres and 6,000 public houses.

M. M. NOAH, of editorial and fictitious memory, has been appointed judge of the court of sessions, N. York. We sincerely congratulate him.

MAGNETIC ATTRACTION it is ascertained is communicated to iron or iron fixed perpendicularly with a bar magnet, the instrument is attracted, and it is rendered uncertain if this fact be not attended to in relation to Copper fastenings should be substituted in iron.

METHOD CONFERENCE. The Virginia annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal church commenced its session in this place on yesterday—the 18th.

bishop Morris, of Ohio, president. The inclemency of the weather has retarded the arrival of many of the ministers, though a large number are already in attendance. It is expected that 30 to 40 will be present. All the churches in town have been politely tendered for the services of the conference. The session of the conference will probably be protracted more than a week. [Lynchburg Virginian.]

THE MILITIA of the United States, according to the latest returns, consists of 1,472,202 men.

MISSENGER OPERATIONS. We find in the Boston Journal the following summary of the extensive operations of the American board of commissioners of foreign missions, extended to the year 1840, recently published. The receipts of the board during the year have been $211,631.64, and the expenditures $240,000.27. Connected with the board there are twenty-five benevolent societies, of which the following are what are 123 ordained missionaries, ten physicians, nine preachers, fourteen teachers, ten printers and bookbinders, sixteen and a half, and 196 native assistants—making in all, 365 missionary laborers from this country. There are besides, fifteen native preachers and 167 other native assistants—in all 677, which are under the control of the board, and are supported wholly or in part by it.

Conceded, also, with the board, there are fifteen printing establishments; fifty-five churches, containing 2,234 members; eight seminaries for boys, containing 412 students; 100 female boarding schools, containing 109 pupils; ten female boarding schools, containing 235 pupils—making the whole number of students in the seminaries 412, in the boarding schools 907; of free schools there are 415, containing 31,006 pupils. The number of books and tracts printed the past year is 685,000, containing 43,507,406 pages; and the whole number of papers printed in the establishment of the board is 223,150,311.

THE GREAT MISSENGER. The following extract of a letter is from a gentleman formerly of this city, now residing in St. Louis, from whence he writes:

"I went the other night to look at the greatest curiosity that I have ever seen. It is called the Great Messenger, and is the skeleton of the greatest animal ever known. It was found about 200 miles west of this place, in this state, by a German. It measures to the top of the ribs 20 feet high, is 32 feet long, has two tusks that are from 2 to 12 inches in diameter, and are 16 feet apart. The head and tusks weigh 1,100 pounds. The parts of the knee in the fore leg are inserted in the middle of the tusk, and are required five years from any other animal. He appears to have been web-footed, has no hoofs, but toes about 9 or 10 inches long. The owner has computed its size, in comparison to a man, and he is just 100 times larger than the ox, so that he must have weighed when alive, 100,000 pounds, (50 tons). He is now in the hands of the great messenger, and is exhibited for breakfast. The six musicians, who play at the exhibition of the animal, sit up in his ribs. The owner has been offered $20,000 for him. He leaves for New York, where he will be taken to New York, thence to Europe. It is worth a good fortune for any six men, but the owner will not sell it." [Troy Whig.]

NEW YORK CRIMINAL STATISTICS. In the court of general sessions, New York city, during the past year there were 131 trials, 322 convictions and 129 acquittals. Of the convictions 111 men were sentenced to the penitentiary and 14 women. 72 men were sentenced to the penitentiary and 2 women. 30 men to the city prison and 2 women. House of refuge 5 boys. 189 prisoners were discharged by the court.

In the court of oyer and terminer there were 6 trials, all convictions.

During this period the grand jury found 1,008 indictments, and dismissed 254 complaints.

In the court of sessions there were 329 trials, of which there were 252 convictions and 24 acquittals for petit larceny, and 228 convictions for assault and battery and 32 acquittals.

The court discharged 493 prisoners, sentenced 300 men and 22 women to the penitentiary, 30 men to the city prison 69 and 32 to the house of refuge 23 boys and 2 girls.

TRADE OF ALEXANDRIA, D. C. We were at once gratified and surprised to find, by official documents, that the trade of Alexandria, in the year 1836, was decidedly on the increase. The value of the exports in 1836 was $205,225—in 1840, $811,716.

The number of clearances of foreign vessels in 1836 was 24, and the tonnage 1,184. In 1840 the number was 106, and the tonnage 16,723.

The entrances of foreign vessels in 1836 were but 20, and the tonnage 4,866. In 1840 the number was 64, and the tonnage 9,911.

There are now belonging to the port 9 ships, from 321 to 677 tons; 2 barks and 12 brigs.

VATTENMANN'S SYSTEM of international exchange of books is highly approved of in Canada, and a complete system of exchange has been arranged in accordance with the plan, has been placed in Mr. Vattenmann's charge, for exchange with the government of France, and with the government of the United States, and a great number of other honorable gentlemen, have engaged in the furtherance of the project.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

The steamship Columbia, captain Ludkins, arrived at Boston, on Thursday the 21st inst. bringing Liverpool papers of the 31st inst. and London papers of the day previous.

The Columbia brought 65 passengers from Liverpool for Halifax and Boston, and took on board 14 at Halifax for Boston.

We find important and interesting features in the intelligence brought by this arrival, and as usual, place the whole news in an abridged form without delay before our readers.

The news is of considerable interest, as there appears to be a general stir throughout Europe in reference to the aspect of political events.

In regard to the cotton and money markets, the news is highly interesting and satisfactory. Cotton continues to advance and the money market is improving.

The news from China is of the most important if there be any truth in it. We apprehend, however, that it will turn out to be a mistake growing out of the taking of Chusan. It is against all probability that the British could have taken Peking, and the news just reached London through Russia.

The steamer Britannia made her homeward voyage in thirteen days and 12 hours. The British Queen did not arrive at Southampton till the 23d ult., which caused intense anxiety in London for her safety.—The Great Western arrived in King's Road, Bristol, at 4 o'clock on the morning of the 24th ult.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The queen, prince Albert, and the court left Bockingham palace for Windsor castle, on the 23d ult. where it is expected they will remain till after the middle of the present month, when the queen will probably open parliament in person on the 26th instant.

Vol. IX.—Siu. 22

The court went into mourning on the 20th ult. on account of the death of the queen's grand aunt, the princess princess of Rouss-Koet-lo.

An unusually terrific storm of thunder and lightning visited the metropolis on the 3d inst. accompanied by a fall of hail stones. The spire of a church in Surrey was struck by the fluid, and was entirely destroyed. Some other damage was done by this storm.

Considerable excitement and alarm had prevailed at Newport, in South Wales, in consequence of a fresh charter agitation in that place. A large meeting was held on New Year's day by the chartists, but was unattended by any serious results.

It is now ascertained that her majesty's ship Valley, with a crew of forty-five men on board, was lost off the coast of Suffolk during a heavy storm, on the 13th November last.

The weather in England has been unusually cold, and the floating ice in the Thames, for a time, greatly obstructed navigation, and did much damage to vessels and small craft in the river.

The hon. T. C. Robertson has succeeded Lord Auckland to the governor-generalship of India, pro tem.

Repal mentions, with O'Connell to open them, continue to be in various parts of Ireland.

Liverpool corn market, Jan. 4. American flour, free, has sustained late rates, but has been rather slow of sale; best mark of United States at 36s. Canadian at 35s a 36c. per barrel; a little United States has been sold, in bulk, at 26s. per bush.

By the official return of the averages, the duty on foreign wheat is raised to 27s. 8d. on Indian corn to 13s. 10d. per quarter; on flour to 16s. 7½d. per bush, remaining upon all other foreign produce the same as last week.

Liverpool cotton markets. The sales of the week ending the 19th ult. were 32,300 bales, including 1,500 American, on speculation, at an advance on former quotations. The sales of the week up to the 16th were 39,400 bales, including 7,500 American, on speculation, at an advance on former prices. The 20th New Orleans 5 7½, 1,510 Mobile of 6½. The sales during the week ending January 2, were equally brisk, and previous prices fully maintained. The stock exchange, Jan. 4. British market closed this morning rather firmer than it left off on Saturday, at 89½ for account.

Consols may be quoted at 89½, have been 89½ for account; exchequer bills improved to 9 prem. 80½ 79 prem. Bank stock nothing done; Indian bonds 14 to discount.

FRANCE.

The general news from France is not particularly important. The Parisians had witnessed the imposing ceremony of the funeral of Napoleon, on the 15th ult. without offering any violence. Although it was intended by the French government that the ceremony should be grand and magnificent, the English papers speak of it as a decided failure in this respect.

The French journals have again commenced their warlike threats against England. This work on the fortifications has commenced.

The Budget of 1842. On the 30th ult. the finance minister presented the budget in the chamber of deputies. The ordinary and extraordinary expenses are estimated at 1,316 millions of francs. The ordinary revenue is estimated at 1,162 millions which leaves a deficit of 154 millions of francs (6 millions sterling). The minister demanded permission of the chamber to create a loan, if necessary, for a capital of 450 millions of francs; but as the treasury has a reserve of 120 millions, the creation of these debts is not urgent. The minister declared that he did not intend to surpass the fortifications of Paris; but was his intention to spread the expenses of these works over a number of years, his wish being to avoid contracting a war under disadvantageous circumstances.

Minors were prevalent in Paris of changes of the ministry. It is conjectured that M. Guizot will have to succumb to the war party.

The Belle Poule is shortly to sail to the China seas, under the command of the prince de Joinville.

Plots against the king's life. Further plots against Louis Philippe's life are again spoken of. In the pocket of the driver of a Paris omnibus who conmitted suicide, a paper is said to have been found, setting forth that being a member of a secret society, his turn had come by lot to kill the king, but finding himself unable to commit the crime, he had determined to hang himself.

The king has resulted that part of madame Lafarge's sentence which condemns her to exposition publique.

There have been severe frosts in Paris, and dense fogs.

Recent despatches from marshal Vallee, from the seat of the war in French Africa, confirm the intelligence of the tranquillity of all the provinces in Africa under his command. The French troops had made several successful attacks in that quarter. The Arab tribes were entering into commercial relations with the French.

Marshal Vallee is recalled from Algiers, and Bugeaud takes the command there.

Quarrel between France and Morocco. It appears that the French government are determined on demanding satisfaction from the emperor of Morocco for the insult offered the consul general of France at Tangier. Admiral Hugon was said to have received orders to hold himself in readiness to sail at the first signal with his ten ships of the line, and two steamers.

The cotton market at Havre was looking up, and the price of the article has already advanced considerably.

ITALY.

Letters from Rome state that on account of the recent melancholy events which have plunged that city into mourning, a complete damp has been thrown over the usual gaieties of the winter season, and that the saloons of the corps diplomatique are almost the only ones which remain open. The government has allotted 7,000 scudi to the opera for the expense of bringing out a new work of Donizetti's.

GREECE.

The accounts from Athens continue to give the same details of misgovernment, of alienation of the people from their sovereign, the same determination on the part of the latter to pursue the anti-national system, and to refuse allegiance to the wishes of the Greeks in granting them a constitution. All the endeavors of the British minister to induce king Otto to listen to the proposals to put a stop to the slave trade, which is carried on to an incredible extent under the Greek flag, are useless, or worse than useless. The Turkish charge d'affaires in Greece has had several conferences with the minister for foreign affairs, the result of which has been the settlement of the differences that lately subsisted between the Greek government and the Porte. The declaration of the Greek minister respecting Candia proved wholly satisfactory.

GERMANY.

Warlike preparations on the part of this state have commenced on a large scale on account of similar ones being made by France.

It is reported that the organization of a combined Prussian and Austrian confederate army, has been resolved upon, and that measures are in progress which will enable the Germans to take the field with an overpowering force in the spring, if necessary.

SWITZERLAND.

The grand council of Solothurn have adopted the following principles as the basis of the new constitution of the canton:

1. The sovereignty resides in the people, who exercise it through their delegates.
2. The Catholic religion is the religion of the canton, except in the bailiwick of Bucheggwald, which professes the Evangelic creed.
3. The liberty of the press is guaranteed, saving the repression of abuses.
4. Industry and trade are free.
5. The right of petition is granted.

It is reported that Switzerland is on the eve of a new political communion.

Queen Christian is on her way to Switzerland. Frequent shocks of earthquake continued to be felt in Zante, but almost all slight; when there happen stronger ones (which is seldom) they are sufficient to overthrow those buildings, or parts of buildings, which stand on the injured soil.

From Holland, Belgium and Austria, there is no news of any importance.

RUSSIA.

Disappointment of the Russian soldiers. From the Deutsche, Dec. 10. The rapid decision of the Turkish Egyptian question, without the active co-operation of Russia, may probably have disappointed many ardent hopes of our warriors, for the Russian soldiers, and still more the officers, wish for war.

Exports. According to accounts from St. Petersburg, the exports of Russia during the year 1839, amounted to $41,598,679 bank rubles, and the imports to 249,152,476 bank rubles. The exports accordingly exceeded the imports by a sum of 92,746,235 rubles.

Diplomatic negotiations, a friendly tone, have passed between the Russian ambassador and M. Gruzot. They probably mean nothing more than the usual professions of a disposition to cultivate the relations of peace.

The Sud, of Marseilles, contains an account from Constantinople, stating that the Russians had been completely defeated by the Circassians, and driven from one of their most important fortresses, after a decisive battle.

PRUSSIA.

A pretender to the throne. The German papers have given several obscure hints of the existence of a pretender to the throne of Prussia. In a letter under date of last week, it is stated that an elder brother of the king, having been assassinated, left a son who is now a major in garrison in Mentz. It is asserted further that several of the first families in Prussia have determined to support this competitor for the throne, will soon astonish Europe by its results.

The government is having a civil code drawn up for the whole Prussian monarchy. This measure is intended for a two-fold object: first to give to the kingdom a unity, a political homogeneity, without which it would not retain its rank; the second to bring back, under this pretext, the Rhenish provinces to the ancient German legislation.

TURKEY.

The Turco-Egyptian question, which, at our last advices, was supposed to be settled, was again reopened, as will appear from the following intelligence.

On the 26th November, com. Napier concluded a convention with the pasha, by which the latter was to receive the hereditary government of Egypt upon certain conditions.

On the 24 ultimo, admiral Stovford wrote to the pasha, informing him that com. Napier had no authority to enter into a convention he could not approve or ratify; but on the 6th ultimo, he transmitted to the pasha the official authority from the British government, in the name of his four powers, to maintain Mehmet Ali in the pashalik of Egypt only, upon the condition that in three days after the communications made to him by captain Fawshaw, he agreed to restore the Turkish fleet to the sultan and evacuate Syria. In reply, Mehmet Ali accepted the terms proposed, though much hurt at the diplomatic trifling in which he had been subjected.

The precise words of the treaty are, that if he, Mehmet Ali, surrenders immediately to the sultan, and delivers into the hands of the officer charged with the above, a written obligation to restore, without further delay, the Turkish fleet, and to recall immediately his troops from Syria, from the district of Adana, from the pashalik of Egypt, from Arabia, and from the Holy Cities, the four powers will recommend the sultan to re-establish Mehmet Ali in the pashalik of Egypt.

The 9th and 10th ult. were days of negotiation, when Mehmet Ali sent his answer in a note and despatch.

Captain Fawshaw left Alexandria on the 11th ult. with this note and despatch, for Constantinople. We have yet to learn the result of his reception by the sultan.

It was understood at Alexandria on the 11th, that Ibrahim pasha was at Gura with his army, on his way to Cairo, where he was expected to arrive on the 15th inst. Com. Napier had left Alexandria, and had gone to Marmarath. The Bedouins of the desert of Suaz had begun to plunder.

As the affairs of Syria appear to be fast approaching to a quiescent state, it is needless to occupy any space with details of the progress of the intrigues who had hitherto remained faithful to Mehmet Ali, declared in favor of the sultan immediately after the fall of St. Jean d'Acre. The entire army of Ibrahim, which at one time amounted to 75,000 men, had been reduced to about 20,000.

A fearful tempest lately swept over the Black sea and the sea of Marmora, which did incalculable damage. A Russian steamer from Odessa to Constantinople, was wrecked and nineteen men perished.

CHINA.

Still later from China. The British actually in Peking! Reports that the British expedition against China had taken Peking, the capital of the celestial empire, were current in London by the date of our last publication. They were founded on letters received from St. Petersburg, via Holland; and but little attention was paid to them. They have, however, been this week repeated, with increased confidence. The Manchester Guardian gives the following, dated St. Petersburg, 11th December, addressed to "an eminent house" at Manchester and received on Tuesday.

At the beginning of this week, a Tartar arrived here from Kiochian, with the news that the English had taken the capital of China, after having bombarded it, and destroyed all the forts near the river. The emperor, the son of the sun, had fled with all his mandarins. The consequence of this event will be a good treaty which will entirely change the commercial dealings with that empire."

PORTUGAL.

Quarrel between Spain and Portugal. It appears that the government at Lisbon had determined to resist the proposals of that of Madrid as to the Douro navigation treaty. A Spanish force, therefore, had been marched to the frontiers of Portugal, and the time for a definite answer fixed for January 4th; by which time it was expected that the Portuguese government that every thing should be prepared for war, on land, as well as that their old craft were to be hastily put in such a state as to be able to blockade Cadix and other important Spanish towns on the coast. From the hostile despatches of the 10th ult., it was believed that the British government would be likely to interfere and settle the dispute.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

U. S. SENATE. The National Intelligencer of Monday says:—In conformity to usage, we learn that the senate of the United States has been summoned by the executive to meet in this city on the 4th of March next, for the transaction of business. (being of course of an executive character, connected with the commencement of a new administration, the formation of a new cabinet, &c.)

MINISTER AT ST. JAMES. The Richmond Enquirer says that Mr. Van Buren had not acceded to the request of Mr. Stevenson (our minister at St. James), that he may be recalled; but in consequence of the new aspect of affairs in regard to the boundary question, and the affair of the Caroline, (being of course of an executive character, connected with the commencement of a new administration, the formation of a new cabinet, &c.)

THE OREGON TERRITORY. Mr. Linn, of the U. States senate, has introduced a bill declaring that the title of the United States to the territory of Oregon is certain and will not be abandoned. The bill further authorizes the president of the U. States to take immediate measures to have the boundaries of the United States on the Pacific frontier ascertained, and in the meantime to take such measures as may be necessary to protect the persons and property of our citizens residing or trading in the territory of Oregon. It also provides that a line of military posts be established at suitable places between Fort Leavenworth and the Rocky Mountains.

The bill grants one thousand acres of land to every white male inhabitant of the territory who shall cultivate and use the same for five consecutive years. It also authorizes the appointment of an Indian agent with a salary of fifteen hundred dollars, whose duty it shall be to superintend the interests of the United States with any Indian tribe west of any agency now established.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF. The secretary of the treasury sent to the senate on Friday a short report on the revision of the tariff, in obedience to a resolution of that body. The gist of the report, after excluding redundant verbiage, is as follows:

The reduction in the duties on imports, which is to take place in 1842, is above five millions of dollars.

The chief existing law on the subject, is the compound tariff act of 1812, which the secretary proposes not to disturb by his revision.

If any changes are made, they should be solely for purposes of revenue.

That these changes should be confined to articles not paying a duty so high as 20 per cent. and that, generally, it should not go above that rate.

That the existing provisions for the payment of duties in cash; and the assessment of them on the value of the merchandise at the port of entry after 1842, ought to be reformed.

It is doubtless a sound axiom to select for highest taxation articles of luxury, rather than of necessity.

It is expedient to select such articles of luxury as compete most with similar articles of American growth or manufacture, though not to tax them above 20 per cent.

It may be useful, also, to select these articles, for an increased import, which may be proper for counterbalancing injurious imports, placed on our own productions by foreign powers.

There are some anomalies in the present tariff which might be abolished; such as discriminations more favorable to luxuries than to necessities.

The value of free articles imported in 1838, exclusive of specie, was about $25,461,583. A duty of 15 per cent. on these would yield a net revenue near five millions that may be needed in 1842.

Selecting from the free articles those which may be regarded most as luxuries, as tea, coffee, silk, &c. and adding them to those which conflict with American productions, as worsteds, linens, &c. and these would be an amount of $29,026,445, (taking the year 1838 still as a guide) on the value of 20 per cent. would also yield the amount of about five millions.

On some articles not now free, but paying a duty of less than 15 or 20 per cent. the tax might be raised. Ifines are this description.

Half the duty of increased duties should be made to accrue only from the first of January, in 1842, and the residue commence the first of July next thereafter.

The warehouse system might be adapted and adopted.

It might be expedient to provide for the assessment of the whole of the higher class of duties after 1842 on the ad valorem principle.

Some of the large drawbacks and bounties, now allowed could be beneficially reduced so as to correspond in their proportions with the reduced duties.

This, we believe, is a tolerable synopsis of Mr. Woodbury's report of revision, with the exception of it which merely describes the stipulations and restrictions of the existing tariff. We have interposed no opinions of our own. [Madisonian.]

NORTHEASTERN BOUNDARY. The Washington correspondent of the New York Courier & Enquirer, writes, on the 24th ult., respecting the course of the negotiation between the governments of the United States and Great Britain on the boundary question, reverts to the fact of Mr. Christopher Hughes having been first nominated to the senate by president Adams at the opening of congress in 1828-9, to be minister to the Hague, (with a view to the arbitration before the king of the Netherlands), and the rejection of that nomination upon the same party ground upon which the most important nomination then made by Mr. Adams were rejected, for the purpose of reserving all such appointments and concentrating the greatest possible amount of patronage in the hands of Gen. Jackson, who was to come into office on the 4th of March following. The consequence of which rejection was, that, in due time, the mission was bestowed upon Mr. Preble. The correspondent of the Courier adds to this reminiscence the following, which corresponds with the impression which has been made upon our minds on the same subject.

"It is the opinion of persons best competent to judge, and from what they have said I confidently believe, that, if Mr. Hughes had received that appointment, he would have remained at the Hague, and his means of access to, and intercourse with, the ministers alone, but the king himself, would have enabled him to satisfy the arbiters of the justice of the pretensions of the United States, and would have brought about a settlement of the northeastern boundary question in our favor."

Thus, the first error committed in regard to the boundary negotiation was in the choice of an agent on the part of the United States to attend to the arbitration.

A second error, we believe, was committed in the rejection of the sword of the king of the Netherlands under the treaty of Ghent, after it was made. Upon that head there is, we know, some difference of opinion among patriotic citizens of both of our great political parties. For our part, we wish that it could have been accepted.

A third error was committed, we apprehend, by the present executive, in declining to carry into effect the wishes of congress, as indicated, two years ago, by the making of an appropriation for the outfit and salary of a special minister to Great Britain. Whatever doubt might have existed in the mind of the president, as to the expediency of such a special mission, may still be yielded, in this expression of opinion by congress on the subject.

We allude to this last error with the less hesitation because, as we have heretofore intimated, we are disposed, "veritas excipit," to approve the general course of the present executive upon this delicate question. [Nat. Intell.]

THE TOBACCO TRADE. The Alexandria Gazette has information from the minister of finance of the 11th of December, that the minister of finance has proposed a new tariff of duties, to go into operation 1st January, 1841, by which (amongst other articles) the duties on Maryland and Virginia tobacco will be increased from 50 cents per 100 lbs. to 3 guilders per 700 k.; and that, notwithstanding the remonstrance of the merchants and dealers against the measure, it was generally supposed that the chamber would concur in the recommendation of the minister.

THE ARMY.

Recruits for the U. S. army. The whole number of soldiers enlisted in the army, at the recruiting stations in the different states, for one year from October 1st, 1839 to September 30th, 1840, inclusive, was 6,316; at the stations for the general recruiting service, 3,006; at those for the dragoon service 496, and by regiments, 2,814; total, 6,316. The number of stations was about 40. Of the 3,006, enlisted at the stations, the general recruiting service, 1,444 were in the state of New York—nearly one half of the whole number. At the other stations the commissions were enlisted, at Philadelphia, 215; Cumberland, Md. 153; Baltimore, Md. 145; Louisville, Ky. 150; Newport, Ky. 141; Syracuse, New York, 149; Utica, 135; Albany, 107; Boston, 108. Of the 496, for the dragoon service, 529 were enlisted in this city.

Troops for Florida. A detachment of 104 recruits, for the 1st regiment of infantry, left New York last Tuesday for Tampa Bay, on board the "Tuscarora." The detachment is under command of Lieutenant W. S. Hemy, second infantry. Lieut. J. W. Martin, also of the second regiment is attached to the command.

Florida. A letter has been received at Filadelfia from colonel Loomis, dated at Fort Clinch, stating that thirty-three Indians had come to it at that post.

Tiger Tail had also come in and was going to Tampa. It is thought that in all about six hundred Indians have presented themselves at various posts along the coast on the Gulf of Mexico.

A party of the enemy lately attacked Fort Walker, killing two or three negroes and wounding one white woman. Fort Walker is between Micanopy and Tallahassee.

Captain W. B. Davidson, 3d artillery, died in Indian Key on the 24th December, regretted by all who knew him as a gallant officer and most worthy man.

THE NAVY.

Death of commodore Stevens. The Washington papers of Friday announce the death of commodore Thomas Holdup Stevens, of the U. S. navy, and commandant of the Washington navy yard.

The intelligence says: "In the meridian of life, and in the enjoyment of the highest health, he returned to bed on Wednesday night, and before morning the angel of death had stricken him from the number of the living. Commodore Stevens was a native of Charleston, South Carolina, and entered the navy in 1808, at the early age of fifteen. Young as he was, he had distinguished himself in the war of 1812, even before Perry's brilliant victory on Lake Erie, and he commanded one of the vessels in that ever-memorable battle." The intelligence pays a just and generous tribute to his memory.—The secretary of the navy has issued the annexed official order, under date of the 23d inst.

At a mark of respect to the memory of com. Thomas Holdup Stevens, late of the United States navy, who died at Washington on the 21st inst. while in command of the navy yard and station, the flags of the navy yards, stations, and vessels of the United States navy are to be hoisted at half-mast, and thirteen minute guns fired at noon on the day after the receipt of this order. Officers of the navy and marine corps are directed to wear crepe on the left arm for thirty days.

The U. S. frigate Constitution and schooner Shark were lying at Callao, Peru, all well, September 5th, to sail in a day or two for Paita and Guayaquil. The U. S. sloop of war St. Louis was daily expected at Callao from the coast of Mexico. She had been absent about eight months, and her naval force seems to be to be entirely too limited for the extensive commerce we have in that ocean. It will be seen, in referring to the report made by the committee on naval affairs in the senate of the United States in 1839, that the whale ships alone in the Pacific ocean number 460 sail, amounting to nearly 200,000 tons, and manned by 12,000 seamen.—The report says: "Every time this whale fleet is sent to sea, there is required, in outfits, food, 80,000 barrels; pork and beef, 79,120 barrels; molasses, 10,000 gallons; coffee, 532,600 pounds; sugar, 256,800 pounds; tea, 172,300 pounds; rice, 1,300 barrels; duck, 46,460 pieces; cordage, 8,860 tons; iron, 4,600 tons; copper, 352,000 sheets, vessels completed every voyage; slaves, 10,000,000.—No part of the commerce of this country is more important than that which is carried on in the Pacific ocean. It is large in amount—not less than $12,000,000 of capital are invested in, and actively employed by, one branch of the whale fishery alone; and in the whole trade is directly and indirectly involved not less than from fifty to seventy millions of property. It is large in amount—the portion of the whole of the report as a document which throws much light on the important subject of our commerce to the Pacific. [Philad. U. S. Gazette.]

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

Oxford district. The election for a member of congress in this district, on Monday last, has properly resulted in the election of Mr. Littlefield, of Vass, Warren candidate. Returns from 20 towns give Littlefield 2,144, Long, (W.) 2,123, scattering 293, showing a gain in favor of Littlefield since the late trial.

Treasurer. The whole debt of the state amounts to $1,675,687, of which all but $37,420 is funded, and payable in periods of 4, 5, 8, 15 and 30 years. The estimated charge for interest the ensuing year is $95,500.

Resources.

Cash on hand	$82,736
Bank tax for 1841	40,000
Duty on commissions	2,500
Balance of tax for 1840	$7,715
Land notes and other securities available	200,000
Claim on United States	350,000
Bank stock	15,000

Total $795,951.

The estimate of probable receipts in 1841, is $458,894, including cash on hand, $200,000 claimed of the United States for boundary expenses, the state tax, bank tax, and $30,000 from the land agents. The estimate of expenditure for the ensuing year is $385,627.

The large debt of the state is the result of an extravagant wheat bounty a few years since, and of its military expeditions to the Aroostook under Gov. Fairfield.

[N. Y. Jour. and Inquirer.]

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

State convention. The friends of the administration in New Hampshire, recently held a convention, and nominated candidates for governor, congress, council and state senate. John Page was named for governor, and Tristram Strong, Ira A. Eastman, Charles G. Atherton, Edmund Burkin, John R. Redding, for congress. The convention recommended a national convention to be held in New York, on the 31st of July, 1842, to nominate candidates for president and vice president.

RHODE ISLAND.

The whig state convention of Rhode Island, assembled at Providence on Thursday. Asner Robinson, of New Bedford, was chosen moderator. Ward King, of Johnston, and Byron Dimin, of Bristol, were nominated as the whig candidates for governor and lieutenant governor of the state. Albert C. Green, for attorney general, and Stephen Caloon, general treasurer.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The public lands. The resolutions in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of sales of the public lands, among the several states, which had previously passed the senate of Pennsylvania, came before a final reading in the house, by a vote of 51 to 14. While under consideration in the house, Mr. Cox, of Somerset, submitted an amendment, in the shape of a second resolution, instructing the Pennsylvania delegation in congress to vote for such an amendment or modification of the tariff laws, as may render the revenue arising from imports equal to the wants of the national government—so that no part of the proceeds of the sales of the public domain—the proceeds of the several states—be applied to the uses of the federal government. This amendment was adopted by a vote of 56 to 37.—The resolutions as passed by the house are as follows:

Resolved, &c. That our senators in congress be, and they are hereby instructed, and our representatives requested, to resist any and all attempts, under what pretence soever the same may be made, to deprive the people of this state of their just portion of the common inheritance in the public lands, and that they be and are hereby further instructed and requested, to introduce and advocate the passage of a bill, providing for the distribution of the proceeds of the same among the several states, in the ratio of their representative population of one thousand eight hundred and forty.

Resolved, That our senators in congress be further instructed, and our representatives requested, to vote for such a modification or adjustment of the tariff laws as may increase the revenue upon imports equal to the wants of the national government, so that at no time hereafter, under any pretence, no part of the proceeds received from the sales of the public lands be used by the general government.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to cause a copy of this resolution to be forwarded to each of our senators and representatives in congress, and to the governors of the several states, with the request that the same may be laid before their respective state legislatures.

The amendment of Mr. Cox will carry the resolutions back to the senate; but there is no sort of doubt but they will pass that body as amended.

On Tuesday last, John Gilmore, of Butler county, (formerly a representative in congress), was elected, on joint ballot of the two houses of the legislature, to be trustee of the state militia.

Military convention. The military convention at Harrisburg, for a reform of the militia system adjourned on Tuesday last, to meet again on the first of Monday in June. At this state military convention will be held, the delegates to be elected to the regimental trainings, out of the commissioned officers. It is supposed that no less than one thousand officers in full uniform, will be present on that occasion. The resolutions which were adopted previously in adjournment were to the following effect: To effect an efficient organization of able bodied men. To elect respectable men to offices, who would discharge the duty. Recommending to the divisions and brigades to hold meetings in April next. The appointment of a committee to treat of the proceedings to the members of congress and the state legislators, with suggestions to remedy the present evils of the system. Appointing a central committee to select and visit and brigades officers corresponding committees. Appointing a committee to procure the establishment of a military and literary paper, neutral in politics. That the army of the United States should not be increased. Recommending to the divisions and brigades to hold meetings and brigades. All meetings of officers to be in full uniform.

French spoliation. DELAWARE. Governor Cornegys calls the attention of the legislature to the case of the French spoliation upon American commerce previous to 1800. The subjoined are the pertinent remarks of his excellency.

"Your attention is requested to the documents now in the possession of the legislature, in relation to the case of the French spoliation upon American commerce previous to 1800. The subjoined are the pertinent remarks of his excellency.

"Your attention is requested to the documents now in the possession of the legislature, in relation to the case of the French spoliation upon American commerce previous to 1800. The subjoined are the pertinent remarks of his excellency.

"Our government thus purchased a release from an onerous and treaty obligation by the property of their fellow citizens, and therefore became liable, upon every just principle, to them for the amount of the claim thus barred away. This claim has been standing for forty years; has been elaborately investigated in the several sessions of congress, and its validity and justice have been repeatedly recognized by committees in each house. In view of all the circumstances, I regard the claim as one entitled to your favorable consideration, and to that of congress.

The governor has appointed John W. Houston, esq. of Georgetown, secretary of state; and the legislature has elected col. William D. Waples, of Sussex, state treasurer, and L. A. Houston, esq. of Kent, auditor.

MARYLAND.

total white population 75,512; free colored persons 431, slaves 19,968, total colored population 19,399. There are 40 deaf and dumb persons, 20 blind and 41 insane and idiots. Of the number of white persons above the age of 20, there are 6,584 who can neither read nor write. There are 9 academies and grammar schools within the state, having 134 scholars, and 108 primary and common schools, having 2,567 scholars.

KENTUCKY.

Prisoners. From the annual report of the keeper, it appears that the profits of the institution from March, 1839, to November, 1840, amount to the sum of $12,512 12 cts. The number of convicts are stated to be 226.

OHIO.

The Ohio State Journal says that the annual report of the auditor discloses the astounding fact, that the collectors of tolls upon the Ohio canal, at Newark, Massillon, Dayton and Chillicothe, are in default to the state for monies received by them, in the aggregate sum of $11,560 72.

The absorbing question here, says the State Journal, among those who are sincerely desirous to place the moneyed institutions of our state in a condition to be safe and useful, is whether there shall be a state bank, similar to that in Indiana, or whether the present banks, or such of them as are entitled to public confidence, shall be permitted to remain. Safe vault fund system, with such modifications however, as shall secure a larger amount of specie in the vaults of the banks, in proportion to the amount of paper circulation, than is exhibited in the reports of the New York banks. The probability is, that the committee to whom this subject is referred, will report a bill on the latter plan; chiefly because the finances of the state are thought to be unfavorable to the former. "The great difficulty appears to be in determining a rule by which the real available means of the present banks may be ascertained, in order to fix the amount of circulation to which each may be entitled, when presenting claims to the house of control, for admission into the family of solvent banks."

The bank bill has been since reported.

INDIANA.

Legislature. In the house, on Wednesday the 6th inst. the vote on the passage of the bill to regulate general elections was in favor of the restrictive provisions of the bill. In the township in which they may reside, was reconsidered and after a spirited debate, the bill passed. The senate spent the most of the next day in discussing a motion to reject the bill, which was finally carried in the affirmative by a vote of 27 to 15.

State bonds. A report has been made in the legislature of Indiana, on the subject of the bonds issued by that state, in which the ground is taken that all the bonds issued by the commissioners of the state should be paid, except such as had been sold and were not paid for, and which remained in the possession of the original purchasers. This has reference to the bonds sold to the Morris canal company of New York, and for which the state has received nothing. But as that company has disposed of those bonds to the United States bank of Pennsylvania and by that bank have been pledged to England, the proviso can be of no effect. Those bonds constitute a large portion of the debt of that state.

ILLINOIS.

Resumption. It will be remembered that by the unexpected termination of an extra session of the legislature of that state, a few hours, on a day previous to the meeting of the regular session, the state bank of Illinois was in a measure coerced into the work of resuming specie payments, somewhat sooner than it otherwise would have done. This resumption took place, if we mistake not, on the 21st of December. And we now learn from the St. Louis Republican of late date that "the demand for specie on the State Bank of Illinois, had thus far been much less than was expected." We are thus informed that the resumption is going like a run on the State Bank, or any of its branches. The resumption thus far is said to have had no influence whatever on the condition of the bank.

The city of Cairo. The Sangamo (Ill.) Journal says—

"A ship is now contracted for, to be built at Cairo, the ensuing summer, designed for a regular trade between that city and Liverpool. Start not reader! This is not a new project, but one that will hardly pass before ships from the ocean will unload their cargoes at Cairo city, which will then be a port of entry, and will take that rank among the cities of the west, to which her unrivalled position—unrivalled in any portion of the world—will entitle her.

"We will add to this article the fact that the embankment, which will enclose 1,200 acres, will be completed in June, after which an overflow of the city will no longer be apprehended."

This ambitious city—we believe it already has a character—is situated at the extreme southern point of the great continental divide, by the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers.

MISSOURI.

St. Louis. The business between the city of St. Louis and Boston and New York, this year, according to St. Louis Gazet, is $5,000,000. When the Chicago canal is finished, which will be in the coming year, the transportation of merchandise will mostly be done by the Erie canal and the lakes.

MICHIGAN.

Governor Woodbridge's message was communicated to the two houses of the Michigan legislature on the 7th instant. The subject of education is the first that receives particular notice, and it appears to be one which the governor has much at heart.

Various details are pointed out in the existing system of common schools, especially as it regards the laying off of districts and the imposition of taxes. Amendments are suggested. The constitution of the state university is alluded to—an institution which seems to be designed upon a grand and generous plan, having its chief endowment in public lands granted by the state and the general government. The university has its branches in different parts of the state, some of which are now in successful operation. Of the central institution four buildings for professors' residences are finished, the grounds are handsomely enclosed, and a large edifice for students will be finished probably in June next.

Among the local matters to which the governor refers, the judiciary department of the state gives occasion for a series of remarks. "In all our courts of civil jurisdiction," says the message, "it is too obviously true to need formal proof to establish the fact, that in a few years past, the number of cases has increased to an extraordinary extent; and the crowded and diffused operations of our courts are looked to with a far more general and absorbing interest than in ordinary times." This state of things is ascribed in part to the influence of the general government in relation to the currency and the tariff. In this connection, the message says—

"To establish a national currency, has not been allowed the states; nor does it remain with them to create any incidental institution, tending to invigorate, increase or protect it. No power has been reserved to the states either, so far to interfere with the operations of commerce, as, without materially injuring any other interest, to foster and encourage our own manufactures. And when by a lamentable concurrence of circumstances, principally superinduced by the action of the federal authorities themselves, ruin is brought upon a considerable number of our families, and their families without the guilt of their own, no power exists, except with those authorities, to relieve their distress, by a well guarded and uniform system of bankruptcy." On neither of these subjects can the separate states act authoritatively. But the expressed wishes, or the well reasoned opinions of the state legislatures on all questions of national policy, will be entitled to respect, and cannot but exert a just and salutary influence.

This appears to be some uncertainty concerning the exact location of the northern boundary separating the state of Michigan from the British territory. It is recommended that an immediate application be made to congress for a survey of the district in question.

The internal improvements of the state constitute an important topic of discussion. The great error has been in undertaking too many large works at once. The consequences are that the whole system is brought to a stand in an imperfect condition, and the obligations of the state have accumulated without the means of meeting them being at present available. After referring to the unpromising prospect of things now in view, with the difficult alternatives that lay before them, the governor concludes upon the subject thus:

"And, to rescue our constituents and our state from a condition so rapidly approaching, and yet so full of peril, we are, I think, gentlemen, that but one course remains—that is, to consent to look at our great public works, solely as a matter of finance, as a measure of pecuniary control merely—at once, and unconditionally, to sacrifice on the altar of true honor and patriotism, all local prejudices and partialities, and with one accord, to apply all the available means that remain to us, to the completion of that one of them which will be certainly the most productive, from a full consideration of all circumstances, and an honest estimate of chances, will furnish the strongest and the best guarantee that its pecuniary avails will be most certainly be equal to the semi-annual interest which the state must soon cast about for ways and means to pay.

Some increase of the general state tax is recommended; also, the appointment of commissioners to make a new assessment and valuation of property in the state.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Fellow citizens of the senate and house of representatives:

We are the chosen agents of the commonwealth, appointed by the people, each to perform the duties, and bear the responsibilities, imposed on him by the constitution and laws. By the wise provisions of the constitution, the trust confided to the several branches of the government is limited to the short period of one year, when the people are delegated to us, return to their homes, and live to private life. Under such an organization, all being held annually accountable for their conduct, under the heavy penalty of popular disapprobation, there is little danger of a wide departure from public policy, from the will of the majority of the people.

Review of the political system. This system has been in force sixty years, and the prosperous condition of our happy commonwealth, during most of that period, is a strong and convincing testimony to the wisdom and profound sagacity of the devoted advocates of public liberty who formed it.

It is questionable whether human wisdom could devise a system of organic laws, which would give a more efficient and more judicious public sentiment, act with greater efficiency in promoting the great object of popular government.

What sons of Massachusetts is not justly proud of the glorious name! A name illustrious in the country's annals! A name associated with events that will transmit it to nations unborn with a charm surpassing the illusions of fiction. If we can carry our thoughts into the past, and not have our hearts swell with gratitude to end for his signal blessings, we are unworthy the name of Christians. If we can survey the works of our fathers, and contemplate the comprehensive wisdom displayed in founding, broad and deep, our free institutions, without reverence and awe, and thankfulness to God, for our unflattering report of popular liberty, we are unworthy of such ancestors, for who have done more, or done it better! And where are more convincing proofs of the happy success of a self-governed community, than the memory and intellectual and political institutions which exist around us?

Massachusetts, while a weak and humble colony, embraced the great principle, that a people to be free must be enlightened, and was the first to engrave it upon her public mind. The principles of popular education to sustain and carry out freedom of opinion in religion, soon proved to be the strongest pillar in the political fabric. Her schools have shed a lustre upon her career, and imparted a stability and moral dignity to her character, the influences of which have passed beyond her limits, and are felt at the remotest borders of this confederacy.

Moral and intellectual improvement. To extend to a whole people the means of moral and intellectual improvement, to enlighten the minds of the people, to make all wise and good, by enlarging their capacities for enjoyment and usefulness, is a noble conception, as it unfolds the mental strength of the poor, and opens the way for all to attain to honor and fame. We see among all the nations of the world, the power of education, in this fact, that a large portion of those who embellish the walks of literature, or adorn the learned professions, or signalize themselves in the halls of legislation, are the sons of persons comparatively poor.

Education. Thus the schools are constantly exerting a great influence upon our destiny by adding fresh vigor, power and moral energy to the popular mind, and qualifying it to sustain the great cause of humanity and benevolence. We have seen the great results of education, in the most comprehensive sense. While Massachusetts has thus reared her hopes of the future upon the intelligence and moral rectitude of the people, she has seen no cause to distrust the wisdom of her policy.

Respectful character. As the commonwealth has been studiously anxious to imbue the public mind with those qualifications for self-government, so she has not been unfaithful of the duties of humanity and benevolence. She has been ever ready to do justice to all the claims of the poor, to relieve the distressed from the sufferings incident to improvidence or misfortune, and provided for them as members of the great public family. She has also mitigated the condition of the poor debtor, and her generous policy sought to relieve the poor from all small claims to aggravate poverty. Nor has her parental sympathy been withheld from the destitute blind and deaf and dumb, but their misfortunes have been greatly alleviated by a liberal provision for their education and improvement in the useful arts. Nor has she disregarded the insane, or overlooked their deplorable condition, but has caused many to be rescued from loathsome asylums, where they were confined for crimes unconsciously committed, to an asylum, in which by medical skill and gentle treatment, they are restored to their reason, or greatly relieved from their sufferings.

Works of Christian charity and voluntary benevolence every where abound, embellishing our commonwealth, and bearing testimony to the disinterested philanthropy of our citizens. The spires of churches scattered over the face of the country, mark our character as a people, and the pious pilgrims, and afford an impressive proof that religion abides among us. The sick and disabled find a refuge and an alleviation of their sufferings in our hospitals, and the unprotected orphan has provided for him a retreat from the snares and seductions of vice, where virtue and good morals are sedulously cherished and cultivated. The adventurous mariner, who from his improvident habits and careless generosity, is often the victim of the rapacious, finds a friendly refuge among the benevolent, who labor to arrest abuses and elevate his morals.

Justice. The laws are justly regarded as the exponent of the will of the people, and while they are administered with such impartiality, that the inhabitants feel secure in their persons and property, the decisions of our judicial tribunals are regarded in other states with the respect due to able and learned expounders of the principles of an enlightened people.

Resources, enterprise, industry. We have seen also how the policy of the federal government has not impeded our action, this means of prosperity constantly multiplied, and our resources steadily developed, as our ability has increased. New avenues of transportation have been opened, and fresh impulses given to trade and agriculture, creating strong motives in our citizens to cling to the fortunes of our venerable commonwealth.

Much of all this is the result of private enterprise. But it owes its origin to our popular organization, and especially to the rights of individual liberty which we enjoy. Exciting, as it does, bold and successful enterprise, it is a most gratifying proof of the wonderful energy of a free people, among whom useful labor is honorable. It is the work of a community united under the fundamental principle of equal rights to all, and excluding no one. It is a community that has built itself up, and drawn around it the comforts and enjoyments which follow powerful and well directed efforts—a community in which each member, as far as safely will permit, has been left to pursue his own interests, and to the dictates of his understanding—to follow his occupation in his own way, free from such restraints as impair the right of private judgment and narrow down individual liberty.

Political privileges and duties. In the high enjoyment of these privileges, our citizens have determined, each for himself, what employment he would pursue—whether he would work much or little—whether he would buy, sell, exchange or give away property—whether he would give credit, exact money, or make any other conditions, and they have vigilantly guarded against all attempts to invade or impair these rights.

The almost unrestrained individual energy which we enjoy, the exemption from unnecessary and oppressive burdens; the right which belongs to every person to seek his happiness and enjoy the fruits of his industry in such manner as he pleases, if it be not criminal, are the obvious causes of our prosperity, and have worked out these great results which distinguish our union from all other nations and make it the paradise of the poor man. Almost all we see amongst us in our commonwealth is the work of individual enterprise, exerting itself under these impulses. Business, which has received the freest support due from the government, has never been urged forward with untiring zeal; trade and wealth have been sought by sea and by land, in unexplored regions; commerce, foreign and domestic, has been employed with unabated activity in exchanging the products of labor, and labor itself has been stimulated to its greatest efforts, and has realized rewards seldom equalled in any country.—The earth itself has been annually tasked for more abundant crops, and this general activity of business has imparted vigor to the nation, and has multiplied its rapidly towards higher perfection. What the resources of an individual have been inadequate to accomplish, has been done by united efforts; canals have been excavated, rail roads laid down, ships built, mills erected, manufactures created, and so on. Thus individual energy acting by itself, or in unison with others, has enlarged business in all its forms so rapidly, and created such a demand for labor, that all who have been disposed to be industrious, have with few exceptions, found as much employment as they desired, and at rates of wages adequate to lay the foundation of success in the acquisition of property. We often see this individual power forcibly illustrated in the rapid progress of our citizens from poverty to wealth—in the transition from the humblest circumstances to a condition which enables them to become the generous patrons of the benevolent. If great institutions which have grown up amongst us.

Individual liberty, coupled with intellectual improvement, is manifestly the vital principle that distinguishes us and moves us on by its own inherent power, crowning our efforts with success. It is not a mere impulse that nothing else can give, and in its great and general results exhibits in strong contrast the difference between those who enjoy it, and such as have no voice in their destiny, but from generation to generation labor quietly on to sustain animal existence, unconscious of the capacities that sleep within them. Almost all we witness around us, is only the proof of what man is capable of accomplishing for himself when free scope is given to his mental and physical faculties. It is not a mere impulse that nothing else can give, and in its great and general results exhibits in strong contrast the difference between those who enjoy it, and such as have no voice in their destiny, but from generation to generation labor quietly on to sustain animal existence, unconscious of the capacities that sleep within them. Almost all we witness around us, is only the proof of what man is capable of accomplishing for himself when free scope is given to his mental and physical faculties. It is not a mere impulse that nothing else can give, and in its great and general results exhibits in strong contrast the difference between those who enjoy it, and such as have no voice in their destiny, but from generation to generation labor quietly on to sustain animal existence, unconscious of the capacities that sleep within them. Almost all we witness around us, is only the proof of what man is capable of accomplishing for himself when free scope is given to his mental and physical faculties. It is not a remarkable that we are sometimes borne forward by the buoyant hopes naturally excited, with a strength that carries us into injurious excesses of business, but as the desolating tempest or the blighting frost, sweeps away the fruits of the blessings of heaven mingled with the waste, so do the people return from excess to their usual prudence, learning wisdom from misfortune. The inconveniences resulting from occasional over-action, and the trifling comparison to take counterbalancing power, which would impair the discretion, diminish the privileges, or restrain the enterprise of individuals. Power always steals upon us under the plausible pretence of bettering our condition, and the general enjoyment of the rights of life, which lessens our privileges. It may be abused and exercised oppressively by majorities as well as by despot. The mere forms of a free government do not, therefore, make a free people, unless, as individuals, they are exempt from oppression, and enjoy the liberties and privileges which constitute all that is valuable in freedom. It becomes us in our possession of such privileges as the people of this commonwealth enjoy, not to be impatient under the evils incident to them; not to destroy the rights of others, in order to remove the cause of their individual liberty as the basis of political happiness. When abuses demand it, a suitable corrective should be applied, but not in a way to cool the ardor, discourage the hopes, or abate the energy of our citizens. Such legislation may say something to power, but nothing to the great cause of universal freedom and prosperity.

Like other states, we have shared the calamities which have fallen to the common lot of the country, and our citizens had the influence upon our progress. But the people have infused into the general course of policy, much of their own free and holy spirit, and have imparted to our institutions a living energy that will sustain and advance them toward higher perfection, and make them more worthy of our love, and more perfect models for the imitation of others. We cannot more strongly avow our attachment to the commonwealth, than by promoting the prosperity and happiness of the people. It is the duty of our legislature, which shall not impair the privileges.

Federal relations. But whatever may be our policy, and however generously the people may infuse their liberal spirit into measures, still our connection with the government of the United States is such, and influences so great, that we can neither avert or control them. Probably no state in the union has so great a diversity of important interests so materially affected by its action. We are agriculturists, manufacturers, mechanics, navigators, and so on. Our citizens are closely united by innumerable strong ties, in a common interest. We hold extensive commercial intercourse with the world, and make the seas tributary to our labor in many directions.

We are thus brought directly under the power and protection of the government of the United States, and if its policy be wise, experience teaches us that we can scarcely fail to prosper, but if it be unwise, or oppressive, we have learnt in like manner, to cling to it, and escape its evils. If it denies us as commercial intercourse, our trade is suspended; if it is regulated upon unfair or unjust terms, we languish under the injury; but when its parental arm covers us with its shield, winning our affection by encouraging our efforts by a judicious policy, then the swelling tide of success is rolled on with an impetus that none but a free people can give. As therefore, the power of that government reaches, and influences all our pursuits, to the earnings of the humblest laborer, we have in it a vital and abiding interest, and we have a right to demand that it be just, faithful, and constitutional authority, as well as to hold it responsible, if in times of peace and plenty, it pursues a course adverse to our prosperity and embarrasses our enjoyments.

The currency—expenditures. Our public affairs have for a long period of time been in great confusion. Our finances, currency and business have been previously deranged during the experimental policy pursued since the chief magistrate of the U. States assumed the duties of his office, and the revenues. Even those revenues which were then superabundant, have ceased to meet the annual expenditures, and money raised on government paper has supplied the deficiency. Attempts are made to justify this extraordinary state of things on the ground that the currency is and has been excessive, that through the influences of this excess, credits have become extravagant—trade has gone beyond the limits of prudence—importations have become unmoderate and property has acquired an unnatural value. The apparent object of the policy is to retain the revenues under the more immediate control of the executive and to check credits among the people by diminishing the amount of money in circulation. The real effect is to diminish business by lessening the means employed to carry it on, and thus curtailing the value of property and the wages of labor. Among men without wealth credit stands in the place of capital, and just to the extent it is restricted, this policy, a decline in business, and a curtailment, drawing after it a proportionate fall of wages.

The whole weight of the administration has been thrown upon the currency, and its fortunes staked upon so reforming it as to restrain credits and trade founded upon them.

The currency has been reduced till money has commanded ruinous rates of interest—trade has declined—importations have been diminished but not more than other business—credits have been curtailed in a vast multitude of distressed debtors can testify—property and wages have been lowered—but where is the prosperity that was to follow? where the golden era of fruition? The aching eyes of many are still starved in vain after it while it recedes in the mirage of the desert before the wry traveler.

Since this policy commenced, years have passed away, and what have we realized, but the tortures of the experiment? In what has our condition been improved? The people have not, it is true, known those, who are born to inheritances, are to carry on a successful business without credit, or how the country can be made to prosper without it. They have yet to learn how reducing the currency is to bring relief, when they see their property sacrificed and themselves overwhelmed for the want of money. If, as many seem to believe, the sub-treasury act will diminish importations, by restraining credits, we have yet to learn, that it will not affect domestic business and trade which is of vastly greater magnitude and importance than the foreign trade for currency and credit are an indispensable to the one as to the other.

Manufacturers believing that no such favorable results, as have been anticipated, would be realized, have, in consequence, been led to the adoption of this policy, protesting against it, as unjust, injurious and an alarming invasion of the liberties of the people. She deplored that act by which the revenues were taken from the custody of law and employed to sustain a system of trade, to excite power. She resisted the sub-treasury act, because it substantially legalizes that dangerous union of the executive with the moneyed power, and because she considers it as the initiatory step towards a paper currency founded on the credit of the State. We have seen her in ambitious bands, she saw that her own monetary institutions would be subject to executive control, and might be held or crippled at pleasure. She saw indeed nothing to hope, but she saw the triumph of the friends of the people, warning the people of the danger. She has been heard, and a response given, condemning the system by an emphatic expression of public opinion.

Yet we see from high sources the adoption of a disposition to cling to it, and still a lingering hope, that it may satisfy itself, as have been struggling with the adversity of the times, that the country has been prosperous? Can the people be persuaded that the treasury is in a favorable condition, when all revenues, sources from more than one hundred and twelve millions of dollars during the last four years, have been exhausted and the country left in debt! Is it such proof of a suitable economy, that nearly thirty millions of this fund consisted of a surplus money arising from cash on hand, bank stock, &c. which has been expended in addition to the current revenue? Is a debt the less burdensome because it is not present, when the president has officially assured us that "indebtedness cannot be lessened by borrowing more money or changing the form of the debt?" The people will form their own judgment in regard to these matters, but I see no satisfactory evidence of economy or of a realization of a general prosperity as a justly commensurate result.

Prospects. The time, however, is at hand when we may hope for an administration of public affairs which will relieve business from its fetters and set upon the country a higher career of improvement. We may, I trust, look for enlightened measures, which will quicken into activity the benumbed energies of our great industrial community; and for a system of actual, practical economy, rigidly enforced, and in harmony with that plain philosophy which is the basis of the people. We may also, I trust, anticipate a policy that will watch over the great interests of the country, encouraging, protecting, cherishing and harmonizing all of them; one that will be an appropriate wisdom to the farmer, the planter, the mechanic, the farmer, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the navigator or fisherman.

A great crisis is at hand when congress must settle the measure of protection which the labor of the part of the country is entitled to from the assessment and collection of the revenue from importations. We shall look to the coming event with deep anxiety, trusting that it will be met in the spirit of conciliation and mutual concession, and in harmony with the common prosperity of the great interests of the country. Nothing short of this can give stability to our republican government and impart contentment to the people. In the accomplishment of this desirable object, in which no one has a greater stake than the laborer, I cannot doubt all good citizens will unite with zeal.

Policy. What we ought most anxiously to seek, is a wise, firm and steady policy, for nothing more deranges business than fluctuating legislation. It is desirable, it must be just, for if it shall disregard one class to favor another, the wound inflicted by such partiality will fester till the whole system becomes diseased. The harmony of the states and the preservation of the great interests of the nation, require legislation, that they demand the exercise of the greatest wisdom and patriotism from all quarters. Nothing can tend more strongly to such an end than the adoption of a comprehensive policy, embracing all the great interests of the country, and the wisdom of congress will be united to accomplish a result so necessary and so unanimously desired.

In entering upon the discharge of the duties assigned to me, I am not un mindful of the great responsibilities that rest upon me. I feel that the confidence reposed in me, I can assure my fellow citizens, that my best efforts to promote the prosperity of the commonwealth shall be devoted to their service. I shall with great satisfaction co-operate with the legislature in giving all possible despatch to the public business, and in maintaining a system of rigid economy and strict accountability in the management of the public money, as far as power to do so is conferred upon me.

The management of the finances, do not enable me to speak of the details on this occasion, but I shall unite with you in any suitable measures of economy which will bring the expenditures within the amount of the revenue, and in every and in any just provision for the payment of such balances as may or may fall due.

There are many other important topics which will occupy your deliberations, and might be appropriately noticed at this time; but it will be more convenient to solicit for them your favorable attention at some period, if the public interest should require it.

It now only remains for me to express to my fellow citizens the abundant sense of gratitude which fills my heart at this renowned expression of their confidence, and to entreat that the smiles and blessings of Divine Providence may rest upon them and upon the commonwealth.

JOHN DAVIS.
Governor, January 9, 1841.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

FELLOW CITIZENS: Among the various duties enjoined by the constitution on the executive magistrate, none is more important and more frequently recurring, than that of "giving to the general assembly information of the state of the commonwealth, and recommending to their consideration such measures as he should deem expedient." On this occasion I am happily relieved from much of the anxiety and embarrassment attendant upon the discharge of this duty, by referring your attention to the annual message which I had the honor to transmit to the legislature on the 8th of January last. That message I felt to be of an imperative duty to deliver into a full and elaborate exposition of my views on several deeply interesting subjects connected with the public welfare, and especially on the subjects of the internal improvements of the commonwealth, the public debt, and the reorganization of the banking system. In regard to these leading questions of vital interest, and the numerous subordinate matters intimately associated and blended with them, I can add very little to the opinions I expressed, and the recommendations I made in a message to which I have just referred you. The experience of the past year has not only confirmed, but strengthened my conviction of the justice and propriety of those opinions and recommendations; and, with the exception of a few unimportant matters, have approved them; and I earnestly invite your careful deliberation, as I did that of the last legislature, upon those portions of the message, to which you will find convenient access upon your journals. I can assure you, with much satisfaction, that I perceive no necessity for changing or modifying, in any essential particular, the recommendations therein contained; and I now here respectfully, but earnestly, recommend the adoption of the recommendations herein made, or such modifications as the present legislature will not separate, until they shall have made a searching and thorough reform of the imperfections and manifold abuses of the present system. To me it has been a subject of deep regret that my recommendations on this subject did not meet the approbation of the last legislature, persuaded as I am, that the most beneficial influences would have resulted from their adoption. It is not, however, too late to apply the remedy still; and I again recommend, with earnestness, those measures for reforming the abuses of the banking system to your early attention.

Redemption of specie payments. The redemption of specie by banks on the part of the banks, which constituted, a year ago, such a formidable portion of the difficulty in the way of efficient legislation, is about to be consummated, without your active interference at all. Under the resolution passed on the 15th of April last, there is no subject now required, on and after the 15th day of January instant, to pay on demand all their notes, bills, deposits, and other liabilities in gold or silver coin, on penalty of the forfeiture of their charter, upon the condition set forth in said resolution. It affords me great pleasure to state, that although the day fixed for the redemption was more remote than I wished at the time, yet the period of indulgence has nearly passed away, and there is now good ground to expect that the banks, which are now wealthy, will, as they are required to do, be prepared again to discharge their liabilities in specie. Should they do so, by continuing strictly to observe the law, and by fulfilling the just expectations of the public, they may regain the confidence which they have hitherto lost, and more particularly may they do this if proper measures be adopted for the better regulation and control of their operations.

One of the most immediate advantages resulting to the commonwealth from the redemption of specie payments, will be the entire extinction from circulation of the illegitimate brood of small notes that have been poured in upon us, from the neighboring states and cities, in defiance of law, and of the most active endeavor to suppress them. I cannot, however, conclude this part of my subject without recommending that no increase of our banking capital be made under any circumstances, and that official provisions be made by law, that if any bank shall, at any time hereafter, issue a specie payable, it shall be ipso facto a forfeiture of its charter. Nothing short of an absolute and unconditional provision of this kind can arrest the frequent over-issue of bank notes, induced by the inordinate cupidity of those under whose directions they were conducted. Let the great principle be distinctly announced, as the foundation on which our banking institutions rest, that, hereafter, there are to be no more suspensions of specie payments in Pennsylvania.

Public improvement. The condition of the public improvements during the past year, has been attended to by the officers entrusted with their management, with untiring industry and care. They are in a much better state of repair than they ever have been since their construction, and but little delay or interruption in business has occurred. The amount of business done on the main line, it is true, has not been so large as last year, but it has been owing to causes in no degree connected with the management of the public improvements. I refer you to the report of the canal commissioners for a detailed and accurate statement of the present condition of the improvements, the sum required to complete those lines in a state of forwardness, and the amount needed for repairs on the canals and rail roads now in operation, as well as the amount due for repairs heretofore done.

I feel it to be my duty again to state in the legislature, that as soon as those portions of the unfinished lines of improvement, now almost completed, are finished, and upon which, if the work has been suspended more would have been lost to the commonwealth, than by hastening their completion, I think it full time for Pennsylvania to pause in her career of internal improvement, and test for a time the usefulness and value of the stupendous achievements she has already made. I have been from the beginning, the friend and advocate of the internal improvement system of this commonwealth, and shall continue to be, so long as that system is confined to the immediate tributaries of the commonwealth; but our immense public debt, and the sacrifices which the people are called upon to make in consequence of it, for the payment of the interest, and of the principal as it falls due, forcibly admonish us, to consider the wisdom of the policy, which we pursue, and to diminish as much as may be practicable the burdens now imposed upon the people of the state.

The amount necessary to complete the main line and to test the improvement now in use in a thorough state of repair, you will be fully informed of by the canal commissioners; which amount of money I would respectfully suggest, should be immediately appropriated as to as enable the canal commission to make such arrangements as they may see fit with most advantage to the public service. Great and immediate repairs to our improvements are indispensable, if we hope to maintain the character of those improvements, and to prevent our immediate resources from being so extravagantly diverted, as to leave a large share of the business of the west and south. The honor of Pennsylvania is too deeply involved in this measure to admit of apathy or delay. Feeling as citizens of this commonwealth should not on this subject, I am sure in strong advocacy of action could be presented in you, than that of enlightened and many state pride, addressing itself to you through the medium of official duty.

Public debt—Finances.

The present amount of the public debt is Permanent loans at 5 per cent. $3,086,913 82
Do. do. 4 1/2 per cent. 200,000 00
Temporary loans at 4 per cent. 15,000 00

$3,381,913 82

Due U. States on account of deposites surplus revenue, 2,867,514 78

Unpaid appropriations, 622,249 69

$3,670,773 69

Upon an examination of the debts and liabilities of the commonwealth, on the 15th of January, 1839, and the subsequent laws passed, authorizing loans and making appropriations, it will be found that nearly the whole sum borrowed since that period has been applied to debts and liabilities then due and falling due, on account of the public works finished and in progress—to the payment of temporary and stock loans—for interest on the public debt, and for the repairs of the canals and railways of the commonwealth.

The only sums appropriated out of the loans authorized to be made since I came into office, which were not applied to liabilities then due, or growing out of contracts, which existed at that time, are the following:

To the survey of a rail road from $45,000 00

Harriburg to Pittsburg,

To stock in the Pennsylvania and 50,000 00

Ohio canal,

To stock in the Franklin rail road, 100,000 00

To stock in the Monongahela navigation company, 100,000 00

$250,000 00

Public property.

Bank stock,	$2,085,700 00
Turnpike and bank stock,	2,330,315 00
Canal and navigation stock,	143,260 00
Rail road stock,	333,516 90
Money due on land, estimated,	1,000,000 00
Public works, canals, railways, &c.	29,673,595 17

$36,488,370 96

Thus it appears that the resources of the commonwealth are abundant, but not immediately available for the purpose of paying either the principal or the interest of the public debt.

It is here proper to remark, that it has not been the uniform practice of the legislature to provide sufficient revenue to meet the current demands upon the state treasury. The various appropriations of the public treasure have exceeded the public income. Out of this state of affairs a custom has grown up at the treasury, it seems, to pay the demands upon it, as they are from time to time presented, without reference to the specific appropriation of part of the moneys therein to the payment of the interest upon the public debt, which falls due semi-annually, on the 1st of February and 1st of August. Under this custom it has happened, that by a deficiency of other means, the moneys arising from tolls, auction duties, tax on collateral inheritance, dividends on turnpike, canal and navigation stocks, and estates, which had been set apart by law towards the payment of the interest on the public debt, have been paid out indiscriminately to meet other demands upon the treasury. This will, therefore, be a debt on the part of the government for the payment of interest on the public debt, upon the 1st of February next, of perhaps $300,000. This, as well as every other subject relating to the revenue, belongs exclusively to the legislative branch of the government, and no recommendation of the executive can be required, to bespeak for it the necessity for some special legislation in relation to its future disbursement.

The tax. It is computed that the tax which will be tendered arisable under the act of the 14th of June, 1840, entitled "an act to create additional revenue to be applied towards the payment of interest, and the extinguishment of the debt, of the commonwealth," will amount to about $600,000.—The sum which will be raised by this tax, together with the other resources of the commonwealth, will most probably liquidate the interest account, without further resort to loans for that purpose. This act is to continue in force five years, and provides such a rule for the raising of the tax, as to fall with gentle weight upon those who are little able to bear any addition to their expenses. The articles taxed are those purely of luxury, such as gold watches, pleasure carriages, household furniture exceeding the value three hundred dollars, together with boots, bills and notes of solvent obsolescent, bank stock or stock in other corporations, yielding dividends of at least one per cent. salaries of public officers and real estate.

Although this act undoubtedly operates with considerable hardship upon those who fall within the reach of its provisions; still they are comparatively, subjected to very little inconvenience, for in most instances they do not belong to the poorer classes, on whom taxation usually falls with the most peculiar severity.

To impose taxes on any class of our fellow citizens is not very agreeable, nor a very popular task; but when, as in this case, the honor and fidelity of Pennsylvania must be sacrificed, or a tax of this kind be enacted, there are, for very few men in the commonwealth, worthy to be ranked among her free, intelligent and upright citizens, who will shrink from their share of the burthen. When, too, it is known that those who recommended, and who sanctioned the bill imposing the tax, are in no way responsible for the necessity that compelled a resort to it, than any of those who are to pay it, the fully and i-justice of those who would condemn, are rendered still more conspicuous. I found the debt upon which this interest was to be paid, in existence when I assumed the functions of the executive and found nothing to pay it with. The treasury was exhausted, and no means left to meet this responsibility but further loans, a sale of the improvements, or taxation. The first two were impracticable, and I was driven by stern necessity to the adoption of the latter alternative. I saw but one path before me open to pursuit, and that was the path of duty. I recommended taxation; that recommendation was sanctioned by the legislature, and the cause of proud gratification to me, when I consider that the people of Pennsylvania, almost to a man, so far as I have been informed, with a firmness and patriotism worthy of themselves, have yielded to this necessity without murmur or rejoicing. I feel fully convinced that at the expiration of the five years at farthest, with a reasonable degree of prudence, and wise and judicious economy in the management of our affairs, the income of our improvements will render a renewal of this law wholly unnecessary.

If any difference of opinion exists as to the necessity of this tax, let these questions be answered by those who are in the majority. Do not you have a debt? Is it not morally and legally bound to pay it and its interest, as it falls due? Can they point out any other mode by which this can be done?

You, however, have come directly from the people, and are bound best to know the opinions on this as well as all other subjects; and if you differ in opinion with me on this important subject, and think the tax ought not to have been laid, it is your duty to repeal the law instantly. No part of the interest upon the public debt, which is the cause of extricating the commonwealth from the difficulties in which I found it, my views and opinions remain unchanged. Yet if the immediate representatives of the people think proper to repeal the law, and can substitute any other mode less objectionable which will promptly meet the exigency, be it so; the responsibility rests with them.

Faith of the state. I can never consent, by word or deed, to countenance the idea that the faith of the state can be violated by failure in our engagements. If there be any in our country who would be willing, if they were able, to abrogate the contracts of the commonwealth, and be faithless to our creditors, let their doctrine be distinctly avowed and the sanction made up before the people; the intelligence and integrity of our citizens would speedily convince the world that they feel the necessity in a republican government of maintaining unsullied, public faith and national honor.

Deficiency in the funds for payment of the interest. The deficiency in the funds set apart for the payment of the interest on the public debt falling due on the 1st of February next, must be promptly provided for. By the act of the eleventh of June last, the government authorized to procure its own, and for that purpose proposals have been invited; whether the money can be procured I know not, and in case it cannot, I see no other mode left to avoid the dishonor of the state credit, but the sale of a sufficient amount of the stock owned by the state, or the other, or all of the banks in which she is interested. The state owns the following amount of stock in each of the banks named, viz: The Bank of Pennsylvania $3,730 shares, Philadelphia bank $,233 shares, Farmers' and Merchants' bank $,100 shares. The stock would most probably command a ready sale, and I do most sincerely hope that not a day will be lost before this possible blot on the faith and honor of the state is effectually gilded against by the prompt action of the legislature.

Internal improvements. In my last annual message, the question was distinctly presented to the legislature whether the works then in progress should be prosecuted to immediate completion or not, and the question was by then determined in the affirmative, and the sum of $600,000 appropriated to each of what has usually been denominated the main lines; and the works being so far progressed in as to warrant the expectation of their being completed in another year, all will now concur in the opinion, I presume, that provision, should be immediately made for the completion of the unfinished works as soon as possible.

A judicious and immediate appropriation, promptly made in anticipation of the usual appropriation bill, specifically for the works under consideration, for the completion of the reservoirs at each end of the Portage rail road—and for ordinary repairs, is impudently called for, and will enable the contractors to complete the whole, and have them ready for use by the opening of the navigation in the spring of 1842. The vast importance of the immediate completion of the main line, as well to the citizens immediately interested in them, as to the fiscal interests of the commonwealth, cannot be too strongly and repeatedly urged upon the attention of the legislature in communication between the great lakes and our commercial metropolis. They will also, by a proper arrangement with the authorities of New York, connect our improvements with those of that great commercial empire, and thus afford an opportunity of exchanging the products of the two states, and strengthening the bonds of our national union. They will also add largely to the revenue of the works now in use.

Waterside differences of opinion may have existed as to the policy of commencing the Erie extension and North Branch canals, there ought to be none now as to their speedy completion. They are nearly finished, a comparatively small sum is necessary to complete them, and the policy of a continued and protracted delay in completing works which the state is pledged to accomplish, until the first work done upon them has become useless from decay, has proved disastrous and ruinous on many occasions.

The course heretofore usual, of neglecting to appropriate a sufficient sum for repairs, and that early in the season, has been seriously detrimental to the interests of the commonwealth. At the last session, the commissioners stated that the local estimates for repairs cost $700,000; and that the sum appropriated $500,000, a great portion of which was absorbed by debts then due. The result has shown that the commissioners were right. The fund has long since been exhausted. The necessary repairs have not been completed, and those who have been engaged at them are unpaid, and the supervisors are without funds to lay in the necessary materials for repairs. The repairs on the lines of canals in use would ordinarily be made in the fall, when they would not interrupt the use of the canals; and it has usually happened that before the arrival of winter the officers have no means at their command, no appropriation bill is passed until late in the session. The whole system repairs, in consequence of the uncertainty of the time of paying the workmen, and those who furnish materials, costs the commonwealth much more than it would do, were the means of payment ample, certain and promptly supplied.

Beaver division of the Pennsylvania canal. The Beaver division of the Pennsylvania canal is already connected with the public improvements of Ohio by the Pennsylvania and Ohio canal, a work which has been completed by individual enterprise, aided by public appropriations from the state of Ohio, and it is a valuable tributary to our public improvements, and a profitable investment for the stockholders. It has been accomplished at a less cost than any other work of the kind which I have visited, and is a monument of the wisdom of its projectors, and of the skill, prudence and economy of those charged with its construction.

Law authorizing the canal commissioners to treat with New York. I respectfully recommend to the legislature, the enactment of the law authorizing the canal commissioners to treat with the authorities of the state of New York for such a connection of our internal improvements with theirs, as will best promote the interest of the two commonwealths. The law should limit the terms and conditions, and define the nature and authorities of the commission in such manner as to leave consideration shall be deemed proper.

Selling or leasing water power. The interest of the commonwealth would also be advanced by entrusting the same board with the power of selling or leasing water power, and authorizing its improvements. There are at many points, and in very advantageous situations, surplus quantities of water which could be profitably applied to various branches of manufacture without injury to the due supply of our canals. The sale or lease of such water power would be increased thereby, and a considerable sum realized from such sale or lease.

Guaranty for the payment of interest on stock of the Bald Eagle and Spring Creek navigation. By an act of the 7th April, 1835, a guaranty was made, on the part of the state, for the redemption of the 5 per cent. for twenty five years on $200,000 of the capital stock of the Bald Eagle and Spring Creek navigation company; and by a subsequent act, the state has since subscribed $25,000 to the stock of the company. The works were completed in the spring of 1836, and in active operation, except the last six miles, on which about one-third of the excavation and embankment is made, two locks completed, and another nearly completed. A comparatively trifling sum would finish the work, and the navigation of the company are exhausted, and the commonwealth is annually called upon for the amount of her guaranty, and her subscription is wholly unproductive. It is a very valuable tributary to the state canal, terminating in one of the richest mineral regions in the world, or perhaps any other country. Every article coming out of it pays a toll on our state canal for 150 miles to Columbia. I therefore submit to the better judgment of the legislature, whether a sound economy does not dictate the further subscription of a sum sufficient to finish it, believing that its productiveness will than be amply sufficient to relieve the commonwealth from any further payment of her guaranty.

Improvements by means of private companies. There are at present many public improvements in a course of construction in our state by means of private companies, most of which I cannot but think are calculated to benefit Pennsylvania in a very high degree. Among the latter I may particularize the Williamsport and Elmira rail road as tending with certainly to produce this result. This road will connect the Grand Erie canal from New York, by the Seneca Lake, with the West Branch canal at Williamsport, and also intersect, at Elmira, the great southern rail road, now being constructed from the Hudson river to Erie. The advantages of this advantage likely to result to ourselves from the construction of this road will be, that the great amount of baggage and travel which now annually finds its way from the lakes, through the state of New York to the Atlantic, will thus be brought directly through our own public improvements to Philadelphia, the distance from Elmira to the latter city, by this route, being 71 miles shorter than from Elmira to the city of New York by any contemplated improvement in that route. The advantages of a similar character, and perhaps of equal importance, might be noticed.

Publication of all laws of a public nature. Every man is presumed to be present in the legislature by his representative, and to know what public laws are enacted, and is therefore held to be bound by them from the time of their enactment. This notice, however, is but a constructive one. I would respectfully suggest that the publication of all laws of a public nature in the immediate publication of all laws of a public nature is not necessary, to give to the people actual notice of provisions by which they may be seriously affected.

Public schools. The report of the superintendent of public schools, which will shortly be laid before you, will show the progress which the cause of education is making in public opinion, and the state and condition of the colleges, academies and schools, throughout the commonwealth.

Geological survey. Though the active operations of the geological survey are not yet entirely completed, a much greater extent of country has been minutely explored during the past season, than in any former one. In the state geologist and his experts were laboriously occupied in the field, their researches extending into various districts, both east and west of the Alleghany mountains. The inquiry, acquired during the progress of the survey, into the more minute features of our geology, and the true position of our various mineral deposits, has served greatly to increase the accuracy and value of the large body of facts now collected. Thirteen, out of several extensive tracts of country, have, up to this time, been accurately and minutely explored, by which particular beds of those useful substances iron ore, coal, marble and limestone can be traced, much of the obscurity has been removed. Several districts, however, of our country, have not yet been examined to be explored. Though some of them have been already faithfully examined, one year more will be necessary for unravelling the intricacies of their structure and enabling the geologist to arrive at a satisfactory knowledge of their position. For this purpose an appropriation will become necessary. The amount, however, will be less than the sum hitherto annually expended. The topographical maps now in a course of construction, are essential as a basis for the geological map called for by the law. In the chemical department of the survey, an extensive series of ores, coal, cement, fluxes, &c., have been analysed, resulting in a species of knowledge now becoming every day more important to the growing manufacturing, and mining interests of Pennsylvania.

Pecuniary embarrassments in the business community. It is an unlamented fact, that the few last years have been a period of peculiar embarrassment in our business community. It has been consoling, however, to reflect that during a portion of that time, our husbandmen have reaped a full reward for their labor in abundant crops, for which, until recently, they have not been rewarded in any manner. But not generally been afflicted with that evil spirit of speculation, which at one time seemed to have seized so large a part of other portions of our citizens, and induced them to engage in almost every visionary scheme in their "pursuit to get rich."

The causes of this embarrassment have been variously explained, as varied the views of those who undertook the task. My own views upon this subject have been fully and ably expressed in my communications to the preceding legislature. No one, however, can doubt, that when our country is importing large amounts of the luxuries and superfluities of life from foreign countries, and not exporting a sufficient quantity of our own products to pay for them, there must be a constant drain of the precious metals, and hence a scarcity of money to supply the wants of our community at home. A retrenchment among our citizens, of those plain republican simplicity has ever been a distinguishing characteristic in the purchase and use of articles of mere luxury, would greatly tend to lessen this cause of pecuniary embarrassment.

The consequences of our embarrassment in our mercantile and manufacturing operations, are now beginning to be felt, also, by our farmers, in the more recent reduction of the prices of their products, although the feeling communicated by the severity of the treasury in his late report is cheering, that during the last year the exports from this country have exceeded the imports by nearly twenty-seven millions of dollars. This is certainly encouraging, especially when we reflect that the proceeds of the reverse was the fact; and that without going back further, in the year 1836, the excess of imports exceeded the exports upwards of sixty-one millions of dollars. In 1837, twenty-three and a half millions of dollars; in 1838, five millions of dollars; and in 1839, forty-one millions of dollars; and that in 1837, the import of the single article of silk, a mere luxury, which our own country is as capable of producing as any other, amounted to twenty-three millions of dollars, while our export of flour during the same year, was but about seven millions of dollars. It is to be hoped, and the increased confidence growing out of the resumption of specie payments about to take place, warrants the conclusion, that the country will resume its accustomed rank, and be taking lessons of prudence from the past, our citizens will not again be tempted into those wild excesses which have well nigh led on to bankruptcy and ruin, and the prostration of public and private credit and confidence.

Our commonwealth's resources, iron, coal, &c. Our commonwealth possesses a fertile soil, and unbounded agricultural and mineral wealth. We have with in ourselves almost all the necessities, and many of the luxuries of life. With the exercise of intelligence and means, we find our farmers augmenting the products of their soil, improving their stocks of domestic animals, and adding to the neatness of their household establishments. No one can pass through our commonwealth, without being struck with the air of substantial comfort, and increasing prosperity, which pervades the agricultural districts of the state.

The variety and extent of our water power, give great facilities to the manufacture of our grain into bread stuff, and for every other branch of manufacture, either needed for the supply of our citizens, or for the employment of their capital.

Our commonwealth is rich in the full development of her resources, with her present pecuniary responsibilities weighing her down, we might well contemplate our situation with trembling solicitude. But this is not the case. Throughout the commonwealth, the people are engaged in the pursuit of a square mile which does not abound in some or all of the great staples of her mineral wealth. Anthracite and bituminous coal, iron, marble and limestone, have been scattered by nature with a most profuse and liberal hand. Her husbandmen are enabled to prove with what prodigality they have been lavished upon us. The coal field of our commonwealth embraces more than one-fifth of its area, and more than three times as much as belongs to entire Europe.

Connected with the coal, which abounds in so large a portion of the commonwealth, we have large supplies of iron ore, almost in immediate contact with it. In addition thereto we have, within convenient distances, almost all the other varieties of iron ore found in any part of the world. The adaptation of anthracite coal to the smelting of iron ore has been followed by its successful and profitable application to the smelting of the same metal, and that the same result may be followed from the application of bituminous coal may be looked for with almost absolute certainty.

While the iron manufactured with charcoal, will also be found to be the finest, and the demand for it increased by the natural increase of the population of the country, that manufactured from mineral coal, will be employed in the construction of rail roads, and for innumerable other purposes.

This discovery must stand as a distinguished era in the annals of our commonwealth. It cannot fail to add millions of dollars to her active and available capital; and will ere long transfer to our own citizens, more than all of the large sums that are now annually sent abroad for the purchase of the same iron manufactured articles. The manufacture of these numerous and valuable commodities will not only result in enriching Pennsylvania, but will cut off a large item in the imports of this country, tend to relieve our treasury from European dependence, enable our sister states to complete their rail roads at a cheaper and better rate, and strengthen the national union, by the strongest of all ties, that of mutual interest.

It is not in Pennsylvania a single class of citizens who will not share directly in the advantages. The owners of coal and iron deposits, and those who engage in the manufacture and sale of these productions, will derive the first benefit; but the farmer, the mechanic, the merchant, and every other citizen, will feel immediately the salutary impulse which will be communicated to his own peculiar business. The value of our canal and our roads must be greatly enhanced, as well as that of all other species of property. With the cheap and ready means which they will afford for the transportation of our various products and manufactures, there can be no doubt that our trade and business will soon must extend and increase with unexampled rapidity, and by prudence and good management be perpetuated.

In this gradual and certain development of our resources, we may be found abundant means to maintain our public debt, and to discharge every other liability that can justly be cast upon the state. I confess it affords me peculiar gratification to advert to this hope, for it shows most satisfactorily that though this commonwealth has been somewhat in advance of the time in extending her improvement system so widely as she has done, the people, notwithstanding, are destined at no remote period to realize, most amply, all the benefits it was ever expected to produce. It is to be hoped, that our citizens will not necessarily tend to afford additional sources of employment for the laborer, and furnish increased security against all improper combinations for the reduction of wages.

If any degree of apprehension has existed, from the attempts in large manufacturing establishments to keep their operatives in subervieny in matters of opinion and the exercise of political rights, let the evil be corrected by shaking off the shackles of ignorance and undue dependence either upon the information or the will of others. Then instead of having a class of human beings in a state of vassalage, we would rear up freemen capable of thought and action, and capable of being so permanent on that spirit of independence which influenced our forefathers in achieving our freedom, and which ought ever to pervade the bosom of their descendants to the latest generation.

Every citizen who is called to any duty done in an exemplary manner, her duties as a member of the great federal union, of which she has, not inaptly, been denominated the "key stone," must never forget the duties which we, as her immediate functionaries, are called upon to perform, and the duty of advancing and sustaining them, as far as can be done without interfering with her duties to the general government.

On the part of the legislature, nothing is wanted but the exercise of spirit of her various interests, to place this commonwealth on a firm basis of pecuniary independence. Whatever course other states may think proper to pursue, let it be the patriotic duty of Pennsylvania to sustain and cherish every effort to develop her resources, and to advance her glory and renown. Vindicate her character for integrity—fulfill all her engagements faithfully—sustain her resources with economy, but not with a false and mistaken spirit of parsimony. Liberty—and the fair face of Pennsylvania will stand before the world without spot or blemish to tarnish it. To maintain this fame untroubled, should be the first and most unyielding duty of every citizen honored with any station, in which he is called upon to guard and sustain himself unworthy of the office, with which the people have clothed me, if I proved recreant to this high trust.

By a judicious system of laws, corresponding with the highest spirit of industry, fostering, and encouraging enterprise and industry, and enabling our citizens to reap the full reward of their labor and perseverance, we shall fulfil the expectations of our constituents, and be the means under Divine Providence, of perpetuating the blessings of liberty, to be so signally shrouded upon us, by the Author of all Good.

Too much legislation. The experience of many years fortifies me in the belief, that our greatest error in our system of government, is that we legislate too much. Our legislatures have been holding one extra session after another, and that, too, in times of profound peace, and when the calls of patriotism are imperiously made on every public functionary to diminish, or rather to entirely suspend his legislative duties, which the state has been laboring. The consequence has been, an unparalleled increase in the legislative expenses over all other departments of the government. I can recommend no more certain and effective remedy, than to limit the number of sessions; still let the conduct of every department of the government be thoroughly scrutinized, and let no important interest of the people be neglected.

The baneful practice of converting the halls of legislation into an arena for the display of political gladiators, which has too long characterised the halls of our national legislature, is a lamentable departure from the course pursued by the band of patriots who composed "the first congress," and whose example, I hope, for the honor of our common country, has not yet been wholly forgotten by their successors.—The pernicious tendency of this practice of the national legislature, will not, I trust, be extended to the legislatures of their respective states; and I am sure, I need scarcely add, I have no apprehensions of its reaching the legislature of this commonwealth. No public functionary who would yield to its influence need expect to lose the confidence and respect of the people of Pennsylvania.

In conclusion, I shall beg leave to refer you to the views on several subjects contained in my last annual message. That message being the first which I had the honor to communicate at the commencement of a session of the legislature, I went more into detail on the various topics discussed in it, than I supposed would be again necessary, with a view to an expression of opinion on them, as well for that occasion, as for future reference. I therefore refer you to it for my recommendations on the subject of reform of the banking system, &c.—the importance of connecting and completing at the earliest day practicable, the disconnected part of our disjointed and unfinished system of internal improvements—the making of prompt and ample provision for keeping the public improvements in repair—the necessity of preserving unimpaired, the credit of the commonwealth, and promptly meeting all her pecuniary engagements—the most careful attention to be exercised in creating, renewing and supervising corporations—the subject of education, and as connected with it, that of procuring competent teachers and school books—the subject of the increase of writs of error and appeals in the supreme court, and reporting the decisions of that court—the militia system, the encouragement of volunteers and the reduction of militia training to one day in the year—the evasion of the laws relative to collateral inheritance tax—and the revision of the laws relative to the selecting and drawing of jurors.

It will afford me great pleasure to co-operate with the legislature, in these, and all other measures calculated to promote the common good of our commonwealth.

DAVID R. PORTER.

Executive chamber, January 6, 1841.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS—2d SESSION.

SENATE.

January 19. Mr. Bayard, senator elect from Delaware, was qualified, and took his seat.

The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the secretary of the treasury, made in compliance with a resolution of the 16th instant, relating for the plan of the secretary in relation to the permanent change of the tariff.

Mr. Robinson presented a resolution of the legislature of Illinois, remonstrating against the repeal of the sub-treasury, and against the establishment of a national bank.

Mr. Lumpkin presented several resolutions of the legislature of Georgia; one in relation to the claim of Daniel Hils for services rendered as issuing commissary, another in relation to depredations on property by the Creek Indians; and another in relation to the establishment of several mail routes.

The following memorials and petitions were presented and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Merrick, from the citizens of Baltimore, asking the erection of a fortress on Soler's point flats.

By Mr. Huntington, asking confirmation of claims to land on the north side of Lake of Superior.

By Mr. Porter, from citizens of Michigan, asking the passage of a bill to incorporate the owners and masters of the city of New York, asking that a light boat be placed at Execution Rocks.

Mr. Pierce, on leave introduced a bill relating to the judicial courts of the district of New Hampshire.

Mr. White, on leave, introduced a bill to provide for claims to bounty lands for military services during the late war.

On motion of Mr. Hubbard, the engrossed bill to pay the claims of New Hampshire for the services of her militia, (which was laid on the table a few days since), was read a third time and passed.

Mr. Tappan moved to take up the bill from the house making temporary provision for the lunatics in the District of Columbia. The bill, as amended, restricts the expense to 3,000. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Sturgeon moved to take up, as the unfinished business of yesterday, the bill making an appropriation for the patent office. The motion pending being Mr. Calhoun's, to strike out the $1,000 appropriated for agricultural stations. On this motion the yeas and nays were ordered, when there appeared: yeas 14, nays 23. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The following bills were severally considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed:

A bill authorising the president of the United States to cause surveys of the lakes and lake coast to be made.

A bill regulating commercial intercourse with the port of Cayenne, in the colony of French Guiana, and to remit certain duties.

A bill to refund the duties collected on the French ship Alexandre.

Mr. Clay said it would be recollected that two resolutions were submitted by him a day or two ago, calling on the secretary of the treasury for his plan of a permanent tariff, and for a mode of assessing the value of goods in our own ports, instead of those of foreign countries. The document which had been read in the senate this morning was in answer to the first part of the resolution. There could be no doubt that it was an important matter, and if the senate thought there were additional copies needed, he would move for an extra number, say 1,000. He thought the report himself, but a friend had informed him that it recommended an adherence to the compromise act, acknowledged the deficit in the revenue, and recommended that it be supplied by the imposition of duties on free articles. Mr. King thought the general number would be sufficient, and the total number was accordingly ordered.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the bill for the establishment of a permanent prospective pre-emption system, when Mr. Waile rose and addressed the senate until a late hour.

The question was taken on Mr. Calhoun's motion to cede the public lands, &c. by yeas and nays, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholson, Norrell, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Young—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Buchanan, Calhoun, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Rogers, Smith, of Indiana, Tappan, White, Wright—18.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Crittenden to recommit the bill, with such instructions as would embody the two principles, pre-emption and distribution; when there appeared for the motion as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Rogers, Smith, of Indiana, Sevier, Tappan, White, Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholson, Norrell, Pierce, Porter, Preston, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Connecticut, Tappan, Walker, Wright, Young—24.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. Prentiss, giving to every head of a family over 21 years of age, (on lands where the Indian title is extinguished), who should be in possession at the time of passing this act and the four months after, the right of pre-emption to purchase of one quarter section of the remaining part.

On this amendment the yeas and nays being also taken, they resulted as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rogers, Sevier, Tappan, White, Wright, Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Alabama, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholson, Norrell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Smith, of Indiana, Tappan, Walker, White, Wright, Young—25.

Mr. Huntington said there were other amendments yet to be offered, and though he was not dissatisfied with the result of the vote, yet he was not disposed to insist on taking the question, he was prepared to go on.

Mr. Merrick moved that the senate adjourn.

Mr. Clay, of Alabama, hoped not, and wished the question taken on the pre-emption taken.

The question being put on Mr. Merrick's motion, there appeared for it 21, against it 19.

So the senate adjourned.

January 20. The vice president laid before the senate a communication from the state department, in compliance with a resolution of the 20th July last.

Also, from the war department, transmitting, in compliance with a law, a statement of all the contracts made by that department during the year 1840.

Also, a communication from the secretary of the treasury, in answer to the resolution introduced some time since by Mr. Smith, of Indiana, relative to the canal lands covered by Indian reservations on the Wabash and Erie canal, which, on motion of Mr. Smith, was referred to the committee on roads and canals. Mr. S. said he would not ask the printing now, as the communication would necessarily be printed with the report of the committee.

The following memorials and petitions were presented, and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Wright, from a number of citizens, merchants and others, of New York, remonstrating against the removal of any bank from New York during the present session. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed, with the names attached.

By Mr. Benton, from citizens of New York, merchants, traders and others, asking that no bankrupt law may be passed without including banks and corporations. Laid on the table and ordered to be printed, with the names attached.

Mr. Smith, of Indiana, from the committee on the judiciary, reported a bill, without amendment, relating to the judicial courts of New Hampshire.

Mr. S. moved to take up the bill as in committee of the whole, and have it engrossed. The bill was then considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill from the house making temporary provision for the lunatics in the District of Columbia, was taken up in its passage, when it was opposed by Messrs. Wright, Smith, of Connecticut, Henderson and Calhoun, and then to the states of Messrs. Tappan, Merrick, King, Lumpkin and Walker, when the question was taken on its passage, by yeas and nays and determined in the affirmative, yeas 41, nays 7.

The following bills were severally read a third time and passed:

The bill regulating commercial intercourse between the port of Cayenne, in French Guiana, and for the remission of certain duties.

The bill to authorise the secretary of the treasury to refund the duties collected on the French ship Alexandre.

The bill authorising the president of the United States to cause surveys of the lakes and lake coasts to be made.

The bill making certain appropriations for the patent office.

On motion of Mr. Wright, the bill to authorise the secretary of the treasury to compound with the sureties of Samuel Swartwout, late collector of the treasury, was considered in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

On motion of Mr. Walker, the bill to relinquish the 2 per cent. fund to the state of Mississippi, according to the act of admission of said state into union, was taken up in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed.

The senate then proceeded to the discussion of the special order, the prospective pre-emption bill, when various amendments were offered, and some adopted. A debate ensued which occupied the senate until 6 P. M. in which Messrs. Huntington, Clay, of Ky., Mangum, Clay, of Ala., Porter, Buchanan, Linn and others participated, when the bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay, of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Mouton, Nicholson, Norrell, Phelps, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn. Smith, of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Wright, Young—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, of Ken. Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Graham, Huntington, Kerr, Knight, Mangum, Merrick, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Rogers, Sevier, Tappan, White, Wright, Young—20.

And then the senate adjourned.

January 21. Mr. Webster presented the credentials of the hon. Isaac C. Bates, senator elect from Massachusetts, in the place of Mr. Davis, resigned; which being read, Mr. Bates was duly qualified and took his seat.

Memorials and petitions were presented by Messrs. Porter, Pierce, Sturgeon, Mangum and Tullamond.

Mr. Merrick, from the committee for the District of Alexandria, reported a bill to charter the Bank of Alexandria, in the city of Alexandria; which was, on motion of Mr. M. taken up and ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. King, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill, from the house, authorising the enrollment of the schooner L'Asiat, without amendment.

Also, from the same committee, a bill to abolish the port of delivery at Currituck inlet and the office of surveyor of the customs.

By Mr. Henderson, from the chamber of commerce, of N. Orleans, praying for a bankrupt law.

Mr. Benton reported a resolution to take measures to settle and quiet the titles of claimants to the Pea Patch.

The senate then proceeded to the further consideration of the special order, being the prospective pre-emption bill.

On which Mr. Allen, of Ohio, spoke at length. After which Mr. Mangum took the floor; but owing to the lateness of the hour, on motion of Mr. Wall, the senate proceeded to a short executive session. And then adjourned.

January 26. The following memorials and petitions were presented, and appropriately referred:

By Mr. Smith, of Indiana, two petitions from citizens of Randolph county, Indiana, male and female, numerous signed, on the subject of the recognition of the independence of Hayti, and also in relation to an amendment of the constitution of the United States so as to provide for the security of people of color in the free states, and to make the free men the sole basis of representation.

On motion of Mr. Sevier, the motion to receive was laid on the table.

By Mr. Merrick, a memorial from the citizens of Washington, respectfully asking leave to protest against the passage, in its present shape, of the bill to amend the several acts, entitled "a bill to amend and continue in force the act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington."

Mr. M. said this memorial was signed by near 300 inhabitants of the city of Washington, and all American citizens, without regard to party distinctions, and of all classes; the subject was then before the committee for the District of Columbia, to which he would move the reference of this, and that it be passed.

By Mr. Buchanan, from D. W. Prescott, stating the destruction of goods by fire on which a portion of the duty had been paid and bonds given for the remainder, asking that the duties paid might be refunded.

By Mr. Merrick, from a number of citizens of Prince George's county, Maryland, representing a portion of the tobacco planting interest, asking the aid of measures by the general government for the purpose of relieving their staple from the grievous burdens imposed on it by foreign countries.

Mr. M. spoke at some length, showing from the facts the burdens borne by this class, and the inequality that prevailed with regard to it.

Mr. Guthrie spoke in reply to Mr. M. also at some length, expressing his surprise that, at the present enlightened age of political science, any proposition for relieving duties should be countenanced, and denying that such a course would be productive of the results supposed.

Mr. Merrick rose to reply, when Mr. Clay, of Alabama, said the hour for the special order had arrived, and that the discussion could be confined to the morning.

On motion of Mr. Linn, the bill supplementary to an act entitled "an act to amend an act for the appointment of commissioners to adjust the claims to reservations of land under the treaty of 1836 with the Choctaw Indians," was called up.

Mr. L. said this bill had been passed at the last session, but was lost in the house for want of time. He said in the friends of the bill thought it would require some change of phraseology; it was immaterial to him what change was made, so as the object of the treaty would be accomplished. He desired to have the bill as perfect as possible, keeping in view the fact that it would be required to secure action upon it in the other body.

Mr. Henderson moved to commit the bill, which was agreed to.

The senate then proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the prospective pre-emption bill. When Mr. Mangum rose and addressed the senate at considerable length on the subject.

Mr. Benton followed, also at length, and Mr. Tallmadge replied exclusively to Mr. Benton. And then the senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, Jan. 19. By common consent the following session bills, which was lying on the speaker's table, were read the first and second time and referred to committees, viz:

To confirm the survey and location of claims for land in the state of Mississippi, east of Pearl river and south of the 31st degree of north latitude; to the committee on public lands.

Supplementary to an act entitled "an act to encourage the introduction and promote the cultivation of tropical plants" approved 7th July, 1833; to the committee on public lands.

Mr. Mallory, of Va. obtained consent to move the following resolution; which was read and adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to furnish a statement with a comparative view of the average cost of the army proper, for each individual, including the aggregate of the officers, professors of the military academy, cadets and enlisted men in the service of the United States, for the years 1837, 1838, 1839 and 1840; for subsistence to soldiers, clothing, quartermaster's and medical stores, and other articles embraced under the general heading of supplies for the army, not fixed by law; adopting as the basis of the report a comparison to the house of representatives from the secretary of war of March 5, 1832.

Mr. Reynolds asked leave to submit a motion to change the hour for the daily meeting of the house to eleven o'clock in the forenoon.

Objection was made; when Mr. Reynolds moved to suspend the rules, but the motion did not prevail.

The house, in further execution of the special order, resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, on the bill to authorize the issue of an additional amount of five millions of treasury notes. Mr. Adams was called to the chair.

Mr. Adams asked to be excused from taking the chair of the committee, because he expected to be under the necessity of leaving the hall in the course of the afternoon.

Mr. Casey was then called to preside in the chair of the committee.

Mr. Barnard resumed his argument from yesterday, and continued to address the committee until half past twelve.

Mr. B. closed his remarks by modifying his motion of yesterday so as to strike out the enacting clause of the bill—giving notice that, if the motion prevailed, and a report to that effect should be made to the house, he would then offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole on the state of the union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill in relation to treasury notes, and that the subject of making provision for the wants of the treasury be referred back to the committee of ways and means, with instructions.

First. To bring in a bill authorizing the secretary of the treasury to borrow ten millions of dollars on the credit of the government, and to issue bonds or scrip therefor.

Second. To bring in a bill imposing duties for additional revenue on wines, silks, linens, spices and other articles, being luxury articles, imported from abroad, but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy and spirit of the act of March, 1833, commonly called "the compromise bill."

Mr. Maine, followed at some length, in reply to what had fallen yesterday from Mr. Jones, of Va. who had introduced the subject.

Mr. Bell, having obtained the floor, gave way to motion the committee rise, the answer to the committee rise, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Lincoln obtained leave to introduce the following resolution; which was read and adopted:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to inform this house whether the patents for lands, which have issued from the office of the commissioner of the general land office, since the passing of the act of the 25th April, 1834, entitled "an act for the establishment of a general land office in the department of the treasury," have in all cases, in satisfaction of the terms of the patents, or otherwise, been issued conformably with the requisitions in the 8th section of said act, "in the name of the United States," and been "commonly signed by the commissioner of said office." And that the same arguments have been admitted or departed from, in what particulars, at what time, and under what authority the omission or variance has been committed; that, then, he transmit to the answer of the committee rise, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Clifford asked that the report of the select committee on the differences between the public printer and the clerk of the house be recommended to the same committee by which it was made, for consideration, and that the committee be authorized to hold observed in it. The report was recommended.

Mr. Slanly submitted sundry amendments which he intends, at a proper time, to propose to the bill providing for the issue of five millions of treasury notes, and which, at his request, were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Atherton presented a memorial of John Haven and 181 other citizens of New Hampshire in favor of a general bankrupt system; referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Mr. Hoffman presented a number of petitions of citizens of the city of New York in favor of a general bankrupt law; referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Also, a memorial of the Philanthropic Law Reform association of the city of New York; also referred to the committee on the judiciary.

Also, a memorial of Jacob M. Van Winkle and John Randall for relief on account of goods destroyed by fire in the public stores in New York; referred to the committee on commerce.

And then the house adjourned until to-morrow.

Wednesday, Jan. 20. Several petitions were, by consent, presented and referred to appropriate committees.

Mr. Peck asked leave to introduce a resolution, which he sent, to the clerk's table, where it was read for information, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to report to this house the number of treaties and amended treaties held and on what account, and to whom, the New York Indians, or any other portion of them, since the 1st day of January, 1831, and to which the United States were a party; and that place where such treaties and amended treaties were deposited and executed respectively; and when, and the name of the person or persons representing the United States thereto. And, also, the names of all other persons, if any, who now are, or at any time have been, a party to, or interested in, said treaties or amended treaties, or any of them; together with a detailed account of all expenditures, whether in money or otherwise, connected therewith, specifying, particularly, the several items of such expenditures, and by whom, and to whom, and when the same were made, and on what account, respectively, and whether the Ogden Land company, or any member or agent of said company, have delayed, or at any time agreed to delay, any portion of such expenditures; and, if so, what portion, and to whom, and to whom. And that the secretary of war be also communicate to this house copies of all contracts or agreements between the United States and the United States, or any member thereof, and in any manner connected with, or relating to said treaties, or amended treaties, or any portion thereof, and on what account, and to this house copies of all correspondence between the said secretary or any other officer or agent of the United States, and the said Land company, or any member, attorney, or agent thereof, in relation to said treaties, or amended treaties, or any of them, or in relation to the aforesaid expenditures, or any portion thereof.

Several members objected to the introduction of the resolution. When Mr. Peck moved to suspend the rule; and the question was put and negatived. The house then, in pursuance of the expectation of the special order, resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, on the bill to authorize the issue of an additional amount of five millions of treasury notes, (Mr. Casey in the chair).

Mr. Bell rose and addressed the committee at great length on the subject of the finances, and the condition of the treasury, present and prospective.

Mr. B. having taken his seat—Mr. W. Thompson obtained the floor, and yielded to motion the committee rise, which motion having prevailed—the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

After the house came out of committee of the whole, sundry petitions and papers were presented and referred.

Mr. Bell submitted to the house the following communication from the secretary of war to the committee on Indian affairs:

War Department, Jan. 19, 1841.

Sir: Strong representations having been made to me that a depredation of Seminoles and Creeks from Arkansas might induce their brethren in Florida to lay down their arms, and emigrate to the western territory, and that the Seminoles and Creeks were authorized, on the 29th day of May last, to take and carry with them to Florida, a delegation for the purpose mentioned. The latter, with twelve chosen individuals, has been in Florida for some time, and it is my determination to keep them so long as there is the least probability of success.

There are no means at the disposal of the department to delay the expense incident to this effort at pacification. I have lately been advised that some influential individuals in or near St. Augustine might be usefully employed to the same end, and have to request an appropriation of $15,000 to meet the expenses that will be necessarily incurred. Very respectfully, J. R. FORTSSETT.

Hon. John Bell, chairman of the Indian affairs.

Estimate of funds required to cover expenses attending the mission of major Wm. Armstrong and capt. J. Page to Florida, under instructions from the department.

For expenses of twelve chiefs of the Seminole Indians going to Florida, from the western territory, and returning, $1,500
Expenses while in Florida, 2,500
Pay of six other influential persons for two months, 2,000
Expenses of maj. Armstrong and captain Page while engaged, 2,000
Contingent and incidental expenses, 6,000
$15,000

These papers were referred back to the committee on Indian affairs for the action of that committee thereon.

While the house was in committee of the whole to-day, a message was received from the president, accompanied with a large bundle of documents. It was not read, but was understood to relate to the troubles in China, and is in answer to a call thereupon moved in the house. And the house adjourned till to-morrow.

Thursday, Jan. 21. Mr. Barnard asked leave to call up the resolution submitted by him several days ago upon the subject of the finances and expenditures of the government. It was objected to.

Several gentlemen asked leave to present petitions; when at the suggestion of Mr. Carr, the house, by unanimous consent, agreed to devote one hour to the presentation of petitions.

Petitions were then presented as follows: By Mr. Burke, of Alden Patridge, president of the Norwich university of Vermont, praying that young men educated at military schools other than that at West Point, may be placed on a footing with those educated at West Point in appointments in the army.

Also, another petition of Alden Patridge in favor of a general national system of education. Also, of H. Kellogg, and others of West Stockbridge, Massachusetts, and of G. H. Gibson and others, of Great Barrington, Massachusetts, for a general bankrupt law.

Also, of the Medical society and board of health of Washington, for an inmate asylum.

By Mr. Lincoln, of citizens of Boylston, in Mass. against the admission of Florida as a slave state into the union.

Also, for a repeal of the rule of the house against the reception of abolition memorials.

Also, to recognise the independence of Hayti.

By Mr. Adams, of officers and members of the American Peace society, in favor of a congress of nations, so as to preserve the peace of the world.

Also, of citizens of Andover, Massachusetts, praying congress to prevent the execution of the treaty said to have been recently made with the Seneca Indians of New York, for their emigration to the west.

Mr. Adams also presented a petition of inhabitants of Allegheny county, Penn., containing the following prayers: 1st, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia; 2d, to prohibit the international slave trade; and 3d, against the admission of any state into the union whose constitution tolerates slavery. Mr. Adams moved the referral of this petition to the select committee. The last part of the petition only, the speaker stated, could be received; and, on motion of Mr. Cunnor, that part of the petition was laid on the table.

Mr. Adams also presented a similar petition of citizens of Perinton, N. Y. Mr. Warren moved that so much of it as was received lie on the table.

Some remarks were made on the subject; when Mr. Black moved to the point of the petition laying on the table that part of the petition of citizens of Allegheny county, Pa. which prays that no new state, whose constitution may tolerate slavery, be admitted into the union, for the purpose, as he stated, of leaving that petition to be rejected.

Mr. Adams inquired if Mr. Black voted in the affirmative on the vote he proposed to reconsider. Mr. Black said that there had been no audible vote on the question; that he had not responded ye or no. The speaker said if he did not vote he could not make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. — then made the motion to reconsider. Mr. Warren rose to a question of order, viz: that there was no part of the petition but what came within the exclusion of the rule of the house. Mr. V. then read the several points of the petition, which we have before given.

The speaker said that the rule did not operate upon that part of the petition which prayed that no new state should be admitted into the union whose constitution should tolerate slavery.

After remarks from several gentlemen, the question was then put on the motion to reconsider, and there appeared, ye 103, noes 51.

The speaker then stated that the question again occurred on the motion to lay the part of the petition on the table which had been received; when Mr. Cunnor withdrew that motion.

Mr. Black then moved that the entire petition be rejected.

Mr. Wase objected to this motion, on the ground that no motion could be made as to the entire petition, as the entire petition had not been received; that, under the rule, the chair had already decided against the reception of certain parts of the petition; consequently, that no motion could apply to those parts which were not before the house, and that

Mr. Black ought to confine his motion to reject, to that part of the petition which had been received.

The speaker sustained the position assumed by Mr. Adams, and decided that the motion to reject the entire petition did not lie.

The question then came up upon the motion made by Mr. Adams when he presented the petition, that it be referred to a select committee.

Mr. Adams decided that he would make a question of order; which was, that if the chair decided that, under the rule, any portion of this petition could be received, he would appeal.

Mr. Adams then moved that he be decided that so much of the petition as prays that no new state may be admitted into the union, the constitution of which may tolerate slavery, did not come within the prohibition of the rule, and that, therefore, that part of the petition was received.

Mr. Black. From this I appeal.

The chair settled the question on this appeal, and after some remarks from several gentlemen, the hour set aside, by unanimous consent, for the presentation of petitions, expired, and the orders of the day were called for.

The house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, on the special order of the day, i. e. the bill to authorize the issue of an additional sum of five millions of treasury notes. Mr. Casey, of Illinois, was called to preside over the deliberations of the committee.

Mr. Waddy Thompson, who was entitled to the floor, reported the committee for an hour and three quarters. Mr. T. having concluded, the chairman gave the floor to Mr. Rhett, who had not proceeded far before he gave way to a motion that the committee rise; which prevailed, and the committee rose, reported the committee, and he left to sit again.

And then the house adjourned. Friday, Jan. 22. Mr. Black moved that the rules of the house be suspended during the morning hour for the purpose of disposing of the appeal taken by him yesterday from the decision of the chair in relation to the reception of a petition presented by Mr. Adams. Mr. Briggs asked the yeas and nays, which were not ordered. And the question being taken, the rules were not suspended.

Mr. Adams moved that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the special order, (i. e. the treasury note bill).

Mr. Russell moved that the further consideration of the special order be postponed until Monday, with a view to proceed to the consideration of private business, (this day being set apart by the rules for that purpose).

The speaker said the gentleman could make that motion after the motion of the gentleman from Va. (Mr. Jones), had been disposed of.

Mr. Russell called the yeas and nays on the motion, and the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, which were ordered, and, being taken, were yeas 104, nays 70.

The house then resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and again proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported to the committee of ways and means to authorize the issue of an additional sum of five millions in treasury notes. Mr. Casey, of Illinois, was called to preside over the deliberations of the committee.

Mr. Rhett returned and concluded his remarks commenced yesterday, when the floor was given to Mr. Nibbel, of Georgia, who addressed the committee, in reply to Mr. Rhett, for an hour and a half, and having concluded, Mr. Thompson, of Miss. obtained the floor.

Whereupon, (on motion), the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Mr. Everett asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the secretary of the treasury be directed to lay before this house a statement of the different articles imported which are now subjects to duty at a rate of 20 per cent. ad valorem, the value of such articles, and the sum per cent. and amount of such duties, based on the imports of 1838.

Objection was made. And then the house adjourned.

Saturday, Jan. 23. The journal having been read, Mr. Jones, of Va. moved that the house proceed in the further execution of the special order of the day on the bill to provide for the issue of a further sum of five millions of dollars of treasury notes.

Mr. Jones gave way to Mr. Eugene, who, by direction of the committee of elections, asked leave to report a bill regulating the taking of testimony in cases of contested elections and for other purposes.

Mr. Chapman objected to the introduction of the bill, but subsequently withdrew it. Mr. Afford renewed it. Mr. Pullum moved to suspend the rule to enable him to report the bill. The question to suspend the rules was put and not carried.

Mr. Jones then renewed the motion to proceed to the special order of the day.

Mr. Russell moved that the special order be postponed till Monday, and that the house do proceed to private business. Mr. R. called for the yeas and nays; they were not ordered. Mr. R.'s motion was then directed to the yeas and nays.

The house again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and proceeded to the consideration of the bill reported by Mr. Jones, to amend an act passed on the 20th of June, to authorize the issue of an additional sum of five millions in treasury notes. Mr. Casey, of Illinois, was called to preside over the deliberations of the committee.

Mr. Thompson, of Mississippi, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the committee for the space of two hours, and was followed by Mr. Lane, of Indiana. Mr. L. having concluded, the chairman gave the floor to Mr. Duncan, who yielded for a motion that the committee rise, which prevailing, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Everett asked the house now to take up and consider the resolution, which, he said, had been laid on the order of the day yesterday, and on the secretary of the treasury for information on articles imported which are not subject to duty at a less rate than 20 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. W. called the yeas and nays on the resolution never had been received.

Mr. Everett submitted that it had. Some conversation, arising out of this difference of opinion, ensued, when Mr. Briggs, (who was in the speaker's chair) ordered to be annulled. Mr. Briggs, expressed his understanding to be that the resolution had not been received—objection to its reception having been made.

Whereupon the journal (which stated the fact to be the contrary) was ordered to be annulled.

Mr. Everett then asked that the resolution be received; and objection being made, moved a suspension of the rule, and he asked the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. Wase moved an adjournment.

The yeas and nays were asked and ordered; and, being taken were yeas 41, nays 47. So the house refused to adjourn. But no quorum voted.

Mr. Russell moved that the yeas and nays be taken on the resolution now before the house. I do not wish to put the house to the trouble of having a call at this time. But I will say that if, before this debate is closed, gentlemen on all sides of the house do not and that the resolution is not adopted, called for by this resolution, I shall be much mistaken. And then the house adjourned.

Monday, Jan. 25. Mr. Cushing presented the memorial of Charles T. James, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, requesting the adoption of "Rahab's self-acting safety valve," by law, and praying for the passage of a law requiring the use of steam boilers and machinery on board of steam-boats, proved to be sufficient, and faithful and skilful engineers, uncontrived to be such—by such means as congress may prescribe. While memorial was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the union.

The speaker laid before the house the following communications, which were appropriately referred to the post office department, a statement of the contracts for carrying the mails, &c. during the year 1840.

From the president of the United States, a report with the accompanying papers from the secretary of state in answer to a resolution of the house of the 16th December last.

From the war department, a statement of all the contracts made by that department for the year 1840.

Also, from the same department, a statement of the appropriations for 1840, and the balance remaining in its treasury on the 31st Dec. last.

From the treasury department, a report from the commissioner of the land office on the 19th inst. in answer to a resolution of the house of the 9th inst. being a statement of the quantity of public lands purchased under the several acts of congress.

From the navy department, a statement of the contracts made by the commissioner of the navy during the year 1840.

A message from the president of the U. States, transmitting a report from the director of the mint, exhibiting a statement of that institution during the year 1840, and calling attention particularly to the over-valuation of foreign gold coin.

From the treasury department, relative to the discontinuance of the mint at San Francisco.

From the war department, a statement of the number of clerks in that department

The following Senate bills were than twice read and severally referred to the undersigned committees:

To abolish the port of delivery at Currituck inlet and the office of surveyor of customs at that port. To the committee on commerce.

To extend the charter of the Bank of Alexandria at the city of Alexandria. To the committee on the District of Columbia.

For the settlement of the claims of New Hampshire against the United States. After some conversation, relative to its reference, by Messrs. L. Williams, Jones, of Va. Briggs, Wise, Lincoln, Hunt and Clifford, it was referred to the committee on military affairs.

The bill authorizing the president of the United States to cause certain surveys of the lakes and lake coasts to be made. To the committee on commerce.

The bill to relinquish to the state of Mississippi the two per cent. fund accruing by the act of admission of that state into the union. The committee on public lands.

To make certain appropriations for the patent office. The committee on patents.

The bill regulating commercial intercourse with the port of Cayenne, French Guiana, and to remit certain duties. The committee on foreign affairs.

To authorize the secretary of the treasury to refund certain duties collected on the French ship Alexandre. The committee on foreign affairs.

To authorize the secretary of the treasury to make arrangements of compromise with the sureties of Samuel Swartwout.

The bill relating to the judicial courts of New Hampshire. Which latter were referred to the committee on the judiciary.

The amendment to the bill of the house, "to make appropriations for the lunatics of the District of Columbia," providing that the expense for this purpose shall not exceed in the whole, the sum of $9,000 per annum, was concurred in.

Several members rose with petitions and resolutions, to which objection was made.

Mr. Chapman moved to suspend the rules, for the presentation of petitions; which motion was not taken.

A motion by Mr. Jones, of Va. having precedence, that the house resolve itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union; which was carried; whereupon the house resolved itself into committee, (Mr. Casey in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the treasury note bill, on which Mr. Duncan was entitled to the floor. Mr. D. then rose and spoke at length on the subject, examining the state of the finances of the country. Without concluding, at a quarter of four o'clock, Mr. D. gave way to a motion that the committee rise.

The vote on which being taken, there appeared no quorum of members present. The committee then rose for want of quorum, and on motion, the house adjourned.

Tuesday, Jan. 28. Mr. Tillinghast from the committee of manufactures, obtained leave to report the following bill:

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That so much of the act entitled "an act to alter and amend the several acts imposing duties on imports" approved July 14, 1828, as provides that pins of foreign manufacture may be imported free of duty from and after the 1st day of April, next, be, and the same be hereby repealed; and that, from and after the said day, pins, when imported, be subject to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem.

The bill was twice read, and committed to the committee of the whole house on the state of the union.

Mr. Pope asked leave to present a petition; which was objected to.

Mr. Pope moved to suspend the rules to enable him to present the petition; the question was put and lost.

The house then, again, resolved itself into committee of the whole on the state of the union, and resumed the consideration of the bill reported from the committee of the whole house, for the issue of an additional five millions of dollars in treasury notes. Mr. Carey, of Illinois, was called to preside over the deliberations of the committee.

Mr. Duncan resumed his remarks, and addressed the committee until half past two o'clock.

In concluding his remarks—Mr. D. said that immediately before he had taken the floor this morning his attention had been called to the following statement, published in the "National Intelligencer" of this city:

"Mr. Cushing hoped that, at this stage of the debate, no technical question of order would be raised, because, he said, after the extort to which the remarks of the member from Ohio (Mr. Duncan) had been carried, he (Mr. C.) should feel himself bound to appeal to the courtesy and the honor of 'this house to suffer him to reply.

"Mr. W. C. Johnson submitted to the chair whether it was in order for an individual to charge Gen. Harrison with cowardice who had himself been branded as a coward on this floor?"

Now, (proceeded Mr. D.) I never heard this remark made by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Johnson). It was not addressed to me, nor to the chairman of the committee in such a way as to be heard. And I was astonished when it was put into my hands; and if I had had time for reflection, I should have contradicted it through some other medium. I say I did not hear the remark; and I have no hesitation in declaring that the man who uttered it is guilty of a base falsehood, and is himself a liar. And I call upon the chairman of the committee to say where in such language was used in his hearing.

When called upon by Mr. Duncan, Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, rose and said: I take upon myself to say that I heard no such expression when I was in the chair. I had called the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Duncan) to order for irrelevancy, and he had acquiesced. I then understood that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. W. C. Johnson) as rising to the same point of order, and my reply to him was, that I had already called the gentleman to order, and that he had acquiesced in the decision—But, however, I did not hear the expression referred to.

Mr. Duncan. I protest against the statement that I had ever said any thing against general Harrison except what the history of the country sustains. I never said any thing of the kind. I was a coward, nor any thing like it; and no conclusion can be drawn from any thing I have said other than that he was not entitled to that character of a great military chieftain which was claimed by him and his friends.

Mr. W. C. Johnson. The report in the "National Intelligencer" of the remarks I made yesterday is perfectly correct. I made those remarks, and I intended them to be fully audible in every part of this hall.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, rose and inquired of the chair, "is the gentleman in order?"

Mr. Stanley. He is as much in order as you are. The chairman (Mr. Briggs) pro tem. called to order.

Mr. W. C. Johnson proceeded to say that had been conscious of the disclaimer which the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Duncan) had just made, it would have superseded the necessity of his (Mr. J.) having made any remarks. But as that gentleman denied the fact that such a statement as that reported in the "Intelligencer" had been made by himself, (Mr. J.) he felt it his duty to say that it had been made; and he now held in his hand the evidence of the fact upon which his remark was predicated. The fact was only notorious to all the members of the last congress, but he himself and other gentlemen here present had a perfect recollection that the charge which he (Mr. J.) had yesterday asserted as having been imputed to the gentleman was made upon this floor, not by one, nor by two, but by three several gentlemen. The subject matter had ended there. The gentleman was here upon this floor, and yet, so far as he (Mr. J.) was conscious, he (Mr. D.) had not called upon any one of these gentlemen for satisfaction, nor had any communication been made to them which could have been regarded in that light.

But, as a proof of what he had stated, he would send to the clerk's table, with a view to have it read—a statement.

The chairman said it was not in order.

Mr. Johnson admitted, he said, the irrelevancy of the matter; but he held in his hand the report of a speech made here by a member of congress—a speech of as much weight as any in this house or in the world—in which speech this allegation was made. A reference to this speech would show that he (Mr. J.) had not done the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Duncan) injustice, but that he was borne out in what he said. He had no desire to engage in controversy on this floor, but if he was not to do the gentleman injustice, he would request the clerk to read two sentences of the speech to which he had referred, and which was delivered in this house in 1839.

By the chairman said it was not in order.

Mr. Johnson. It will simply then say that with these facts—

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, submitted to the chair whether the gentleman was in order? If not, he (Mr. C.) would object to his proceeding.

Mr. Stanley. For two days past every subject under heaven has been talked about here, and yet the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Campbell) has never raised his voice in a call to order, nor has any body else.

Mr. Johnson was unwilling, he said, to force himself upon this house contrary to its feelings and its rules. He had been a member of the body too long to make such an attempt. But he felt it due to himself and to the member from Ohio, that the fact on which he (Mr. J.) had predicated his statement of yesterday should be made known. Mr. J. then read from the speech to which he had alluded the following paragraph:

"With these facts before the House, what member will say that such a man as I am a fit associate for gentlemen? Availing himself of the privilege, seeking to destroy the character of his brother members, without the courtesy, or the feelings of honor to prompt him to ask redress for admitted insults can such a man be deemed within the pale of civility?"

That (Mr. J. proceeded to say) was the language used by an honorable member on this floor—language printed and published so long ago as 1839; and it was this fact which induced him (Mr. J.) when he supposed the gentleman from Ohio was charging such a man as Gen. Harrison with want of courage, to ask whether it was courteous, or in accordance with parliamentary rule, that a charge of that nature should be made by a man who had himself been branded as a coward. That charge had been made and repeated over and over against the gentleman from Ohio; and no man who would examine the record could deny it. This was all that he (Mr. J.) had said, and this he had said. The gentleman from Ohio might not consider this an imputation, but it could not be considered as having been done him. He (Mr. J.) spoke only of the fact, and he had read the speech to show the fact; and although he himself obtained from discussions of a personal character as much as possible, yet he had felt it due to himself and to the respect persons whose cause he had advocated, to say as much as he had done when the character of that personage had been assailed.

After one or two further remarks, Mr. Duncan followed in a few remarks, which the reporter could not hear accurately, but which were understood to have reference to a resolution introduced in a previous congress for (Mr. D.'s) expulsion, and to certain insinuations thrown out at the threshold of the discussion that he (Mr. D.) had postponed the publication of certain letters until after the passage of the duelling law; the whole of which, he said, had its origin in a base system of cowardice, by men who had not the courage to stand to their own acts. It was a member of this house who had been introduced—and he had been told that a regular caucus had been held at that time to see what was to be done, in order to get gentlemen out of their predicament.

Mr. Underwood rose to make an explanation, but, being called to order, took his seat.

Mr. Davis, of Ky. then obtained the floor, and addressed the committee in reference to the financial state of the country and its condition generally, and upon several of the incidental topics which had been introduced into the discussion.

Mr. D. having concluded—The chairman gave the floor to Mr. Pope, of Ky. After some little controversy as to the right to the floor. The committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. Crobb, on leave, presented a preamble and resolutions of the legislature of the state of Alabama, against a revival of the protective tariff system; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed. And then the house adjourned.

The following letter, addressed to the reporter of the National Intelligencer was handed in previous to the adjournment of the house:

"Mr. Webster: Had I been permitted to proceed with the explanation I rose to make, I intended to have said that I was a member of this house when the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. Duncan) had difficulties with two gentlemen, then occupying seats on this floor, from Kentucky, to wit: Mr. Southgate and Mr. Menefee; that I met with the former; that I was upon the best terms with both of them; and that I was in full knowledge of any cause which held to adopt resolutions or to recommend any action on the part of congress with a view to relieve either of those gentlemen from any difficulty in which he was involved with the member from Ohio, I never heard any such thing alleged before, and I have no knowledge or belief that the bill against duelling was at all hastened in its passage by any measure or resolve adopted in caucus in consequence of difficulties subsisting between the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Kentucky, or either of them. I thought justice to the absent required this statement at my hands; but, as I was not permitted to make it on the floor, I request you to introduce it in connection with your report of the proceeding."

J. R. UNDERWOOD.

January 26.

CHRONICLE.

THE BANKS in the city of Baltimore have agreed to resume specie payments on the 1st of February next. The close of the rest of the state will no doubt do the same.

U. STATES BANK. Letters by the Columbia confirm the news of the loans negotiated by the agents of the U. States Bank, with various parties, to the extent of all our million and six hundred thousand dollars, or fully six millions of dollars. [See our report.]

The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette of yesterday says: "The case of Hays, the United States land bank, that involved a considerable portion of public attention in Baltimore by an annual increase of the bank, we hear is progressed through the courts, and the bank, we hear is at present, pays the principal and six per cent. interest. As this debt entered into the calculations of the bank on receiving the United States land bank, no difference in the power of the bank, but enlarged means in London giving her ample powers to meet the demand."

CLOSE RUNNING. Three cities in Ohio have nearly the same population. The census of Columbus is 6,018; Dayton, 6,067; and Cleveland, 6,071. The run among the three was close for the rank of the second city in the State.

COAL TRADE OF PENNSYLVANIA. The following is the actual quantity of coal shipped from the different regions in the years 1839 and 1840.

	1839.	1840.
Schuykill,	424,290	422,494
Lehigh,	109,650	102,264
Lackawanna,	122,300	148,170
Beaver meadow,	28,429	42,612
Hazleton,	21,000	21,000
Nazareth,	7,250	29,900
Pittsburg,	20,439	22,860
Shenandoah,	11,693	15,605
	817,629	865,414

Add quantity remaining on hand April 1st,

200,000 150,000

Tons. 1,017,629 1,015,414
The whole amount shipped from the various coal regions in the State between 1839 and 1840, inclusive, is 6,877,172 tons, and now that so many new iron works have been established, and the fact of anthracite being introduced into steamboats, will create a demand for it, which, in a few years, will double the present use.

THE CHALLENGE. We published a challenge from a capt. Glover, for any one to beat his vessel. The rejoined explanation of a correspondent in another column, to the contrary of our readers.

U. S. GAZ.
"Mr. Erskine has taken one of the pocket-ships, nearly 400 tons, of the Havana, and placed on board an engine in the after part of her cabin, and the two shafts of the propellers pass through her bottom under water. By this simple contrivance, Mr. E. calculates upon making his ship equal to the rate of the ship's sailing, under certain circumstances. Should this succeed, and there can scarcely be a doubt of it, at least the enterprising owners have full confidence in it, judging from their challenge, a new era in navigation must take place."

THE REV. A. H. COHEN, the venerable and beloved pastor of the Hebrew congregation at Richmond died suddenly on the 21st inst. The Compiler says: "There could be no more ardent devotee than he, in the cause of the Jews—the amelioration of their political and elevation of their moral condition; and at this period, in a era as it were in their history, his loss is sorely felt by them."

DEATHS. In New York last week 142; in Baltimore 45, of which 23 were under two years of age, 13 were free colored and 3 slaves.

DOMESTIC PRODUCTS AND FOREIGN TRADE. The Louisiana Advertiser estimates the consumption of sugar in the United States at 80,000,000 of highlands per annum, or one hundred and eighty millions of pounds. Taking the cost to the consumer at the average rate of seven cents, we have the sum of $112,600,000 paid yearly by the nation for the use of this valuable and now scarce article.

The sugar lands of Louisiana do not produce annually over 30,000 highlands or eighty one millions of pounds—half of the quantity consumed in the country—every year. This fact is to be accounted for, not from any scarcity of land, but from the fact that the culture of sugar—but from the foreign importation of the article, by means of which the demand for the domestic product is kept up. The sugar lands of Louisiana are not capable of producing double the quantity of sugar now consumed in the United States—that is, 80,000,000 highlands annually—half the land now in use would be held up to culture in order upon the production of the staple. In view of this the planters of Louisiana are calling for the imposition of duties upon foreign sugar.

FAVORABLE NEWS. The New York and Newark, N. J. Express mentions that a vessel plowing the earth was 100 ft. or twenty rods on Monday morning the 28th inst. at two miles north of New York, and was guided by a plowman. The phenomena was noticed on Long Island.

EXPORTS TO CANADA. We learn from the Cleveland, (Ohio), Herald, that the clearances at the port, for that port in the Upper Canada, for the past year, were 866,550 bushels of wheat, and 70,495 bbls. of flour. The quantity of pork shipped during the same time is estimated at 15,000 bbls.

DR. LIVES. The notorious rogue who was lately sentenced for fourteen years to the state prison at Boston Rouge, for negro stealing, broke out and made his escape on the 12th inst. A fellow culprit who escaped with him, is also at large.

The last mail brings news of the recapture of the doctor, after remaining in the swamp two or three days, being used of longer fasting, he came out on a pike, and was taken up, and requested the negroes to take his iron out. The slaves at once took measures for securing him, in which they effectually succeeded, notwithstanding the violent resistance which he offered with a pocket-knife. He has again taken his proper place in the cells of the penitentiary.

HURRICANE. Early in January a most tremendous hurricane fell along the southern coast of Mexico, devastating a tract of country 25 leagues in length and 7 in breadth, so completely that a tsunami was apprehended, unless success speedily reached them. Corn, sugar cane, palm trees, and even vegetables were swept away.

IRON TRADE. The exports of iron and steel, hardware and cutlery, from England in 1839, amounted to 2,441,569, declared value, or about $2,200,000, official value.

LAW DECISION. A case was recently decided in the court of errors of New York, in which was involved the question whether chattle mortgages were valid, where the mortgagee did not take possession of the property, but had been requested to take possession, and the supreme court of the state that such mortgages were in law fraudulent, and against creditors of the mortgagee, void.

The court of errors reversed this decision, and established the doctrine that where the party to whom a mortgage is given produces evidence of good faith and the absence of any fraudulent intent in the transaction, the possession of the property is immaterial, and the question of fraud is a question of fact, and should be submitted for the decision of the jury.

LISERKE has a population of 4,500 American colonists and 20,000 natives. It has nine settlements or towns; the two most distant being 300 miles apart, on the sea coast—the others at various distances, intermediate. The territory procured by purchase, contains nearly 600,000 acres of land, and is well adapted for the raising of the native owners in the same way. The government is modeled after our own, and largely modeled after the French, and is well adapted for the people. Agriculture is thriving and greatly extended. Four printing presses are in operation. Twenty-nine churches are organized, some of them composed of native converts. More than 20 religious managers are engaged in religious teaching. Many Sabbath schools are regularly attended. And, on the whole, the colony never appears better than the actual state of affairs, and is very attractive to its friends on the ground of its great usefulness. [Presbyterian.]

LIABILITY OF TENANTS. Heretofore we have always understood it to be good law that a tenant occupying premises that were destroyed by fire, remained liable for the rent until the expiration of his term; but in the marine court, on Monday, justice Randall charged the jury that by recent decisions this doctrine had been overruled, and that the owner of the tenancy by fire exonerated him from the payment of rent from the date thereof. If this is true law, the people ought to know it. [N. Y. Com. Advertiser.]

THE LEATHER TRADE. The amount of leather on hand in the stores of trading, for the month of January, is $11,695,414. The Journal of Commerce says: "The average yearly sales of the trade of this city, from 1831 to 1840, were about 850,000 additional, and the stock on hand is not therefore equal to the annual consumption of the article. Hides have been scarce for a year or two, and dear, that a large proportion of the owners have not returned to stock their works. For the same reason the stock of leather in the country generally is small."

MISSION TO OREGON. The Missionaries who left this port in Oct. 1839, arrived at the Sandwich Islands on the 20th of the inst., and remained for previous to May 23d last.

The exploring expedition had not arrived at the Sandwich Islands on the 20th of the inst. [N. Y. Com.]

MANUFACTURE SUBSCRIPTION. A subscription in aid of the New York theological seminary was opened on Sunday last, and David Leavitt, esq. of Brooklyn, subscribed $250.

MONEY. Money is said to be very scarce in the city of Philadelphia, and commands one and a half per cent. per month.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION. The election for mayor and city council of Pittsburgh, took place on Tuesday the 12th inst. There were four candidates in the field, Mayor, James Smith, of the Whigs; Marshall, of the Whigs; McElwey—the first three Harrison democrats and Wilson, the last Van Buren. Mr. Thompson, the tegu-larly terminated Harrison candidate, was elected mayor, over Mayor Smith, by a majority of 281. Mr. Harrison's councilmen were elected in every ward, except one in the east ward, who received a vote with an opponent.

Tommy Temple was on the same day elected mayor of the city of Albany. The conclusion chosen for that city are all Harrison democrats.

PUBLIC LANDS. The resolution introduced into the house of delegates of Maryland, by Mr. Gaither, requesting the senators and representatives of this state in congress to vote for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the several states, passed that body. A member of the assembly moved to amend the word "requested" and insert "instructed"—but on a call for the yeas and nays, no yeas, not one, not even the person who made the motion would vote for it, and against his own proposition was noted upon the journal.

RESURRECTION IN PENNSYLVANIA. So far as we have heard, the banks throughout this state have resumed, without any material ruin upon them for specie.

SMALL NOTES. The bill authorizing the banks of the state of Maryland to receive and pay out the notes of the Baltimore and Ohio rail road, for any denomination not under one dollar, has passed both houses, and is now the law.

STEAM. H. M. brig Racer arrived at Halifax on the 7th from Tampa, with $100,000 for the use of the commissary of the army at that place.

ST. JAMES' N. B. In 1831 had a population of about 15,000. It has now 27,000 and promises soon to rank with some of the largest cities in the United States.

STEAM SHIP OF FIRE. The Atlantic Steamship Co.'s, the Philadelphia Inquirer, at two o'clock, A. M. on the 3d inst. was within about 400 miles of Halifax, and was on fire for some minutes. A great commotion prevailed, and the vessel was put for the nearest land, the fire was extinguished, and the boats placed in readiness for the fire. The vessel was then taken up on the alarm behaved with coolness and great self-possession, and was safely sustained by his crew, in half an hour all danger was over.

THE STEAMER CALLEDONIA took from Boston fifty-four passengers for Liverpool—reaching Halifax in two hours, took in 100 passengers, and departed for Europe at 7 P. M. the same day.

THE BRIG TIGRIS. The Philadelphia Ledger says: Capt. Frye and Mr. Barnhart, the mate of the brig Tigris, whose examinations at Boston has been going on for some time, have been put under bonds of $3,000 and $2,000, to answer the charge of being a native of Africa, on the charge, with intent of making him a slave. Judge Davis has granted a writ of habeas corpus, and the Tigris is to be tried by the circuit court which sits in May next. The crew were released. The boy Horse made a statement in the Portuguese language to the court, that he was a native of the interior of Benguela, and passed through various hands into the possession of a merchant named Almeida, and when he alone one day and been seized by a boat crew and carried on board a foreign ship, from which four days after he was transferred to the Tigris. Capt. Frye, it also appeared had made a contradictory statement in respect to the manner in which the boy came on board the boat.

TEARS. The whole number of passengers that arrived at the port of Galveston by sea, from the 17th June to the 31st December, 1840, was 1,032. Of these 26 were children, 39 slaves, and white adults 977—[which 10] were recruits for the army and navy.

SAMUEL WILLIAMS, ESQ. The Philadelphia U. S. Gazette publishes the following anecdote respecting the late Samuel Williams, esq. formerly a distinguished member of the Legislature of New York: "One dark, stormy night, while at sea, Mr. Williams left his berth below with an intention of repairing to the deck of the vessel. He ascended the companion way, closed the entrance to, and entered from the ship's cabin, feeling his way along in utter darkness. The storm was howling, and every rope about him seemed strung to some unseen motion, while the spray of the sea, driven by the wind, was beating against the ship's side. He reached the deck, the darkness on one side seemed to threaten, and the noise of the water to come in more terribly, suddenly upon him, and he was seized and along the breast of the astonished mate. He seized him almost involuntarily, and held them with a convulsive grasp. An awful crash followed, and he was borne overboard. The mate, who was on the ship's side, seized, while the deck which had sustained his feet had sunk beneath him.

A larger vessel had run down his own, and he and his companion were saved by a miracle to tell the story of destruction, for the larger ship went booming on in her course, and not a cry was heard from the sinking ship. It was a recent fact of the shattered bark. All were "In the deep bottom of the ocean buried."

WAYS AND MEANS. Mr. Bowie, from the committee on ways and means, reported on the 21st inst. in the house of representatives, a bill for the relief of the poor, and to the amount of $660,000 in aid of the treasury, and to sustain the credit of the state.

that the Chinese government has gained its point.— That it has referred us to a land of promise, and we have consented to forego the acquisition of a portion of the bond of promise. Some little time ago, we stated, that if we wished to make an impression upon the Chinese government, we must strike at the heart and not the extremities; it would seem that we have made an ineffectual blow at the heart, which having failed, we have been referred very coolly to the extremities, and by so doing we have given the Chinese authorities, be it emperor or mandarin, a basis whereby to erect a "mighty big lie." The empire of China exists on a "mighty big lie," and they will now swear that they, that is the Chinese government, have made us knock under, that is agree to say, that they have forced us to go to Canton to settle preliminary arrangements, and that they were in the position en bello. We have thus lost our opportunity, we shall be obliged to do that which we ought to have done at first, to strike at their heart.

Great sickness prevailed among the troops at Chusan, only 110 men of the 18th regiment, and 220 of the 49th being fit for duty, and this chiefly on account of the bad state of the provisions sent from Calcutta. The island itself, however, is stated to be unhealthy. Capt. Anstruther of the Malrae engineers were unfortunately captured by the Chinese, while sketching within a mile of the town of Chusan, and was taken to Ningpo. The Kite and the Indian Oak are lost, and the officers and crew of the former are in the hands of the Chinese at Ningpo. Opium was in great demand at Chusan, and had advanced to $900 and $1,000 per chest.

From the Canton Press, of Aug. 27.

Fight at the barrier. It will be seen from the circular copied below, addressed by captain Smith to the British military resident there, that his excellency the governor informed him, that the Taisue had left Macao on the 11th of this month, for the sole purpose of laying before the viceroy Lin the strongest demands for the release of Mr. Staunton. On Monday, the 17th, the Taisue returned, but without Mr. Staunton. We are informed that the only answer he gave was that it was impossible that Mr. Staunton could be liberated, he not having been seized on Portuguese territory, and that besides he, the Taisue, was not at all with him a number of soldiers to assist the Portuguese in driving away the English.

It was known before, and as we stated last week, that strong additions had been made to the fortifications at the barrier and to the number of the garrison there, and a great number of soldiers with soldiers were on Tuesday seen to pass through the inner harbor towards the barrier, where also were stationed eight war junks, which before had been anchored off the town of Macao. The Hong company's steamer Escoler left the road here for the Capingoon soon after the return of Taisue was known, and returned on Tuesday, in company with her majesty's ship Druid, and towing the transport Nazareth ship, having the Bengali volunteers on board. From the Taisue's answer, it was evident the Chinese had hostile intentions towards the English residents in Macao; and there seemed but the alternative of quietly awaiting the attack, or to check them by falling upon them first.

On Wednesday morning, the 19th, her majesty's ships Hyacinth and Larne were seen getting under weigh, standing towards Fisherman's bay, and the Bengali volunteers were embarked on board the steamer, whilst we saw nine boats filled with marines and sailors were sent to the fort, in the same direction as the Hyacinth and Larne. The weather was favorable, a light southerly breeze wafting the ships very soon to a favorable position right in front of the barrier and the fortifications there, at a distance of only 600 yards. At about half past one o'clock the Hyacinth began the cannonade, which was answered by the Chinese from their fort, or rather breast work, consisting of pyramids of sand bags, and a succession of about nine yards square, and upon which the 32 pounders made little or no impression.

The Chinese had altogether 21 guns in the embrasures of this fortification, 15 of which were pointed towards the ships, but their fire was very soon silenced by the Hyacinth and Larne, after the guns had been only three fired. The neck of the land on which the barrier is built is just there only about 100 yards wide, and close to the land on the inside were anchored the eight junks already mentioned, of which, from the ships, only the masts could be seen, the hulls being hid, and in a great measure sheltered from shot, by the land. There was besides, on this side of the barrier, and on the territory hitherto considered as subject to Portuguese jurisdiction, a joss-house, or temple, where there were several cannon, from which a brisk fire was kept up upon the ships, and it was observed that these guns carried further than those from the junks, many of whose shot fell short of the ships.

Through several balls passed over the ships, they received no injury in their hulls, but a few balls passed through the awning and sails of the Hyacinth. After the engagement had begun, the garrison at the joss-house was reinforced by about 200 Chinese soldiers, who marched to it from the town of Chusan, and landed a considerable quantity of ammunition filled with the soldiers just behind the barrier, and sheltered by a sand hill, and it is supposed that there must have been altogether about 200 Chinese soldiers in the yard, of whom a considerable portion were armed with muskets. The distance from the barrier to Macao being scarcely two miles, the whole of the engagement was witnessed from the town, and numerous spectators, crowded the adjacent heights.

From half past one until half past three, the ships kept up a heavy fire upon the fort and the junks behind, which was latterly and only faintly answered from the junks, but with more spirit from the joss house, often interrupted in their course by the shot passing over them or plunging into the ground near them, when they would cower down, or creep along on all fours. Twice we saw them fire, and on a wound was done.

At about half past two the British troops began to be landed on the beach at some distance from, and on the Chinese side of the fort. Some Chinese soldiers, favored by the rising ground, crept up and fired upon the parties landed, but a fire-piece was brought on shore, and planted on the height, and a sharp fire kept up from it upon the Chinese encampment below, upon the junks, and latterly also upon the British subjects in Macao. Orders from captain Smith, had, however, been issued, as being considered on neutral ground; but when the firing from it continued, all pretence to neutrality of course ceased, and a great number of our men were seen flying out of it, and from some of the boats, through which a few balls were sent, and running back to Macao.

A little after 4, all the troops being landed 250 Europeans, 120 marines and 80 seamen, commanded by captain May, and the British volunteers, marched upon the fort, which they were met by a fire, when already in the fort, was opened upon them from the junks and the joss house, which was soon silenced by the musketry of the volunteers.— The Chinese soldiers on board the junks tried to save themselves by leaping into the water, but a fire, if it is supposed, were killed. Two of the galleys in the fort, (they were very large and heavy, in bulk equal to 32 pounder cannonades, though bored for 10 pounder shot) were disabled, and carried off to some other place, and the other broken to pieces by a shot.

All the guns were spiked, and every thing else in the fort destroyed and burned. A powder magazine blew up, and two men, who were very young, were severely hurt by the explosion. The Chinese encampment was next burnt, and, in fact, every thing found on that side of the fort destroyed, by the exception of the junks, which escaped being burnt from their being too boats available to get at them. Many of them were, however, so injured by shot, that they will probably never float again. The joss house, from which the liveliest fire had been directed, except destruction, as being on neutral ground, very much to the disappointment of the assailants, who could only by the strictest orders be restrained from attacking it sword in hand. Indeed, during this affair, Smith seemed to have been anxious not to violate the neutrality of the degree the neutrality of the territory. Although the Chinese had no such scruples; for not only was the joss-house on this side of the barrier, and, therefore, on Portuguese ground, but the great part of the soldiers that occupied it marched to it from the town of Macao itself.

The barbarous of captain Smith in not attacking the enemy on neutral ground arose, no doubt, from a consideration of the very peculiar position in which Macao is placed with regard to the Chinese, and we hope that his conduct will not be imputed by the Chinese, who have in no reason whatever for complaining of the Portuguese in this active hostility; their soldiers, although engaged in active hostility, were spared because they were on neutral ground.

The English had four men badly and slightly wounded, a marine had his arm shattered by a ball, and another sustained a laceration of the limb; another was shot in the body, and, as we have already said, was badly injured by the explosion of the powder magazine. The loss of the Chinese cannot be known with any degree of certainty. Those killed, or in our hands, and also it is only four killed, but other statements at about 50 or 60 killed, and double that number wounded, are probably more correct. One shot was seen to strike a tanka boat plying between the junks, and pulled by two men, the boat was diverted to pieces, and nothing was seen of the poor wretches, who, it is possible, however, may have escaped, they being all expert swimmers.

We hear that the Chinese soldiers ascribe their defeat to the cowardice of their officers, who, they were, the first to run away, and that they were therefore obliged to follow their example. What the result of this affair may be it is difficult to foresee, but we hope that, having received this severe lesson, the Chinese will be very cautious in troubling Macao. The Chinese population has been very quiet ever since the exception of many families removing. The Taisue it was rumored had disappeared since the fight, but we learn he is now at Cosabura. The Keemsoon fow and Tso tang have also left Macao.

The following letter was circulated on Monday last:

"Macao, August 17, 1840.

"SIR: As the British consular residing in Macao must be deeply interested in the fate of Mr. Staunton, lately seized by the Chinese, I have now to request you will be pleased to make known to them, that assurances have been received from the government of Macao, by the British minister, the Taisue Yieh left Macao, at 7 P. M. on the 11th instant, for the sole purpose of laying before the viceroy, Lin, the strongest demands for the release of the undersigned British subject, and H. E. has been kind enough to state that he had arrived at the earliest period the result of this officer's mission. I have, &c. (Signed)

"M. SMITH, commanding blockading squadron. The following letter was circulated on Monday, Dec. 1. Our Calcutta papers of the 16th November have arrived, and in a great measure confirm the news we gave from Chusan. The emperor has received admiral Blyth's distinction, and agreed to a treaty to be negotiated at Canton. £3,000,000 is to be paid before Chusan is evacuated. In the meantime a letter has been received at Malacca, which states that our ships had forced the passage of the straits, captured the forts, and proceeded on to Canton.

Raising of the blockade of the coast of Syria. The following copy of a letter, addressed by Her Britannicity's consul general at Constantinople to the British consul at Smyrna, was transmitted to Lloyd's by their agent at that place.

"Constantinople, Dec. 7, 1840.

"GENTLEMEN: I have been requested by his excellency the undersigned to inform you that he has received from his excellency the Ottoman minister for foreign affairs an official notification, stating that, in consequence of the definitive occupation of the coast of Syria by the troops of his imperial majesty the sultan, the British ports have ordered the blockade of the forts and archipelago of that coast to be raised. I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

(Signed) "JOHN CARTWRIGHT, consul general. To the British merchants."

SOUTH AMERICA.

Letter from the river Plata. The bark R. H. Douglas, at this port from Rio de Janeiro, brings copies of letters received there from Montevideo, from which we make the following extracts. The commercial advisers from Rio, received by the R. H. Douglas, are three days later than our previous accounts, and represent the markets to be without any change worth noting.

Montevideo, 11th, 1840. Since our last, the convention agreed to between the Buenos Ayran government and the French, has been duly ratified by the house of representatives of Buenos Ayres, and the port of Buenos Ayres has been declared open. Upwards of one hundred and six vessels immediately proceeded up. Our data from there are to the 28th inst. at which time shippers declined chartering vessels as no launches could be procured. This difficulty, however, will soon be obviated. Few estimates were making there, and some time will elapse before business again gets settled. Confidence restored, of which there is but little prospect until either the federal or unitarian party shall be put down.

In reply to your inquiry we beg to state, that no wheat has been sown in this province in consequence of heavy rains at sowing time. The consumption in this city has been from 3,000 to 3,500 barrels per month, and the price has been from 10 to 12 pesos. Emigration has also served to increase it. The probable consumption after the French leave, may be set down at 2,000 barrels per month. The stock of wheat at Buenos Ayres, is also small, and flour will be wanted there by and by.

late from the Pacific. By the arrival of the Coquette, in 69 days from Islay, in Peru, near Callao, we learn that the Bolivian congress had declared all the acts of the administration of gen. Santa Cruz valid, and ordered his property to be restored. It was the general opinion, both in and out of congress, that a revolution would shortly take place in favor of Santa Cruz.

The Peruvian government had informed the Bolivian agent in Lima, colonel Agredo—(authorised agreeably to the treaty of April 19, 1840, to inspect the reduction of the Peruvian army)—that they did not consider themselves obliged by, and should not fulfil, the treaty as regarded military matters; alleging, that the Bolivian congress had not approved some of the articles of the treaty; and they also notified the inspector to suspend any measures that he might be about to take, as inspector, in virtue of the treaty. Several notes had passed between the Bolivian commissioner and the minister of foreign affairs.

Private letters say that the Peruvian army had been concentrated to the interior, and, instead of being directed, agreeably to the treaty with Bolivia, is being augmented—that the government continued as unpopular as ever, and that they anticipated themselves in power only by their tyranny, that they must at last (pretend the non-approval of some articles of the treaty, on the part of Bolivia, (when in fact the treaty was entirely approved) for keeping up a large army; and the people to express their opinion, as they loom from the experience of others, what the consequences would be.

General Pallares, the Ecuadorian charge d'affaires near the Bolivian government, had sailed for Guayaquil.

The Comercio de Lima says that a Peruvian officer had been arrested in Bolivia, by a party of soldiers, but that he was released as soon as presented to their chief, who told him it was a mistake, that he had orders from his government to arrest general Pallares, who having conspired against the government, had fled.

A consultation of the Peruvian government was pointing in a body called council of state, regarding the claiming, as Peruvian citizens, any foreigner who had or might marry a Peruvian lady, although he might not choose to become a Peruvian citizen.

Destructive tornado—300 houses destroyed. A tornado was experienced on the Pacific coast of Mexico early in November, which is represented to have been nearly as violent as that which visited Natchez, and which has been heretofore extensive. They had already learned of its ravages for a length of 70 or 80 miles, by 12 to 15 miles in width, prostrating almost every thing to its course. At Acapulco, more than 300 houses are said to have been blown down; and at Cayula the number destroyed is stated at 350. Consternation and distress were universal among the surviving inhabitants.

MAYANA.

Savings bank. The institution promises to realize the brightest anticipations of its projectors. According to the statement just published in the Diario, for the month of November alone, $21,250 50 have been deposited, without bearing interest—withdrawals, $3,387 62½. Remaining in the bank $12,847 87½. Deposited to bear interest, $13,925 50—withdrawals, $414 50. Remaining in the bank, $13,515. Total deposited, $26,361 57½. Of the depositors 32 were whites, 13 of whom were for the first time.

TEXAS.

Advices from Galveston to the 16th ult. has been received at New Orleans.

The idea of war with Mexico has pretty nearly died away. It is now ascertained there are no Mexicans approaching the frontier, and the policy of the English treaty with the provision for the mediation, assures to Texas for a time to come, a truce from Mexican aggression.

M. Harrison, the French minister, has made a proposition to the Texas congress, to establish a line of French settlers along the projected railway road, to form a living barrier between the interior settlements and the hostile Indians.

It is proposed in the newspapers to increase the duty on imported goods from 15 to 30 per cent, at valorem. This, it is stated, would be about equal to 15 per cent. in par funds.

The editor of the Galveston Times, in his paper of the 16th ult. has published for the small quantity of editorial matter, giving as an excuse, that the judges of the district court had sent him to prison for a contempt, for publishing an article on the 24th of the previous month.

Despatches for Mexico, taken to Texas by Mr. Iken, have been conveyed by the Texas ship of war San Bernard to Campeachy, thence to be transmitted to Mexico. This route, it is stated, was intimated by general Hamilton in London.

No less than six vessels, it is stated in the Texas papers, were loading, at the last advices, in Liverpool and London for Texas ports. It is feared the market may be overstocked with British goods.

NATIONAL AFFAIRS.

GEN. HARRISON'S DEPARTURE FOR THE EAST. Yesterday at about 12 o'clock, general Harrison took his departure from our city, for his own sake. At an early hour, crowds of citizens congregated in front of the Hemis House, anxious to see him for the last time previous to his entering upon his important duties of the presidency. The numerous assemblage was not composed entirely of his political friends. Many who opposed his election were there, seeming to have forgotten their opposition, and were anxious to feel that they were permitted to pay their respects to him who had been selected by the free and unbiassed suffrages of his fellow citizens to discharge the duties of the most important office in the world.

It was the general's original intention to have sailed for Europe. This course was approved by many, but the great mass felt an anxiety to embrace this opportunity of manifesting their love and respect for him, who had spent his life amongst them, and who had been called to direct the destinies of a free people. It would have been an affliction of justice, if the general had attempted to do so quietly, and without letting the time of his departure be known. He was leaving the acquaintances and friends of his youth and manhood—those for whose welfare he had spent many a sleepless night, and weary day—those for whom he had often periled his fortune—his life—his all—those who loved him as a father—those who had stood by him and defended his character from the unenviable and unjust imputations of destruction. We say, we should have had a right to complain, if he had not avowed this opportunity of taking leave of our benefactor and personal friend.

Several of our splendid military companies, without any previous understanding, were on the ground to escort the gallant old chief from his quarters to the steamboat Ben Franklin, which conveys him to Pittsburgh.

The day was cloudy and the streets muddy—a carriage had been provided to convey him to the river, but he preferred walking. He was escorted by the Greys, and Washington cadets, and an immense crowd of citizens. The forcibles were on board the boat, and the Citizens' guards came down a short time after he reached the boat to fire a parting salute.

The crowd upon the wharf was immense; from twelve to fifteen thousand had assembled to take leave of their friend and benefactor, and to the nation's president. The scene was touching and sublime. The martial music, the military display, the cannon roar, the glittering steel, the vast multitude, the mingling of those who had recently been engaged in fierce political strife to get the last look at him, who was the nation's hope—was a scene which no one could witness unmoved. We never saw the general so deeply affected, than when from the deck of the boat, to a short distance he took leave of the assembled thousands. He spoke of the diffidence of his feelings then, from the time when he had landed at that spot in his youth, as a humble captain in the army of his country. He briefly contrasted the course of the country then, when all around was a dense and dark forest except were occasionally the humble log cabin varied the scene. The panther's scream and the fierce yell of the savage were the only sounds that broke upon the stillness of the night. The hardy pioneer who at that day, had but far penetrated the wilds of the west, was exposed to dangers of every kind in establishing a home and procuring subsistence for his family. He spoke in brief of the condition of this rich valley now of the highly cultivated fields—the beautiful cities that had sprung up as if by magic—of the security, peace and plenty—that every where prevailed—of the noble steamboats, which in short a few years had taken the place of the rude canoes of the pioneer—of the almost incredible speed with which they walked to our doors the comforts and luxuries of every clime.

When he spoke of the part he had borne in all these changing scenes, of the interest he had always felt in the loved west—of the slanders that had been heaped upon him, and of the proud indignation by his countrymen from all these charges by the secret friends of the traitors and traitors of men, there was no heart in all that crowd unmoved.

When he spoke of the vast responsibilities of his station—of the importance of the duties that awaited him—of the anxiety he felt to discharge them aright—no one doubted the justice of his judgment, could for a moment doubt, that honesty of purpose and the nation's weal would be his compass and his polar star.

He asked that his opponents would cease their railing against him, and that they would judge him by his acts—and if then they found him varying from the course he had promised to pursue—if they found him deviating from the high road of genuine democracy, he felt that he would smelt their condemnation and rebuke.

His address was brief, and we heard him but indistinctly, and therefore cannot pretend to give any thing but a brief outline of his remarks.

The boat left the wharf about 12 o'clock. She was crowded with citizens of all places and Louisville, some who will accompany him to Pittsburgh—Some half a dozen of his intimate friends will accompany him throughout his journey.

So pressing have been the invitations he has received, and so great the anxiety to see him, that his route to see him, that we think it probable he will reach Washington much before the 11th or 12th of February. [Cincinnati Rep. of Jan. 27.]

At 11 o'clock, general Harrison arrived in this city yesterday afternoon, at about half past six o'clock. During the whole day our wharf was crowded with persons anxiously awaiting his arrival, and at about two o'clock the boat on which he came was discovered to be in sight five or six miles down the river, and the many guns of the discharge of cannon, and in about half an hour the alighting steamer Ben Franklin rounded the point, and came into port in gallant style. Four or five pieces of artillery on shore were fired without intermission, and the cannon on board the boat responded. The bells of the city were rung, and almost every whig house displayed a flag.

By the time the boat arrived at the wharf the concourse of people was tremendous, and three heavy cheers were given at the sight of the great old Virginia soil. Gen. Harrison was waited on by the committee of reception, and escorted in an open carriage to the United States hotel, where a cordial welcome and the hospitalities of the city were tendered to him by S. Spilgee, esq. in a neat and approprivate address. The general responded in a forcible and happy manner.

During the afternoon he received the congratulations of thousands of our fellow citizens from every point for miles around, and in the evening he was escorted to the residence of Mr. E. Dorsey, where a splendid entertainment was provided, and here he was waited upon by hundreds more, including our fair country women. General Harrison left for Iron's hotel, at a late hour last night.

[Whelan Gaz.]

At Pittsburg: The Pittsburg Advocate of Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock, in the "Ben Franklin," and was received with the greatest enthusiasm. He will address the people at eleven o'clock to-day in front of Iron's hotel, Wood street.

THE SENATE TREATY. The meeting called in Buffalo in relation to this treaty, was held at the court house, on Saturday evening. Several Indiana spoke pro and con on the subject, in the vernacular of the tribe, the sentiments being given in English through an interpreter. Speeches were also made by H. W. Rogers in favor of the fairness of the treaty and by Dr. C. C. Handcock against it. Resolutions affirming the foundational nature of the treaty were passed by a strong majority. The Buffalo Republican, in concluding its remarks on the doings of the meeting, says:

"It is but fair to tell our readers, that from all we have seen and heard of this treaty, it is not a deliberate opinion, that there is now and always has been a majority both of the chiefs and warriors of the nation opposed to it, and that fool and disgraceful means have been used to procure a semblance majority of the chiefs to sign it. This being our opinion, we would consider ourselves derelict in duty not to express it, and we shall give our reasons for our opinion, as in our privilege, and as we are willing should be done on both sides."

THE WESTERN BANKS CONVENTION. The last Louisville Journal says: Nearly twenty banks were represented in the late bank convention in this city—the banks of Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and Tennessee. The usual resolution, moved by Mr. Guthrie, was adopted:

Resolved, That the communications from the banks of Tennessee, New Orleans and Illinois, be referred to a committee consisting of Messrs. Telford, Harris, Bowles, Groesbeck, Wright, Fitch, Linn and Breck, with authority to make report of such measures as in their opinion it is proper for this convention to adopt in relation to the resumption of specie payments, and the future action of the banks in the west and south.

The said committee immediately retired; and, after a short time, returned and made a report, which was read and adopted, in the following words:

The committee to whom was referred the communications from the banks of Tennessee, New Orleans and Illinois, with authority to report proper measures to adopt, in relation to the resumption of specie payments and the future action of the banks in the west and south, have had the subject under consideration, and report it as their opinion that the banks of Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky, ought not at this time to resume specie payments without further concert with other banks in the west, and some of the principal banks in New Orleans. The committee are of opinion that an early resumption is slight demanded by the best interests of the banks and of the community; and, therefore, that the banks represented in this convention should so shape their business as to be able to resume at the earliest opportunity, and that it be recommended to the other banks in the west and south to shape their course for an early resumption.

They are of opinion that the banks can avail themselves of the proceeds of the last year's crop, and place themselves in a position to resume specie payments at an early day; and, if most of the other banks in the west and south can be brought to act in concert, that resumption may take place without prejudice to the banks or the community.

They think a committee should be appointed by this convention to correspond with the banks in the west and south, and endeavor to induce them all to act in concert and place themselves in a condition to resume specie payments at the earliest possible day, and that said committee have power to call a convention of the banks of Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, Illinois, Louisiana, Alabama, &c., whenever they may think it expedient, to propose to meet at Louisville, for the purpose of agreeing on a day for the resumption of specie payments.

COMPLETE CENSUS OF THE UNITED STATES FOR 1840. We have the pleasure of presenting our readers with the complete aggregate results of the census for 1840—and we believe we are the first to give it entire. The secretary of state furnished all the returns he had to the house of representatives. By the politeness of Mr. Cist, we are furnished with these. They lack, however, three states and several counties, of which we have the states and part of the defective returns, from local papers. We shall first give the totals with the ratio of increase for each, and hereafter furnish some comparative tables.

The census now taken is the sixth since the adoption of the constitution, and shows conclusively that the population of the United States moves on with the same uniform law of progression, without reference to emigration, disease or any other cause. This law is an increase of one-third of the existing population for each period of ten years.

REPRESENTATION OF THE STATES IN CONGRESS.—The result of the new census of the United States will soon be known, and it will devolve upon the present or next congress to fix the ratio of the apportionment of representatives from the various states to the lower house of congress, for the next ten years. The following table, prepared for the New York Express by Mr. E. Williams, will therefore be found interesting, as they show the progress of political power, the increase of representation from some of the states, and the decline of relative strength in others. The census of 1840 will show a great increase of relative strength in the western states; while the two great middle states of New York and Pennsylvania, and the two eastern states of Massachusetts and Maine, have held their own by an increase of population equal to the average of the whole United States. This will not probably prove to be the case with most of the southern states.

In 1793, the representation from the thirteen states was fixed by the constitution, as the table below, annexed to 65 members. There have since been five enumerations of the inhabitants, exclusive of the last for 1840, under which the ratio has been fixed by acts of congress as follows:

Center.	Pop. of state.	Rep.
1790	2,932,835	84,614 one in 34,600
1800	5,245,515	4,830,112 " 33,000
1810	7,036,568	6,584,239 " 35,000
1820	9,635,181	8,969,514 " 40,000
1830	12,167,668	11,928,721 " 47,700

Unrepresented fractions.
1790	169,914
1800	235,112
1810	249,268
1820	449,814
1830	475,478

The federal number is found by adding three fifths of the number of slaves to the number of free persons.

"One county and part of another in Pennsylvania were wanting, for which, however, we have added their proportions."

"Some small counties are wanting in Georgia, but their proportions contain but few inhabitants."
The western district of Louisiana is omitted. This, with Florida, also omitted, will make up about 150,000 to be added to the sum total.

The above shows how difficult it has been to fix a high number for a ratio, and by how slow a progress the numbers have been raised.

The following table shows the apportionment under the constitution, and by acts of congress, at five subsequent periods:

EXTRA SESSION.—"The Spy in Washington" alluding to the fact that the nation was in debt almost twenty millions of dollars, says:

"I have just an informal meeting of the whig senators was held last evening. All in the city, whose health permitted, were present. The situation of the treasury, and the demands upon it, will be the means provided to meet those demands, were duly considered. The result of their deliberations was that without an extra session, the government would be disgraced. This, I understand was the very general impression of those in attendance.

SIR JOHN HARVEY AND THE BOUNDARY. The provincial legislature of New Brunswick met at Fredericton on the 25th ult. and here, sir John Harvey delivered a speech. He concludes his speech by alluding, in the following terms, to the subject of the boundary line:

"I regret that I have not in my power as yet to communicate to you any definite arrangement of the boundary line. Experte explorations have been made on either side, preparatory to the final settlement of this important question, and I see no reason to apprehend that the result can be otherwise than favorable to British interests, as well as to the continuance of that good understanding with the neighboring states, which it is the true interest, and, I am convinced, the sincere desire of both nations cordially to promote."

CLAIMS UNDER THE OLD FRENCH TREATY. Once more to observe, the petitioners to congress for the allowance of claims which are to be due under the old convention with France have made their appeal to the justice of congress and the honor of the nation for the examination and adjustment of these claims. For more than thirty years these claimants have been petitioning to congress for the allowance of indemnity solemnly guaranteed to them by the faith of the United States in a treaty concluded with the government of France, and they have been petitioners in vain. We have seen our countrymen the verge of a war with that same power because of her delay of a single year in paying a stipulated amount for claims of our merchants of later origin, whilst the government of the U. States had been delinquent to its own citizens in regard to precisely similar claims (of which it assumed the payment) for nearly forty years! France redeemed her faith, and paid the debt admitted to be due to the citizens of the United States. The government of the U. States, even after this example, persists in its disregard of its solemn obligation to its own citizens, for which the government received value now more than forty years ago.

The government took the property of these claimants at its own valuation, and applied it to its own use, and, in the face and eyes of the constitution, has refused them compensation for it.

*Date of admission into the union.

The claims of these petitioners were good and valid against France. She acknowledged them, in effect, to be well founded; and our government relinquished them to France upon condition that France would discharge the United States from the burdensome stipulations in the treaty of alliance, entered into in 1778. As we all know, France has, since that relinquishment, made indefinitely for other claims. When the former claims were twenty years ago, to distribute the relief received from France, these petitioners applied, among others, for indemnity out of that fund. But they were told, and properly told, that they could receive nothing, as their claims had been for, and solemnly relinquished and surrendered to France by our own government, by the treaty of 1800. Other claimants, therefore, divided the whole fund among themselves, and these claimants got nothing.

From other governments we have insisted on and obtained indemnity; but where we owe it ourselves, we do not pay it. He whose claim was suffered to remain against France has got his pay; but he whose claim was on his own government has yet received nothing. Is this just? Is it honorable? Is it consistent with our professions of regard for the faith of treaties? Is it not, on the contrary, a stain on the national escutcheon, which no time should be lost in effacing?

We do not know that we are acquainted with a single individual interested in these claims. The subject is one upon which we have no feeling, but that of a sense of what is due to the national character. But, without any personal knowledge of any of the claimants, we cannot but feel a sympathy also for them. Many of the original claimants are now no more, and their widows and orphans it is who throng the doors of congress, and supplicate those of the Legislature. Claimants who yet survive have grown old in waiting for what is their own by right.

We will conclude these few observations with the following passage from a letter from one of these young claimants, a respectable man, a native of the island of Nantucket, and a member of the Society of Friends, which has just now accidentally fallen into our hands.

"I am now," says he, "in my eightieth year, I was one of the original owners of a valuable whale ship, laden with oil, (captured before 1800 by the French), which was taken from me, for valuable national purposes, by my own government. For more than forty years I have been soliciting that government to perform a simple and honest act of justice, but hitherto have solicited in vain. In the course of nature, after a few more years of delay, the justice of government will come too late for me."

This simple appeal, it seems to us, ought to make it way to every heart.

AMERICAN IRON. A writer in the National Gazette estimates the present consumption of iron in this country at three hundred thousand tons, and the average annual expenditure of each member of the community thereof, at two dollars sixty-five cents. The present selling price of bar iron is about one hundred dollars per ton, and it is asserted that it can be produced in the anthracite coal region for less than forty dollars, or much less than the amount of expenses and duty upon that which is imported. It supposes that the reduction of prices would enable us to purchase the new works that become capable of supplying the demand, and to increase greatly the amount per head, because of the substitution of iron for numerous purposes for which wood is now used, and because of the great facility of supplying demands of every description that may arise, and that the average annual expenditure of each person shall continue the same; and that the reduction in the price shall be only twenty-five per cent. he estimates that they will be required to supply not less than 550,000 tons to supply the demand of a population which then amount to from twenty-three to twenty-five millions.

The quantity required for that of 1850 then amounts to about thirty millions, or will be nearly a million of tons of iron ore, and six millions of tons of coal for its conversion into the various forms in which it is to be used, from the water pipe and stove to the pen knife. The production of Great Britain has risen in twenty years from 1,000,000 tons to a million and a half, and it is difficult to see any reason why that of the United States may not increase as rapidly. If these calculations be verified by time, those who have invested their means in the iron lands of Pennsylvania, and the iron companies leading thereto, will have little cause to regret it. In England acres of coal land sell for hundreds of pounds and we see little reason to doubt that such will be the case here, as our population will speedily equal that of Great Britain and Ireland, and will double itself again in little more than twenty years, and with every increase in the number of the population there must be an increase in the value of the land which yields the commodity that is to be consumed.

Anthracite iron is appropriately termed in the Philadelphia Commercial list the second staple of Pennsylvania, the first being coal. That paper remarks that although not one year has elapsed since it was brought into use, it has already increased with a rapidity that may fairly be taken as the harbinger of what it is destined to become in a few years.—Within the brief period of nine months the furnaces here constructed and are now in blast, three furnaces, making iron of the first quality, with no other fuel than anthracite coal. They have been in blast from three to five months, and turned out each from 40 to 60 tons of pig iron weekly. During this time many experiments have been made, in nearly all of which it has been satisfactorily ascertained that they can be managed and kept in order as easily, as the furnaces using charcoal or coke. Two more furnaces are erected, which are to be put in blast this month. Sixteen more furnaces are already erected, or are now in progress, all of which will use anthracite coal. Four large rolling mills with puddling furnaces are erected, one of which will commence operation, and the other will soon commence manufacturing with coal as fuel. Two additional mills are to be put up this winter and next spring.

The above twenty-one furnaces and six rolling mills will be puddling furnaces, and will use anthracite coal as fuel. Thirteen of the furnaces and five of the mills, are located on the line of the Lehigh and Morris canal, and will create a tonnage including ore, coal, limestone and pig iron 227,500 tons, of which amount by the candidate himself, his partner, guardian or any of his friends. No preference will be given to applications on account of priority, nor will any applications be entered in the register, where the candidate is under or above the prescribed age, nor will any application be considered in cases where the age and other qualifications of the candidate are not stated. The fixed abode of the candidate must be set forth in the application.

Applications, if not renewed annually, will not be considered. This general may be considered a letter addressed to the secretary of war, merely stating the fact of such renewal. In the month of February or March annually, the appointments are made from among the applicants whose names are on the register, care being taken to distribute them as nearly as circumstances will permit, so as to give one call to each congressional district, except in the states of Delaware, Arkansas and Michigan, which, in consideration of the large unrepresented fraction in the first, and the growing population in the others, will be allowed two candidates each. As a general remark, it may be observed, that no certain information can be given as to the order in which the candidates before the arrival of the period for making the selections, as the number of vacancies, and other circumstances proper to be taken into view, cannot be anticipated. Persons, therefore, making application must not expect to receive information on this point.

At a general rule, no person can be appointed who has had a brother educated at the institution. All applications are regularly registered, to be considered in the order of their arrival. Qualifications. Candidates must be over sixteen and under twenty-one years of age at the time of entrance into the military academy; must be at least five feet in height, and free from any deformity of the body, or any other physical defect that would render them unfit for the military service, and from any disorder of an infectious or immoral character.—They must be able to read and write well, and perform, with facility and accuracy, the various operations of the ground rules of arithmetic, the reduction of simple and compound proportion, and of vulgar and decimal fractions.

J. R. POINSETT, secretary of war.
War Department, Jan. 21, 1840.

We enclose the National Intelligencer of the 23d ult. the following letter from Mr. Wise, of Va. to his constituents. The consideration which he names as those which will influence him in making the nomination referred to, are worthy of his character, and such as will be acknowledged to be just and patriotic.

To my constituents. You are notified by the subjoined letter from the War Department, that you will be entitled to the appointment of a cadet to the military academy, when the selections shall be made in February or March next. You are also advised of the regulations relative to the admission and qualification of candidates, and you will see that I am requested to nominate an individual to fill the vacancy, and that no names of applicants from my district have been entered or renewed the present year. Now, in order to enable me to make this nomination impartially, and respectfully request that you, who you desire the appointment, to transmit to me the names of applicants, at the same time that letters are addressed to the secretary of war, in conformity with the regulations. The applications had better be made immediately, but I will postpone the nomination to the latest day in February or March allowed by the department. In making the nomination, I shall be governed, next to the intellectual and moral character of the applicant, by his condition and connection in life. All else equal, I shall nominate the penniless and friendless youth, especially if he be fatherless, or if his father have rendered signal services, or made great sacrifices for the country. No moment will be lost in making it the duty of my mind, shall a thought of the politics or party of his friends be made a consideration. Proud that more from my district have been important for this appointment heretofore, I invite all who desire or are in need of it, now to become applicants. And to give general information to my constituents, I respectfully request the Richmond and Norfolk papers of both parties, to give this circular an insertion, and if there be any change, to transmit it to me.

HENRY A. WISE.
Washington, Jan. 7, 1841.

THE ARMY.
Appropriations for the Florida war. In reply to inquiries of the committee on ways and means, the secretary of war states that the following appropriations will be immediately required, and urges the early action of congress thereon.

For the quarters of the army, &c.	$1,300,000
For the commissary general of subsistence,	222,421
For pay of 1,500 mounted volunteers,	459,911
For pay of 500 foot volunteers,	77,206
For pay of arrears for Florida militia in 1840,	221,244
For pay of arrears for a battalion of Georgia volunteers in 1840,	25,146
For the ordnance department,	30,000
For the medical department,	10,000
	$2,385,327

We are requested to state that Messrs. Beall, Newton and Harrier, of the United States army, who were among the passengers in the Louis Philippe for Havre, on the 9th instant, were a commission appointed by the secretary of war to digest and report a system of tactics, &c. for the cavalry service of the United States.

[Nashville Beacon, Dec. 16.]
The above paragraph being calculated to convey erroneous impressions, we think it proper to give the actual state of the case.

A year ago, at the request of our readers, three officers of the first regiment of dragoons were sent to Europe, with the view to examine into the various systems of tactics and exercise practised by those nations, which have long employed cavalry as a component part of their arm.

These officers (Lieutenants Enstis, Turner and Kearny) entered the school at Saumur, and passed through a regular course of cavalry instruction; and having returned from their visit, with obvious improvement in their state of knowledge in the military art and service, the secretary of war, in the same spirit of liberality and regard for the interest of the army, has now granted permission, or given orders, to the three officers above named, of the second regiment of dragoons, so that they may enjoy equal advantages with the first; they will likewise go through a similar course of instruction at Saumur.

The officers of the first dragoons brought with them to this country a copy of the French system of tactics, which two of them have been since engaged in translating. The translation is completed, and will be submitted to a board of army officers for examination if approved, it will be adopted into the regulations of the army.

Modern improvements in weapons and instruments of war. The New York American has the following notice of some of the items contained in the preliminary report made by several officers of the ordinance department, who last year, by order of the secretary of war, visited Europe, with a view to examine and report upon any improvements in fire-arms and other implements of war.

The principal change in the small arms in England, France and indeed throughout Europe, is in the lock, which is now universally on the percussion principle, instead of the flint. Our service still retains the old slow and uncertain flint. This should be changed. These officers have reported the mode in which the old locks and barrels are altered for the use of percussion locks.

The officers visited all the public and private foundries of cannon, manufactories of small arms, and many of those of gunpowder, in Great Britain, and were every where received with entire kindness and openness. Several small and heavy cannon, to serve as models, were ordered at the works of Messrs. Walker, of Birmingham.

From Great Britain the officers proceeded to Sweden, and concerning one of the vast arsenals in Stockholm, we have the following particulars.

Arsenals at Stockholm. One of these establishments, for clothing, camp and hospital equipage, &c. contains cloth sufficient for clothing an army of forty thousand men six years, and it is preserved by means of curtains of canvas saturated with lin, which enclose it, closely packed in piles about seven feet square.

Woolen cloths thus stored remain secure from moths many years without being aired.

Several carriages for artillery, travelling forage and caisson, were sent as patterns to the United States.

Of the excellence of these carriages, and the skill of the Swedish flying artillery, we have this evidence.

The board were present, by invitation, to observe the manoeuvres of two eight gun batteries of horse artillery, which were executed with great rapidity, firing upon rounds only eight feet high, (with six horses to each carriage,) crossing deep ditches and other difficult places for the purpose of showing the perfection of the carriages, and especially the effect of the regulator, in relieving the wheel from the weight and violent motions of the pole.

The celebrated iron mines of Dannemora are thus described:

These great and celebrated mines are about eighty miles north from Stockholm, and produce every yielding from 80 to 90 per cent. of iron.

They have been wrought upwards of one thousand years, and are now about six hundred feet in depth. The iron made from the Dannemora mines is sold at prices far exceeding any other, and is exported for the sole purpose of being converted into steel in England.

Passing from Sweden to Russia, several days were advantageously spent at the camp of Krasnoe Selo, where the imperial guard of 60,000 infantry and 15,000 cavalry, were manoeuvring under the immediate command of the emperor.

A huge military arsenal exists at St. Petersburg. The gun room of the main building forms three sides of a square, the front being 500 feet, and each side or wing 230 feet long, and contain 400,000 arms.

Other rooms of equal capacity are filled with 600 large cannon, mounted upon carriages, or ready to be mounted; with calibres of all sizes, and complete quantities of equipments, ancient arms and armor of every age and form, models, &c.

The board passed through Prussia to France, visiting all places and establishments connected with their duty.

At Liège, muskets of our model are completed for $6 each, (30 francs).

The arsenal at Douai is vast and well filled.

The arsenal is one of the largest in France. The workshops are spacious and ample, and contain the stock of materials large and conveniently assorted; among which there is timber for 3,000 carriages, harness complete, or in parts, 40,000 horses, &c.

It contains upwards of 2,000 new house field and siege cannon, a number which is daily augmented by the active operations of the foundry.

It is nearly destitute of machines; manual labor, performed by soldiers, being cheaper than steam power.

There are many other curious items of information in this report, for which we must refer to the volume that contains it.

Whenever they went, our officers were received with great courtesy at all establishments, public and private, were freely thrown open to their inspection.

Militia. We find by the recently printed Army Register for 1841, by the adjutant general of the army, a general abstract of the militia of the United States, as follows:

67,941 federal officers, 3,846 general staff officers, 13,941 field officers, &c. 53,413 company officers, total commissioned officers 72,036, non-commissioned officers, musicians, artificers and privates 1,431,902. Aggregate 1,503,932.

The state of Maryland has 22 general officers, 68 general staff officers, 5,413 field officers, 1,363 company officers, total 2,397 commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, musician, artificers and privates 44,467. Aggregate 46,864.

THE NAVY.

Proposed convention of naval officers. A "naval officer known and respected," says the National Intelligencer of the 21st. ult. is the author of a communication in this column, over the signature of "Nicholas Nepon, U. S. N." in which he urges the holding of a convention of the officers of the navy, "in order," amongst other objects, "to give a tongue to the navy itself;" and he thinks that "the voice of the navy, once raised to tell its own pitiable condition, would not pass unheeded." In a pastorist, the writer requests "all papers in favor of a naval convention, to say aye, and support the call."

At first blush the proposition strikes us as being exceedingly injudicious. Conventions are appropriate for political and religious and social organization, where there is no legal and established authority; but where there is, or ought to be the strictest organization and discipline established by law, and where obedience is as indispensable, as it is in the army or civil service, the idea of organizing a distinct, not to say a counter authority or influence, to those of the government and the laws, would seem to be a kind of radical insubordination, and of a very dangerous tendency. Be the occasion for reform ever so great, we cannot depend upon the government in its organized and responsible departments, to take whatever measures may be required to ascertain the evils, as well as to suggest and carry out adequate remedies, we must have very little faith, indeed, in our political system, and too much confidence in the results of less systematized and altogether irresponsible agencies, if we hope better results from their attempts. If the government really requires the aid and council of experienced officers in a task of reform, they can command it at any moment, and no doubt would do so, if they conceived it necessary. But let there be no attempt at unauthorized, or even unauthorized movements of either the navy or the army, or their officers, and the government is lessened to its country in the case of the famous Newburg letters, at the close of the revolutionary war, should never be forgotten. General Washington during his first presidential term, advised Congress to prohibit by law, the formation of self-created secret political associations. What would he have said of self-created associations of army or navy officers, openly avowed to be for the purpose of changing, if not of overthrowing the laws passed or ought to be passed by Congress? If either the laws or the administration of the laws require reform, it would be better to resort for a remedy to the authorities expressly constituted for the purpose of government.

The author of the suggestion, in proposing a convention of officers, no doubt, was actuated by the most friendly solicitude for the navy, and for the welfare and honor of our country, to which the navy has already so largely contributed—but he has certainly mistaken the method by which an improvement of its condition should be sought.

STATES OF THE UNION.

MAINE.

U. S. senator. The hon. George Evans, (whig), was elected, on Thursday last, by both branches of the legislature of the state, to represent it in the United States senate, for six years from and after the 3rd of March next. In the house, Mr. Evans received a majority of 10 votes over Fairfield; and in the senate a majority of 6.

Banks. According to an abstract of the returns from the banks of the state, made on the first Monday of last month, the amount of the capital stock of the banks paid in was $1,371,500; amount of bills in circulation $1,754,390; deposits on interest $126,900; not on interest $733,594; due to other banks $45,251. The amount of specie was $209,729; due from other banks $600,894; bills of other banks in the state $146,550; out of the state $67,187; notes and bills discounted $5,820,792; real estate $322,750.

MASSACHUSETTS.

Gov. Davis' message on the north eastern boundary. The following is the message of Gov. Davis, on transmitting to the senate of this state last week, some resolutions relative to the north eastern boundary, from the states of Maine and Indiana.

To the president of the senate:

I found among the files placed in my hands by my pre-decessor, resolutions from the states of Maine and Indiana—and to conform with the object of those states, I transmit them for the information and use of the two houses. These resolutions were reported in regular order, from the eastern boundary, and I may be permitted in this connexion to add, that I see little prospect of an early adjustment of this disturbing matter; indeed, I fear there is no disposition on the part of Great Britain to bring it to an issue upon its merits.

The terms of the treaty of 1783 are plain and intelligible, and not easily perverted. They make the elevation of land, which divides the rivers that flow into the St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the dividing line between the United States and Canada on the north. On the east the treaty provides that the line shall be run from the source of the St. Croix, directly north to this highland which so divides these waters, and at the point of their meeting shall be the north west angle of Nova Scotia. When we consider the provisions of this treaty, and the known facts, it seems impossible that any question raising a doubt can exist. The question is, where does the treaty place the line near Maine Highlands?

We know there is a river called the St. Lawrence, having many streams rising in the highlands south of it, and flowing into it. We know also that several rivers rise on the opposite of these high grounds at the mouth of a small river called the Riviere du St. Lawrence, in a south west angle of Nova Scotia. It is impossible to comprehend how any serious obstacle to the accomplishment of this can exist—Another half century may pass away, and additional facts may be discovered, but these facts will never be changed, or the decisive character of the evidence in support of the treaty.

We know also that the source of the St. Croix has been ascertained, and a monument erected by agreement. We know further that from this monument a line has been traced directly north some 40 miles, to a place near Maine Highlands.

All that remains, therefore to be done, according to the treaty, is to continue this line to the lands that divide the waters flowing into the St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, and at the point of their meeting, to draw the line in a south west angle of Nova Scotia. It is impossible to comprehend how any serious obstacle to the accomplishment of this can exist—Another half century may pass away, and additional facts may be discovered, but these facts will never be changed, or the decisive character of the evidence in support of the treaty.

Under the circumstances, it is painful to see the present position of the matter, and the grossness of pretension to take from us a territory larger than our state, as their tendency is to disturb our pacific relations, and bring the two countries into a conflict.

The late report of the British commissioners, if it be a true statement of the facts, is a gross insult to the public mind, with indignation—and the sane reasoning and unvarnished conclusions contained in it, ought to be fully exposed. It is not, however, within our province to adjust the controversy; yet having a great interest at stake in the controversy, as well as in the peace and honor of the United States, it would seem no more than just to respond to this call upon us by our sister state—to extend her sympathy for the manifold wrongs which the usurpation of our territory has occasioned, by her hearty disposition to maintain the integrity of the country.

Finances. The report of the treasurer of Massachusetts states the whole amount of the funded debt of the state, exclusive of the loan of scrip to certain rail roads, at $1,600,137.

Result is this debt, the state has loaned its credit to five different rail roads, by the issue of scrip bearing interest at 5 per cent. and redeemable monthly at different periods from 1857 to 1870, when it holds the guaranty of the respective rail roads with a pledge of the entire property of the said rail roads, for the payment of the interest and principal of the said scrip. The amount of scrip thus issued is $3,850,000; of which $1,600,000, $500,000 to the Erie, $100,000 to the Norwich and Worcester, $150,000 to the Andover and Haverhill, and $100,000 to the New Bedford and Taunton rail road. An issue of like scrip to the Nashua and Lowell rail road, for the amount of $500,000, redeemable in 1846, has been returned to the treasury.

The principal receipts of revenue during the year were, from the bank tax $244,369; and from this auction tax $257,146.

The principal expenses were, for the pay of members of the legislature $96,357; salaries established by law, civil, judiciary and military, including judges and registers of probate, and clerks of the ex-cutive departments, $71,162; county balance $64,236; and paper accounts $45,806.

The income of 1841 from sources already provided, is likely to fall short of $400,000.

Black and White. The bill to repeal that section of the marriage act which prohibits intermarriage between whites and the blacks, came up on Saturday last. Mr. Bradstreet introduced the bill at some length. Mr. Park of Boston, said he should vote for the passage of the bill, not for the reasons given in the report of the committee, but because the statute proposed to be repealed, was an act violating a matter of taste. He thought all such laws had better be stricken from the statute book. He considered this subject as much a matter of taste, as whether a woman should wear a black or white ribbon on her bonnet.

The bill passed to a third reading by a vote of 144 to 92.

The lower house of the legislature of this state, has rejected the bill which proposed to repeal the law prohibiting the marriage of whites and blacks. The vote was 204 against, to 140 in its favor.

The Charleston concert. A proposition has been made in the house of representatives of this state, and so far entertained as to be referred to a select committee, to pay, from the state treasury, the amount of damages sustained by the destruction of the convent at Charleston, in 1837. The question has once before been agitated in the legislature, and was, most discreditably decided by a large majority against the memorialists.

NEW YORK.

Mr. Bradstreet, of Ulster county, has been appointed by gov. Seaward to procure for Holland a copy, or copies from the archives of that country, what he can find in relation to the early history of New York.

State finances. From the comptroller's report, we learn that the expenses of the last fiscal year, were $3,293,917—the balance left on hand, was $47,705. The estimated revenue for the present year, is $963,097—estimated expenditure, $949,506.

The whole debt of the state, is $13,434,891.

Election. John A. Culler has been elected by the legislature of New York, comptroller of that state.

State lunatic asylum. By the annual report of the commissioners, transmitted to the legislature on the 13th inst, it appears that the sum of money in the command of the commissioners at the close of the year, was $95,000. This sum has been expended, except $3,186, mostly on the main front building, which has been nearly completed. This asylum is located about one mile west from the city of Utica, on a high and healthy site. The buildings are finished, they will not only make an imposing appearance, but stand as a monument of one of the noblest charities of the age.

NEW JERSEY.

Legislature. A bill was introduced in the house on Wednesday to extend the charter of the People's bank of Paterson. Notice was given that there would be asked to introduce a bill to extend the charter of the Salem banking company. On the 21st, the resolution that the legislature will not take cognizance of divorce cases, when the court of chancery could have jurisdiction, was debated and negatived—ayes 16, nays 33. On the 23d a resolution was introduced to the effect that all persons applying for divorces after March 1, 1841, should receive a notice of such application in a newspaper circulating in their county.

[N. Y. Com. Adc.]

PENNSYLVANIA.

Governor Porter—Despotic power resisted! It is with pain we record the fact that the present governor of Pennsylvania has exercised a power during the last week, which no governor could exercise in the letter of the constitution, certainly never was contemplated by those men who conferred upon the executive the "pardoning power"—and is a matter which calls loudly for immediate legislative action. The principle is too dangerous to be encouraged, and the power, if it does exist, should never be entrusted to any man. We hope, therefore, to see the matter investigated and the corrective employed.

During the sitting of our court of quarter sessions last week, a bill was found by the grand jury against Messrs. Huettner & Canine, editors of the Harrisburg Magician, for a gross libel upon the citizens of Gettysburg, and Mr. Stevens particularly. It was called upon to put in their plea of acquittal, their counsel presented to the court a petition under the broad seal of the state, giving a full and free pardon from the governor of Pennsylvania to Messrs. Huettner & Canine, for all the libels published in the Magician, "in Adams county or elsewhere"—thus wiping off all their sins in this particular by a stroke of the pen! They could not, therefore, be tried for the offence—and have gone off "unwiped of justice."

A pardon given before trial and conviction!—What a license to commit crime! What to check the commission of any act of villainy—any murder—when the perpetrator has no pardon in his pocket? It is high time the people should look into these matters, and give a check to such high-handed and dangerous acts. It is only worthy the despotic power of the clerk's key!

To show that there is no mistake in the statement of the Gettysburg paper, we copy the following account of this affair, as given in the last Harrisburg Keystone, the official organ of gov. Porter. The Keystone states the fact of the pardon in substance, but does not add a word in justification of the proceeding:

Libel suit. The prosecution instituted in the session of Adams county, by Thaddeus Stevens, ex-against Huettner & Canine, for the publication of an alleged libel upon the character of the former, in the Magician, was, we understand, brought to a final decision on Wednesday last. When the defendants were called upon to plead to the indictment, they, by their counsel, W. N. Irvine, explained away the charge, and asked for a full pardon of the alleged offence, by the executive.

Loan. The recent loan of $800,000 dollars, created by the legislature of Pennsylvania to raise funds for the publication of the new edition of the Manual next, was taken, in the following sums:

United States bank,	$400,000
Pennsylvania bank,	150,000
Philadelphia bank,	75,000
Central Mechanics,	25,000
Northen Liberator,	20,000
Manufacturers and Mechanics,	15,000
Mr. C. S. Baker,	15,000
By other individuals,	20,000
Taken previously by the Eastern bank,	20,000
By other individuals,	30,000
Total,	$800,000

The canal commissioners of Pennsylvania recommend improvements and repairs for the present year to the extent of $3,588,827 00. This (says the Philadelphia Inquirer) added to the loan of $800,000, which has just been effected, will increase the state debt to more than forty millions of dollars.

Canal commissioners. We learn from the Harrisburg papers that the bill relative to the election of canal commissioners, passed the senate yesterday. It provides for the election of one by each branch of the legislature and the appointment of one by the executive. One is to serve for one year, another for two years, and the third for three years—the term of service in each case to be determined by lot.

The object of the bill is to exclude, as far as possible, the influence of party considerations from the management of the public works.

Asylum for the insane poor. Aware of the multiplied engagements of the members of the legislature, the friends of an asylum for the insane poor of this commonwealth, have prepared a brief statement of a few prominent facts on the subject.

[Penn. Telegraph.]

1. The state asylum for the insane poor at Worcester, Massachusetts, furnishes suitable accommodations for two hundred and thirty patients, and the whole cost, including a term of sixty acres, with the whole of Worcester, one of the most populous and thriving towns in that state, was but $104,000, which sum was expended in the course of several years, and it is hoped and believed, that with the advantage of a large fund of the experience of others, an asylum for three hundred patients, with a suitable farm, may be provided for $120,000.

2. The comparative expense of supporting paupers of this class, in such an establishment, and out of the almshouse, is as follows:—The ordinary cost, it cannot be accurately determined. The ordinary expense of supporting a sane pauper in Massachusetts, is from $1 to $1.50 per week. Many persons who contract to support paupers (sane and insane) in that state, by the year, being the insane portion of them in the state asylum and cost $2.50 per week, choosing to incur this extra expense rather than take care of them at home with the same paupers.

A serious maniac decently taken care of in an almshouse, or by friends, usually costs from two to three times as much as an asylum would charge.

"The alleged 'libel' is understood to have consisted in charging the destruction of one religious sect or community upon a public meeting of the Harrison democratic citizens of Gettysburg, during the late canvass, at which meeting, the gentleman named by the Keystone, was present, and bore a prominent part."

That an insane pauper may be kept in a stable, or cavern, or cage (as some are kept) for less than $1.50 per week, none will deny. But, in a civilized and humane community, such a course of treatment would be contemned when known. The true question—what is the cost of such a course of treatment as the unfortunate condition of the sufferer demands, and as will be likely to alleviate if not to remove his calamity! And in answer to this question we feel warranted in saying that even if it were practicable to carry the asylum treatment into an almshouse or a private family, the expense would be on an average, at least double. In determining this question, however, the probability of recovery is the first importance.

3. The probability of recovery depends entirely on the seasonable employment of the proper means. The difference occasioned by this circumstance would hardly be believed if it were not established by this question we feel warranted in saying that even if it were practicable to carry the asylum treatment into an almshouse or a private family, the expense would be on an average, at least double. In determining this question, however, the probability of recovery is the first importance.

The following statement from the sixth annual report of the Worcester asylum, sets this matter in a very convincing point of view.

Average expense of twenty old cases, (taken in the order of their admission), previous to their entering the asylum,	$806 25
Average expense in the asylum,	744 00

4. The friends of the proposed state asylum, do not design to increase, in the slightest degree, the public burden. Our insane paupers must be and are now supported at the public charge in some form. It is not designed to charge any new liabilities, nor impose any new obligations on the parties now chargeable with their support, but materially to lessen the expense—for, if by the contemplated measure, the numerous insane poor of this state can be decently provided for, without any additional burthen—should it not be done!—And if such an asylum may be reasonably expected to cure, within an average of from three weeks to three months, four out of every five patients who are placed within it. Within one year from the first appearance of the disorder, (a disorder which is proved to yield to medical and moral treatment as readily as any other complaint to which human nature is subject), who then can question the expediency of the erection of the asylum, if but simply on the score of economy?

It is confidently believed that whoever will examine carefully and without prejudice, the incontrovertible evidence in favor of asylums for the insane, as furnishing the most humane, economical and restorative treatment of insanity, will agree with the very numerous and highly intelligent pensioners, that it should be among the earliest measures of the present session of the legislature to provide such an asylum, which would afford to the hitherto neglected portion of our fellow citizens. These suggestions are intended to draw the attention of the governor and the legislature, to this important subject, and to invite a most thorough investigation of the subject.

Our delays only settle in hopeless, incurable disease, many who might be relieved and restored if seasonably provided for, and to incur a permanent and enormous tax in the support of a confirmed maniac, rather than provide the cure by restoration to reason and usefulness at a trifling present expense, is neither economical nor humane. So think and so have mind (in the file of memorials), THOMAS H. THOMAS, THOMAS THOMAS.

DELAWARE.

A special election took place a day or two ago, in Newcastle county, in this state, for a member to fill a vacancy which had occurred by death in the senate of the state. Mr. Thomas S. Mauden (formerly a senator of the United States, and a whig) was elected.

MISSISSIPPI.

We learn from the message of the governor of Mississippi, that the latest census of the colored population of the state, was 178,667, against 193,761, free persons of color, 1,266.

relation to the public domain—discussions which go to draw lines of injurious distinction between the friends of the old and the friends of the new states? Is it not evil that this consumption of time and this drawing of separating lines is continually growing upon us, and that to such a degree that, if nothing shall be done for its arrest it may endanger the peace of the country? Is it nothing that congress should be occupied nearly one-third of every session in legislation growing out of the public lands, at a large annual cost, besides the absorption of time which ought to be given to other subjects? Is it nothing that there should now be held by this federal government two-thirds of that entire territory over which these nine states have no control? Nothing, that all questions in relation to it have to be decided by congress, which out to be settled by the local authorities? Is there no influence thus exerted upon members representing the new states? And is not this species of legislation used to sway them? Is there not a corresponding influence on members from the older states? And is this nothing? Is it nothing that a question so pre-eminently local as that of land should—will boldly say it—contrary to the genius of our constitution, be under the influence of congressional action? Are members not supposed to be subjected to the same authority, the evil none can deny—the great question is, what is the remedy?

Three propositions have been brought forward. The first is to distribute the proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands among all the states. But will that relieve us? Will that stop the contest here between the new states and the old states? Will it put a stop to our interminable land debates? Will it place at our disposal the enormous revenue? Its operation will be precisely opposite to all this. Instead of relieving us from the evils under which we now labor, it will aggravate them all.

The second proposition is, that of graduation and pre-emption, namely, that we will let the new states relieve us? Will it touch any one of the evils I have enumerated? Not one. Acting as an antagonistic power to the scheme of distribution, it aggravates our danger and increases the excitement of the whole subject.

Where then, I again ask, where are we to find our remedy? It is a great and solemn question. To me it appears there is only one remedy, and that is cession—Cession. That will bring to a close the whole of our evils. That will settle all our land debates. That will cut off, at a blow, one-fourth of the patronage of the government. That will diminish the length of the sessions of congress. That will put a stop at once to the dangerous strife between the new states and the old states.

The only question is, can a cession be effected on such terms as shall do justice both to the old and to the new states, and at the same time not materially derange the existing land system? I think it can. In the abstract I believe it may be effected. I believe, and on this principle I have framed the amendment.

In the first place, it proposes that the whole of the public domain contained within the new states shall be ceded to the states where it lies. The quantity of this land amounts to 160,000,000 acres, two-thirds of which has been surveyed and is in market. It has been culled over twenty times. It has passed through the great process of speculation. Those who formerly purchased it have sold it at a great advance and picked it over thoroughly. This land I propose to cede, but to cede it on certain conditions. First, to secure the system now in force; next, to secure to the general government a fair pecuniary interest in the land, realizing all that it now realizes; and, lastly, to secure the fulfillment of the contract, viz: that if the states shall violate the terms of the contract, then all grants of land made by the states shall be null and void. These conditions are necessary for the object in view. And will they be the best that can be devised or met, I will not undertake to say. That is not the question now. The question is whether cession on some conditions is not the best remedy. If the general measure is approved in its details afterwards be settled by an able and experienced committee, and subsequently passed on by the senate.

If, then, this measure will secure the great object in view; if it will arrest existing evils, if it will secure justice and equity between the new and the old states, if it will preserve the land system—only altering it with respect to graduation and pre-emption—then, I trust, there will be in the senate but one opinion as to the propriety of its adoption. If we can have any reasonable measure, it is this. It will not alter to their contract, and that it will not make too great an inroad in the receipts of the government—that is the question and that only. And even in regard to this, the only real question is, whether the states will adhere to their contract; for as to the perennary results to the general government, these, as I shall hereafter be able fully to demonstrate, will be greater than they are at present.

And what reason have we to doubt that the states will adhere to that, which in its effect is better for them than any thing that can be proposed? I have no doubt that the states will adhere to it, and that they will conclude that these states will violate their pledged faith to this government? You contract with them now not to tax the lands of the government within their limits. Have they violated that? I am sure they have not. Never. And ought you to suspect that they will violate their other compact, should they enter into it? This doubting of the fidelity of the states all becomes us. Our government itself is only a compacted and violated. And this federal government has violated that compact a dozen times, where the states have violated it once—once. And does it become you to call in question the states adherence to their contracts.

But admitting, for argument's sake, that there is some danger, more or less—on this point, I put to the senate the solemn question, is there not a far greater danger in an opposite direction? Is there not far more danger that we shall lose the public lands altogether, than that we shall lose them by cession? I will now undertake to show you that the actual danger is not on the side of cession. The man who has not carefully watched the progress of the legislation of congress is regard to the land system generally, will not form a very accurate estimate of the danger that does exist. It is two-fold; first, that the lands will be lost by us to the occupant who will hold them, without paying a cent to the government; and, secondly, that they will be lost to the states themselves from the competition between the new and the old states. These dangers combined are likely to terminate in our final loss of the public lands, unless some preventive measure shall be speedily adopted.

First, the danger of losing the public lands to those who shall occupy them is seen from the amount of land still unoccupied. 320,000,000 acres have, from the beginning of the government, been set free from the Indian title. Of this vast amount we have as yet sold only 81,000,000, and of the latter amount not more than 39,000,000 were sold in the years 1831, '35, '36 and '37. We now hold 226,000,000 acres, to which the Indian title has been extinguished.—But mere numbers give us a very inadequate conception of the extent of the evil. Let us take the case of one thing like a realizing idea of it, we must compare it with the superfluities of some of the states, and we shall then perceive that the public domain in the hands of this government is equal to all New England, with the addition of New York, New Jersey, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia and about one-fourth of North Carolina. This government holds a space on the surface of this continent equal to the vast extent of territory I have mentioned; but as good as one-fourth of the population of the United States, and covers a space equal to the whole of the old 13 states, with the addition of Florida and half of Tennessee. Into this wilderness domain population is daily pouring in thousands upon thousands. It is wide, strong and deep, and not to be arrested, is sweeping westward, a portion of it consisting of persons having both disposition and means to select the choicest portions it contains. Others again are without either disposition or means, but they are anxious to purchase it when it shall be offered for sale; while a large mass of the poorer portion of the community, content themselves with land of an inferior quality, not worth any thing like the government land, and, realizing all that it now realizes, are not disposed to expect to be disturbed for thirty or forty years to come.

In the southwest (and with that portion of the country I am the most conversant) the settlers select the richest springs and a few of the choicest spots, while all the surrounding land is of a poor quality, and there they squat. Now, it is utterly impossible that this process can go on for any length of time, without creating in the minds of men this occupancy. The best, a large mass of the poorer portion of the community, content themselves with land of an inferior quality, not worth any thing like the government land, and, realizing all that it now realizes, are not disposed to expect to be disturbed for thirty or forty years to come.

of voting equal to the man who holds 10,000 acres, and they exert a powerful influence in all our elections. Will not such a class of men acquire an importance which will necessarily command respect? And let this idea of property and of right to the soil once become matured, and your hold of the public lands is gone.—

The first idea, then, which presents itself in the view of such a state of things, is that the government shall not encourage these men, that they are intruders and trespassers, that the public land belongs to all the union, and that every man has a right to it. Such is the natural sentiment which spontaneously arises in the mind from the lunatic sense of justice. But we must often yield a question of abstract right to the necessities of the case. The number of such settlers is vast. The territory is widely extended. How are you going to prevent them from thus taking possession of it? Are you going to send your marshals there to warn them off? That will never do. Will you send your army there? That has proved equally ineffectual. Will you send your army? It would take an army of twice the size, and would absorb every cent of the public revenue. Do gentlemen reflect upon the extent of the territory? Divide it among your great states, and you have 550 square miles to each soldier. Drive off the settlers at the point of the bayonet; they will flee before you, and in two weeks they will all return. I saw the proof of this when I was in the war department.

We made a law, that every soldier should be a trader on the Indian lands, and there the result was just the same. So no matter how it belongs to the case. Among all the presidents of the U. States—I do not know exactly how many we have had—many of them had had great success in the west, and of them ever attempted to enforce the law against the intruders upon the public domain? The senator from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) seemed to suppose it might easily be done. Well, that gentleman and his friends will be in point some six weeks from this time, with the president of their own choosing; let us see whether it will be done. But no spirit of prophecy is needed on that subject. That gentleman is by far too judicious to give the new president such advice. For gentlemen will not do it, and if he does he will go out of office by a majority of times as large as that by which he came in. His worst enemy could not give him worse advice.

What then is to be done? We must accommodate the man who has no right to the land, and we must do it in a thousand other cases: we must yield to circumstances, and try to lessen an evil we cannot conquer. The strongest governments are often obliged to yield, when they cannot by force prevail, and it will be wise in us to do the same.

How is this accommodation to be effected. 1. By uniting the state and the general government, and giving them a common interest. Without this nothing can be effected. Without this the state will always be the enemy of the general government, and against the general government—the state of things which cannot but be productive of evil.

What is the next point? The price of the land must be brought down at short intervals, step by step, as low as it is worth while to go.

It is vain to say that every acre of the land is worth a dollar and a quarter. I reverse that position: I say that there is not one acre of it worth the government price which is now taken up. I do not estimate the value of the land at all, but at what by their present use. In this matter, we can alter our matters of buying and selling, the relation between the demand and supply must always regulate the market. On this principle I am warranted in the opinion, that the price of the land now taken up is not taken up now is worth less than the minimum price. It may be worth it at some future day, but how far off? It is depreciated by this type of time. It is unreasonable to suppose that a man will wait until he can only get a dollar and a quarter, will give a dollar and a quarter for it when he can get a tract, the whole of which is of the first quality, at only a dollar and a quarter. When he is now settled, he remains indefinitely never expecting to sell, and he never expects to pay. He will have to pay. Again, if we are to bring down the price within a moderate time, or to see the whole will be lost. The provisions in my bill have been graduated accordingly. By the cession principle you unite the general and the state governments—having at the same time graduation and pre-emption united. I propose that, after the land shall have been in the market for ten years, its price be one dollar an acre; in five years more I reduce it to twenty cents an acre; and in five years more, to ten cents an acre. In 1852, when it will have reached twice and a half cent; and then I leave the rest to the states where it lies. I have anticipated that the states will, at intervals, pass pre-emption laws. This, I think, will reach the evil. The occupant of the land will feel that he is waiting for a time when he will be able to pay for his land, and he will be willing to do so. When the day comes, all who are able to pay their dollar an acre will make their money and get their title, and the rest will wait till the next period goes round, and such as are able to pay seventy-five cents will pay it and get their title; and thus, instead of continuing to be intruders and trespassers on the public domain, they will be converted into lawful occupants. These are the very men who ought to be there; they will fight your battles and defend your soil; and be the most efficient of all ramparts against aggression from without. Subjects, such as agriculture, have a most directly efficient on the prevailing morals of those men; it will teach them to look forward to the time when they will be the lawful owners of a peaceful home; it will break up the esprit de corps which now unites them in the debate of the government, the weight will be thrown on this government, as it ought to be, and an end will be put to most of the evils and dangers we now experience.
